This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.

+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.

+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.

+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at `http://books.google.com/`

COURT OF APPEALS OF KENTUCKY.

SOUTH COVINGTON & CINCINNATI RY. CO. v. SCHILLING, BY &c.

(Filed May 4, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Selection of jury—Where a jury, upon the trial of an action for damages, was selected from the panel selected for a previous term, upon a motion to discharge the panel and draw a new one as required to do by the statute, it was error in the lower court to overrule the motion.

Ernst, Cassatt & McDougal for appellant.

Robert C. Simmons for appellee.

Appeal from Kenton Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

The appellee, Ella Schilling, in the month of September, 1901, was driving north on Madison avenue in the city of Covington, Ky. One of the cars of appellant, going in the same direction, came up behind her, and collided with her wagon, throwing her from her seat to the street, by which she received a severe injury on the head, inflicting painful, and, as she claims, permanent injury; to recover damages for which this action was instituted, she alleging that the collision, and her subsequent hurt, were the result of the negligence of the employes of appellant in charge of the car.

The answer placed in issue the material allegations of the petition, and, in the second paragraph, alleged that the injury received by appellee was the result of her own negligence, and but for which she would not have been hurt. The issues were completed by reply, and upon the trial of the case, the jury returned a verdict of $500 in favor of appellee, of which appellant now complain. The trial was had on the 12th day of May, 1903. When the cases was called on the docket, appellant objected to the whole panel of the jury on the ground that it was the regular panel selected for the April term, which had been carried over by the judge into the May term. The motion to discharge the panel, and to draw a new one, as required by the statute, was overruled, and this is the first error complained of. This precise question was presented in the case of the Covington & Cincinnati Bridge Co. v.

Jennie Smith, ante 2392; it was held in the opinion in that case that the formation of the jury was a prejudicial error, and the judgment reversed upon that ground alone.

It follows, therefore, that the judgment herein must be reversed upon the authority of the case cited. As this case must be retried upon its return to the court below, it is proper that we should determine the other mooted question of law involved in the record. The trial court did not err in overruling appellant's motion for a peremptory instruction, as the evidence was conflicting as to the cause of the injury, and the issue of fact thus raised was one properly referable to the jury. Appellant and appellee have conflicting theories as to the cause of the accident, and there was evidence adduced in support of both. Appellee's theory is that she was driving in the street, but on the right of way of appellant, and that the car was run recklessly into the rear end of her wagon as she was leaving the track. Appellant's theory is that appellee's wagon was on the carriage way in a perfectly safe position, so far as the car was concerned, until it got alongside, whereupon the horse, for some reason, suddenly turned toward the car, and brought the vehicle in such close proximity thereto, that the journal of the car came in contact with the front hub of the wagon, thus causing the accident in question, and appellees' consequent injury.

The facts in this case, in so far as they illustrate the respective theories as to the responsibility of the parties hereto, with reference to the accident in question, are in all respects similar to those in the case of the South Covington & Cincinnati Street Ry. Co. v. Pelzer, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 88, and the legal principals deducible therefrom, are aptly and succinctly stated in the opinion therein rendered; and, upon the return of this case to the court below (assuming that the evidence upon a new trial will be substantially the same as that contained in the present bill of exceptions), the instructions of the court should be made to conform to the law as laid down in the case cited.

Wherefore, the judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

THUM, SURVIVING PARTNER v. CITIZENS BUILDING AND LOAN ASS'N'S RECEIVER.

(Filed May 10, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Attorney's fees—Where appellant and his co-counsel were allowed $6,150 for their services, other counsel having been paid $2,660 in the settlement of an estate where $90,000 have been collected, while the allowance appears to be small, the judgment of the chancellor having refused the allowance of a fee of $12,000 to appellant, his judgment will not be disturbed, because he knew all about the case from its inception and the time and character of services rendered.

Robt. L. Greene for appellant.

Burnett & Burnett and C. B. Blakey for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

This appeal is from a judgment of the Jefferson Circuit Court for refusing to allow the appellant a fee of $12,000 for services in representing W. R. Logan, assignee of Kentucky Citizen's Building and Loan Association, in the settlement of its affairs. This settlement suit has been on the docket something like six years. The appellant and his co-council have rendered valuable services for which they were allowed the sum of $6,150. Other counsel engaged in the case were paid $2,660. The total assets which went into the hands of the assignee amounted to about $200,000 and only about $90,000 of which have been collected.

The proof shows that nearly one-third of what has been collected has been expended in the way of paying attorneys, the assignee and other expenses incurred. While, under the proof, the allowance to appellant appears small, considering all the circumstances connected with the settlement of this estate as shown by the record, and the further fact that the chancellor who tried this case knew all about it from its inception, and the kind and character of services rendered by the appellant, we do not feel inclined to disturb his judgment.

In the case of Germania Safety Vault Co. v. Hargis, 28 Ky. Law Rep., 874, the court said: "The only evidence as to the value of an attorney's services being their own testimony, the court is not concluded thereby, but must, while having full respect for their opinions, exercise its own judgment." In the case of Louisville Gas. Co. v. Hargis, 17 Ky. Law Rep., 1190, this court in substance said: In fixing the value of legal services, the chancellor need not be controlled entirely by the opinion of the witnesses, but may rely upon his own knowledge and experience of such matters.

Wherefore, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE R. R. CO. v. MULFINGER'S ADM'X.

(Filed May 4, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Railroads—Negligent killing of brakeman—Evidence—The weight of the evidence in this case shows that deceased was knocked off the car or ladder he was using in the discharge of his duty as extra brakeman, by reason of a cross arm attached to a telegraph pole standing near the railroad track; the car he was attempting to climb on, being very wide and high it was hardly possible to reach his position on the car, dark as it was, without being hit or pushed off the ladder or car.

2. Reasonable inference—Dizziness—Under the proof in this case it is reasonable to infer that deceased did not lose his life by falling from the ladder, it being more reasonable to infer that he was knocked from the car by this cross arm, than by his becoming dizzy, as he was young, healthy, active, and strong, and not subject to dizziness.

3. Evidence withdrawn from jury—The fact that the lower court allowed a statement, made by one Fossett, to be given to the jury as part of the res gestæ, which the court afterwards withdrew as incompetent, and admonished the jury both by verbal and written instructions to disregard it as evidence, we must presume that the jury obeyed the court's instruction and disregarded the evidence so given.

4. Reading petition as evidence—The counsel for appellant having read the petition to the jury and commented on it, we know of no rule of law that would prevent the opposite party from likewise discussing it.

5. Excessive verdict—Expectany of life—Earning capacity of deceased—Although by a calculation of the life tables considering decedents' expectancy of life and his earning capacity at the wages he received at the time of his death, and deducting his living expenses, his estate was worth less than $8,000, the amount of the verdict given by the jury, the appellant overlooks the fact that the jury might take into consideration that a young, vigorous man like deceased, might not always be an extra brakeman, but that his earning capacity would increase with age and promotion.

J. A. Sullivan and Breckinridge & Shelby for appellant.

H. C. Rice, Smith & Bush, R. L. Greene and Hazelrigg, Chenault & Hazelrigg for appellee.

Appeal from Madison Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

This appeal is from a judgment for $8,000 for the alleged negligent killing of appellees' intestate in the month of October, 1901, in appellant's yards in Paris, Ky.

The deceased, Lewis Mulfinger, was in the employ of appellant as "extra brakeman," described to mean one who has no regular employment, but takes the place of a regular employe when off duty. It appears that appellant has in its yards at Paris several tracks or sidings running north and south. The freight train on which Mulfinger was employed was on the east track, or siding No. 10. It appears, without any contradiction, that there was, at the time Mulfinger lost his life, a telegraph pole standing 4 feet and 8 inches from the outer or east rail of this No. 10 track; that there was a cross arm on this pole of six feet in length, situated fourteen feet and three inches from the ground or base of the pole, and that this No. 10 track or siding was constructed with a slight curve, and for that reason the east rail or one next to the pole was from two to three inches lower than the west rail, which necessarily inclined the top of the passing car several inches nearer the pole. The car from which Mulfinger fell and lost his life was an L. & N. stock car, twelve feet high, nine or ten feet wide, the track being five feet wide. The car necessarily extended from two and one-fourth to two and one-half feet over the side of the rails. The cross arm on the pole extending out over the top of the car in passing, to the extent of near two feet, and two feet and three inches above the roof of the car. The only witness who saw the deceased immediately before he lost his life, was one Fossett, the rear brakeman. He testified that the train was started that night south in the usual manner; that he left the caboose and went along the cars loosening the brakes, and when he arrived at the front end of a gondola or coal car, the fourth car from the caboose, the deceased, the middle brakeman, climbed upon this gondola car from the West side and crossed it and passed to the east corner of the stock car immediately in front and caught hold of the ladder of the stock car which was on the east side and near the rear end of the car, and the last he saw of the deceased on the car was when he was climbing this ladder. Witness stated that he was standing upon an eight inch projection on the front end of the gondola car on the side of the car next to the telegraph pole, but about one and one-half or two feet from the outside or east side of the gondola car. It appears from the evidence that this gondola car was not as wide as the stock car by a foot or more.

While standing upon this projection, witness turned his face east, leaving his body fronting the south, when, without any warning to him, the deceased fell and brushed him down the front and nearly knocked him from the car. When deceased fell he fell between the cars and the front wheels of the gondola passed over his body and were thrown off of the track and moved about a car length. Mulfinger died within a few minutes, without uttering a word. Three witnesses testify, without contradiction, that this gondola car left the track at the telegraph pole; that the indentation of the wheels of the car on the ties began at that point. The witness, Fossett, did not know whether the deceased had reached the top of the car, but stated that he saw his lantern on top of the car. On cross-examination Fossett also stated that he saw the telegraph pole when he passed it, and that Mulfinger fell after passing the pole.

The appellant contends that the court erred in not giving a peremptory instruction to find for it, claiming that under the facts, as proven, it was not shown that the telegraph pole, or the arm caused the death of Mulfinger, but that the probabilities were equal that he was knocked off by the pole or arm or slipped from the ladder or missed his hold on the iron on top of the car, which was about two feet from the east edge of the car, or that he became dizzy and fell from the car. Apellant refers to the cases of Wintuska's Adm'r v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 14 Ky. Law Rep., 579; Louisville Gas Co. v. Kaufman, Straus & Co., 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1068; Hughes v. Cincinnati R. R. Co., 91 Ky., 596; L. & N. R. R. Co., v. Walton, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 85; Hughes, Adm'r v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 28 Ky. Law Rep., 2288, and Hughes, Adm'r v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1029, in support of their motion, and claim that in effect these cases decide that when, under the evidence, the inference that the injury was due to the defendant's negligence is no stronger than that it was due to the person injured himself or to other causes, a peremptory instruction is proper. This is the correct rule, and the cases referred to sustain it. The question to be determined is, whether this case comes within this rule. After a careful consideration of the facts proven, we are of the opinion that it does not. As stated, the proof is positive and without contradiction that the deceased was last seen ascending the ladder on this stock car before reaching the pole, and that the pole and its arm were so situated that it was hardly possible for him to reach his position on the car, dark, as it was, without being hit or pushed off the ladder or car. It is reasonable to presume that if he had slipped when on the ladder or missed his hold on the iron bar on top of the car, then he would have fallen backward, and not between the car he was on and the one following him. The witness, Fossett, stated that the deceased fell against him, and he was situated one and a half or two feet west of the east side of the gondola car. This, in connection with the fact that his lantern was on top of the car, shows that deceased fell from the top of the stock car. This fact, in connection with the admitted fact that the arm of this pole extended over the roof of this car about two feet, and only two feet and three inches above it, and the further fact, as proven by Fossett, that when the wheels passed over his body the wheels were thrown from the track (and all the witnesses testified that this occurred at the telegraph pole, as shown by the unmistakable fact that the indentations in the ties made by the wheels began at that point,) is a convincing circumstance that the deceased was knocked or pushed off of the top of this car by the arm of this pole. We are not unmindful of the statement by Fossett that he saw this pole by the light of his lantern as he passed it, and that deceased fell after he passed it. Evidently Fossett was mistaken in this statement, or in the statement that the wheels, in passing over the body, were thrown off of the track. The physical facts corroborate the last statement. It was the province of the jury to weigh the evidence and give credit to that which comported with reason. To uphold the contention of appellant in this case would amount to the establishment of a rule that no case for damages could be made out by circumstantial evidence; that to maintain such a case there must have been one or more eye witnesses to the prime fact.

In the Wintuska case, above referred to, the proof only showed that when Wintuska was last seen he was walking on top of a car going in the direction of the engine, and he was afterwards found dead near the rock claimed to be the cause of his death, and it was supposed that he was descending the ladder on the side of the car and came in contact with this rock. In this case there is no supposition as to decedent ascending the ladder. It is a proven fact.

In the Kauffman, Straus & Co. case, supra, the court said, in substance, that the boiler gave way from one of two or more causes as shown by the proof. First, that it might be inferred that low water in the boiler caused it, and if this was the case the gas company was responsible. The court also said that the proof showed with reasonable certainty that the boiler was inherently weak from physical changes occurring secretly through long use, and which were not discoverable by ordinary and usual inspection, and that the explosion almost necessarily followed from the subjection of the boiler to the usual amount of pressure required in its customary operation, and that the gas company used the proper care to discover the defects in the boiler. The proof also showed that the boiler was managed and operated prudently, and the explosion was not the result of negligence, and the court concluded that as the proof showed that it was more probable that the boiler was destroyed from the latter cause than by reason of not keeping it full of water, the gas company was not liable,

In the Hughes case, supra, 91 Ky., 526, the court said: "In an action to recover for an injury arising from defendant's negligence, the burden of showing negligence is on the plaintiff; and if the evidence shows that the injury may have resulted from either one of two or more causes, only one of which was due to defendant's negligence, and the inference that the injury resulted from the one cause is no stronger than that it resulted from the other, the plaintiff has failed to make out his case, and the jury should be so told."

Under the proof in this case it is reasonable to infer that the deceased did not lose his life by falling from the ladder. It is more reasonable to infer that he was knocked from the car by this cross arm, than by his becoming dizzy and falling off, the proof showing that he was a young man twenty-three years of age, healthy, active and strong, and not subject to dizziness or fainting spells.

Appellee introduced as a witness one Cleveland, who stated that he was the head brakeman on the train that night; that when the train stopped he went back hurriedly to where Mulfinger was lying, and as soon as he arrived there he asked Fossett what caused Mulfinger to get hurt. Fossett answered that the cross arm knocked him off. The appellant objected to this testimony; the court overruled its objection, and it excepted. During the trial, and before the evidence was closed, the court changed its mind as to the competency of this evidence, and excluded the same from the jury, stating to the jury that they must not consider it for any purpose. The appellant then moved the court to discharge the jury and continue the case. The court overruled this motion, to which action the appellant excepted. At the conclusion of the evidence the court gave written instructions to the jury, the first one being as follows: "The testimony of the witness, William Cleveland, as to what Fossett said to him, to wit: That Mulfinger was knocked off by the telegraph pole, is incompetent evidence, and that statement is excluded from your consideration, and you are instructed to wholly disregard that statement of the witness in considering what your verdict should be."

Appellee claims that this statement by Fossett to Cleveland is competent as part of the res gestæ; appellant claims that it is not, and the lower court so decided. As appellant is now complaining, we deem it unnecessary to pass upon the competency of this evidence, but will treat it, for the purposes of this case, as incompetent. Before the court excluded this statement of Cleveland, the witness, Fossett, denied having made any such statement to Cleveland, or any one. With this denial by Fossett and the oral and written instructions by the court to the jury not to consider this evidence for any purpose, we must presume that the jury obeyed the court's instructions, and that the statement did not have any effect on the jury in making up their verdict.

Appellant introduced as evidence the plaintiff's petition for the purpose of showing a variance between it and the proof introduced by appellee, and also that from the petition, appellee did not herself know what caused the death of her husband. She stated in her petition that his death resulted from one or two causes, but which one, she did not know. The appellant's counsel in his argument to the jury discussed this petition. Appellee's counsel in his closing argument also discussed this petition, and read to the jury that part which alleged that deceased came to his death by being knocked off the car by the cross arm, and stated that appellant had proven appellee's case for her by the introduction of this petition as evidence. Appellant objected to this, the court overruled its objection, and the appellant complains that this is error, and very prejudicial to it.

We must presume that the jurors had minds sufficient to give proper weight to this species of evidence. They had heard the whole petition read, and they knew from it and the other evidence in the cause that the administratrix, Mrs. Mulfinger, was entirely ignorant of the cause of her husband's death, except from report. For this reason the petition ought not to have been introduced, but as the appellant introduced it, and commented upon it, we know of no rule of law that would prevent the opposite party from discussing it. Under our law, the pleadings are for the court and not for the jury, and it is improper for counsel to read or discuss them before the jury, unless introduced as evidence. In the case of L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Hull, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 879, the court said: "If it was desired to get before the jury the statements in the pleadings of the defendant, these pleadings should have been given in evidence on the trial, so that the defendant might have an opportunity to explain any inconsistencies. When this was not done, they should not have been referred to in the concluding argument, which should have been confined to the evidence heard before the jury and the law of the case as given in the instructions of the court."

Appellant also complains that the appellee's counsel, in his concluding argument, was guilty if improper conduct in discussing the criterion of damages different from the rule as prescribed in the instructions of the court. It does not appear from the bill of exceptions that appellant objected to this, and, therefore, we can not consider it. Appellant also complains that the verdict is excessive, and for that reason the case ought to be reversed; and makes some figures as to what deceased was earning as extra brakeman, considering his expectancy of life and deducting his probable living expenses. This calculation shows that the deceased was worth to his estate considerably less than $8,000. The appellant overlooks the fact that the jury might take into consideration that a young and vigorous man like Mulfinger, might not always be an extra brakeman; that it was reasonable to presume that he might be promoted to a higher and better paying position, if he had been permitted to live. This court has upheld verdicts in several cases in excess of $8,000 where the person's life was lost by negligence.

Perceiving no error prejudicial to the substantial rights of appellant the judgment of the lower court is affirmed, with damages.

Whole court sitting except Chief Justice Burnam.

SIZEMORE, &c. v. TRIMBLE, &c.

(Filed May 4, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Lands — Title of record—Tenancy—Adverse possessio n— The appellees having title of record from the Commonwealth to the land in controversy, on which appellant and her husband, Thomas Sizemore, resided up to his death in 1894, the husband occupying the land as tenant of the appellees, paying them rent up to the time of his death, and appellees having procured a judgment in the Breathitt Circuit Court, in which county the land lies, enjoining the husband from cutting or removing any timber from the land, which judgment was consented to by him in open court, to which action the wife was not a party, and in which it was adjudged that the husband was to occupy the land as appellees' tenant until January 1, 1889, the wife, Peggy Sizemore, could not have held the land adversely to appellees while her husband held for them, and the title he held must govern the possession unless collusion had been shown.

Dyke L. Hazelrigg and Thos. T. Cope for appellants.

W. W. McGuire, J. J. C. Bach and White & Ray for appellees.

Appeal from Breathitt Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

This action was brought in the Breathitt Circuit Court in equity by appellees, children of Jerry W. South, against appellants, seeking to obtain an injunction to restrain them from committing waste by cutting and removing timber from the lands described in the petition, alleged to be the land of appellees, and in the possession of appellants as tenants. Appellants denied the title of appellees and the tenancy, and claimed the land as that of Peggy Sizemore, by patent to her father, and title bond from him to her and by adverse possession. Upon trial the injunction was granted and from that judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

It appears that many years ago Jerry W. South, ancestor of appellees, became the owner of a large body of land which had been patented by the Commonwealth of Virginia to one Franklin in the year 1784. There is proof showing that this land was deeded to South and Judge Breck under a tax sale, and the deed was recorded in the clerk's office of Breathitt county, but was destroyed by fire in the burning of the courthouse in the year 1878. Under this purchase and deed, South entered into the possession of the land so far back as 1850, at least that part of the land in controversy herein. For many years after 1850, South made divers and sundry leases to various tenants and one of his sons lived on the land as his tenant. This was continued from 1850 down to the time of the trial. In the year 1880 or 1881, one Davidson, the father of appellant Sizemore, caused to be surveyed about 180 acres of this land on Wolf creek and secured a patent for it from the Commonwealth. This 180 acres lies, as the court found, and it appears to be conceded, within the boundary of the old Franklin patent. About the time of this survey by Davidson, Tom Sizemore and his wife, Peggy, moved on this land and took possession of the house and some cleared land which had been vacated by some of South's tenants. This house and cleared land was within the boundary of the Davidson patent.

Sizemore and wife continued to live on the land until his death, which was after the year 1894. In the year 1888 or 1889, Tom Sizemore cut and undertook to remove some timber from this land, and the South heirs brought a suit to restrain him from committing this waste and for a recovery of the land, and on the 10th of February, 1886, the following order was made in that action:

"This day came the parties, and by consent it is adjudged that plaintiffs recover of defendant, Thomas Sizemore, the land in contest and same named in the petition, and that a writ of possession issue in the name of the plaintiffs, after 1st day of January, 1889, if called for by plaintiffs, and the injunction is made perpetual. It is further adjudged, by consent of parties in open court, that the defendant is to occupy the land in contest as tenant of plaintiffs until 1st of January, 1889, and the papers are filed away as to Sizemore.

"H. C. LILLY, Judge."

It appears from oral proof and written leases filed in the record that after January 1, 1889, Thomas Sizemore continued in the possession of this land as the tenant of appellees up to the time of his death.

Appellants claim that the judgment referred to was obtained by fraud, but even if valid that Peggy Sizemore was not a party to the action in which it was rendered, nor was she a party to the lease contract and the same was not binding upon her; that she was the owner of this land by gift from her father; that she had been in the peaceable, open, adverse possession of this land since she first moved there with her husband in the year 1881, claiming the same as her own. There was no proof that the judgment was obtained by fraud. It is true she was not a party to that action and she did not sign the lease contract, and it is true she was in possession of this land from the year 1881 to the time of bringing of this action in 1898, but during this time she was the wife of Thomas Sizemore. She professes not to have known of this lease contract, but the evidence largely preponderates that she was apprised thereof. From all the facts and circumstances proven in this case it would be unreasonable to conclude that she was not aware of the fact that her husband occupied this land as a renter from appellees. There is not any proof that she claimed the land in her own right and adversely to appellees, except her own and the statement of a few near relatives or parties in interest with her, who claimed that she made such statements to them. Certainly if appellees, or their agent, had known of such claim on her part, they would have enforced the judgment copied above or would have taken steps to dispossess the family from the premises and not let her adverse claim ripen into title.

The Davidson patent, being laid upon land previously patented, was void and there can be no pretense that she had any right or title to the land except by adverse possession; and she claims such possession by reason of her joint occupancy with her husband who was undoubtedly a tenant of appellees. In our opinion her plea can not avail her in this action. She could not have held adverse to them and at the same time he hold for them. Thomas Sizemore was the head of the family and the title he held under, must govern the possession unless collusion had been shown on the part of her husband with the appellees. Certainly her claim was not very open and notorious as her husband did not recognize it, but paid rent to the appellees. Under the peculiar facts of this case she, appellant Peggy, being the wife of the tenant of appellees, can not maintain her claim of adverse possession without showing positive and actual notice to appellees that her possession of the land and claim thereto was in opposition and adverse to that of her husband and the appellees. This she has not done.

Wherefore, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

GARROTT, &c. v. RIVES, &c.

RIVES, &c. v. GARROTT, &c.

(Filed May 5, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Advancements—Where a father conveyed to his children by a former wife, a tract of land as a result of advancements which his father-in-law had made to him, which land was encumbered and a part of it subsequently sold in an action to enforce the lien upon it, but leaving a balance of the debt unpaid, the infants could not be charged with more than the residue of the land; as what they received was not the debt but the land, and it was proper to overrule exceptions to the report of the commissioner in which it was sought to charge them with the remainder of the unpaid debt.

2. Same—Evidence—Statements by a son that he had paid rent to his father incompetent, the father being dead, the son could not testify as to a transaction with him; and moreover, where an heir uses land of an intestate he must account for the use of it as an advancement.

C. H. Bush and Hunter Wood & Son for appellants and appellees on cross appeal.

James Breathitt and John T. Edmonds for appellees and cross appellants.

Appeals from Christian Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

The above two appeals from the same judgment will be determined together. Robert W. Garrott died intestate in Christian county in November, 1898, the owner of considerable estate, and the only question to be determined is as to advancements made to his children and grandchildren. He had a daughter, the wife of H. P. Rives, who died before he did, leaving several infant children. Her husband, H. P. Rives, about the year 1882, bought a tract of land of 304 acres and Robert W. Garrott lent or advanced to him three or four thousand dollars to pay for this land or improvements made on it. On September 7, 1896, this debt, with interest amount to $7,214.76, and in consideration of it H. P. Rives and his second wife conveyed to his three infant children by his first wife the tract of land referred to, at the request of Robert W. Garrott and in settlement of the debt. The land was then encumbered by a mortgage to the Fidelity Trust and Safety Vault Co. for $4,200, and interest. The mortgage was foreclosed and 137 acres of the land, which included the dwelling house and most of the improvements, was sold to satisfy the mortgage, leaving the three infant children with 167⅓ acres, the balance of the tract without improvements. The special commissioner to whom the case was referred charged the infants with an advancement of the 167⅓ acres of land at $25 an acre.

The other heirs at law filed exceptions to the commissioner's report because he did not charge the infants with $7,214.76, the full amount of the debt which Robert W. Garrott had against H. P. Rives. The court upon the hearing of the exceptions to the commissioner's report charged the infants with $5,448.93, which includes interest from the death of Robert W. Garrott. From this judgemnt both parties have appealed.

The amount of the debt which Robert Garrott had against H. P. Rives is entirely immaterial. The thing that the infants received was not the debt, but the land. H. P. Rives seems to have been influenced only by the idea of doing justice to the children of his first wife. He may have had some defense to part of the debt, or it may be that the debt could not have been made out of him. By section 1407, Kentucky Statutes, advancement shall be estimated according to the value of the property when given. The intention of the testator in making the advancement does not control, the cardinal object of the statute being to secure equity in the distribution of his estate. (Boles v. Winchester, 13 Bush, 1; Stevenson v. Martin, 11 Bush, 485.) We, therefore, conclude that the court properly refused to charge the infants with anything more than the value of the land they got, and on the appeal of Issac Garrott, &c. v. Harry A. Rives, &c., the judgment is affirmed.

The special commissioners' report which fixed the value of the 167⅓ acres at $25 an acre is supported by the weight of the evidence, or this is at least as high as the evidence warrants, considering the fact that the improvements were on the other end of the tract. The infants took the land encumbered by the mortgage. What they got was the value of the land less the mortgage. The mortgage was soon thereafter foreclosed and so what they really got was the 167⅓ acres that was left. This, at $25 an acre, amounts to $4,181.83, and is as much as, under the evidence, should be charged to the infants on account of the advancement to them.

L. O. Garrott, one of the sons, for five years before his father's death, occupied a tract of land belonging to his father of the fair rental value of $500 a year. The infants insist that he should be charged with this rent as an advancement. He admits using the land, but claims that he paid his father the rent. He produced four receipts from his father, given from time to time, aggregating $209.89. The commissioner credited him by this amount and charged him with the remainder of the rent as an advancement. The court sustained his exceptions to the commissioner's report and refused to charge him with the rent. His statements that he had paid the rent to his father are incompetent, as he can not testify for himself to a transaction with the decedent. We do not find any competent evidence in the record that he paid the rent to his father. It has been often held that where one of the heirs uses land of the intestate he must account for the use of it as an advancement. (Hamilton v. Moore, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 982, and cases cited.) Under the proof L. O. Garrott must be charged with the use of this land as an advancement as reported by the special commissioner.

Judgment reversed on the appeal of H. A. Rives, &c. v. Isaac Garrott, &c., and cause remanded, with directions to overrule the exceptions to the commissioner's report above indicated and enter a judgment pursuant to the report.

COMBS v. JOHNSON, &c.

(Filed May 5, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Lands—Ejectment—Where it is sought to recover possession of land sold a sheriff under a judgment, where the possession was obtained pursuant to section 1689, Kentucky Statutes, where it is claimed that the judgment was obtained by fraud, the remedy is by action under subsection 4 of section 518, Civil Code, in a proceeding to vacate or modify the judgment, and not by proceeding in ejectment.

2. Same—Where proceedings are had under section 1689, Kentucky Statutes for the possession of land, as between the parties thereto it is conclusive as to the right of possession so long as that judgment remains in force and effect.

W. C. Eversole and J. J. Fiztpatrick for appellant.

J. J. C. Bach for appellees.

Appeal from Perry Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The appellant, Polly Ann Combs, brought this action in ejectment against the appellee to recover the possession of a small lot of land in Hazard, Ky. The answer of the defendant alleged that J. M. Marcum recovered a judgment against the appellant and others for $450, with interest and cost in the Perry Circuit Court; that he had sued out an execution thereon which was levied by the sheriff of Perry county on the lot sued for as the property of appellant, and after having advertised the time, place and terms of sale, as required by law, sold it at public outcry, when J. J. C. Bach became the purchaser at more than two-thirds of the appraised value thereof, which he paid in full; and that the sheriff thereupon executed and delivered to him a deed to the lot; that on the 11th day of September, 1902, he caused a notice to be served upon the appellant that he would move Perry Circuit Court for a possession of such lot; and that on the 21st of September, 1902, the motion was duly made before the court and a judgment entered thereon to the effect that the plaintiff in the motion, Bach, was entitled to the possession thereof, and a writ of possession awarded to him therefor with cost, as provided by section 1689 of the Kentucky Statutes. Copies of the judgment and writ of possession were filed with and made a part of the answer. The answer alleges that this judgment was still in full force and effect; that subsequently Bach sold and conveyed this lot to the defendant, Johnson; and that by reason of such conveyance he was the legal owner and in possession of the lot.

Appellant, in her reply, admitted most of the affirmative allegations of the defendant's answer, but denied that the sheriff of Perry county levied the aforesaid execution upon the lot of land in controversy, and affirmatively alleges that the lot on which the execution was levied, was described in the levy and advertisement for sale thereunder, as being bounded on the north by A. H. Johnson's lot, on the east by Main street, on the south by the Baptist Church, and on the west by the Kentucky river, which did not cover the lot in controversy. A plat showing the location of the lot actually levied upon and sold, and that in controversy is as follows:

MAIN STREET.

Johnson's lot.		Baptist Church lot.	Fitzpatrick's lot.
		Lot in controversy.

KENTUCKY RIVER.

That subsequently to the sale, Bach, with Johnson's knowledge, had a survey made which included the lot in controversy, and procured the sheriff to execute to him a deed therefor, although both Bach and the sheriff well knew that it was not included in the levy or sale; that Bach had represented her in the litigation with Marcum as an attorney; and that when the notice was served upon her in the proceeding for a writ of possession, Bach assured her that he was seeking to get possession only of the lot described in the levy and advertisement of sale; and that it did not cover the lot in controversy; and that relying upon his representations she did not resist the motion for judgment and writ of possession. A demurrer was sustained to her reply by the trial court and her petition dismissed, and she has appealed.

The judgment of the Perry Circuit Court in the proceedings had, under section 1689 of the Kentucky Statutes, for the possession of the lot, as between the parties thereto, is conclusive as to the right of possession to the lot in controversy, so long as that judgment remains in full force and effect. (McGee v. Southerland, 84 Ky., 198; Phelps v. Jones, 91 Ky., 244.)

If, as claimed by appellant, the judgment was obtained by fraud, her remedy is by action under subsection 4 of section 518 of the Civil Code, in a proceeding to vacate or modify the judgment on the motion for writ of possession. (Bell County v. Foley, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 885.)

Judgment affirmed.

ILLINOIS CENTRAL R. R. CO. v. McINTOSH.

(Filed May 5, 1904.)

1. Railroads—Section men—Collision on hand car—Negligence of section foreman—Proximate cause of injury—Appellee, a section laborer, was on a hand car by order of his foreman, on the time of a freight train coming meeting them, when, on turning a curve, they discovered the freight train approaching within seventy-five or one hundred yards, and, after they all got off the hand car, the foreman ordered them to take the hand car from the track, which they did very hurriedly to avoid a collision, in which effort appellee was ruptured by the strain. There was a public crossing some rods in front of the hand car, over which the freight train had passed without giving the statutory signals. Held—In view of the emergency that wa presented, and the consequences that might ensue to the train and to them selves by a collision, it was a question for the jury whether the appellee exercised such care as might be ordinarily expected of a person of usual prudence, situated as he was, and whether the injury that resulted to him in obeying the orders of his superior was the natural and proximate cause of the negligence in running on the freight train's time, or that of the freight train men, in failing to give the signals at the public crossing.

2. Contributory negligence—Ordinary risks assumed—While the appellee assumes the risks incidental to riding on a hand car, where ordinary care is used in its management, he did not assume the risk incidental to the gross negligence of the foreman in running the hand car on the freight train's time, nor that of the freight train in failing to observe the statutory signals at the public crossing.

Gordon, Gordon & Cox, Pirtle & Trabue and J. M. Dickinson for appellant.

Fox & Morrow and C. J. Waddill for appellee.

Appeal from Hopkins Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Appellee, Charles McIntosh, was in the service of appellant as a laborer in a section gang working under a foreman named Monroe Ray, who had charge of the force. On or about November 7, 1901, they were working above Ilsey, a station on the road. After dinner the foreman ordered the men to put the hand car on the track, saying they had to go to Ilsey. They went down to Boxtown, and there stopped a minute or two while he went into a store. When he came out of the store and got on the car he directed them to pull out. This they did, and when they had gone a short distance, as they rounded a curve they saw a freight train approaching them, about seventy-five or one hundred yards off. They all jumped from the car. The foreman ordered the car to be taken off the track. There are four hand holds on the car for four men to take hold of it. Appellee and three other men took hold of the car, as ordered by the foreman, and quickly got it off the track as the engine came right beside them. The car had on it two or three jacks, twelve or fifteen tamping picks, about the same number of shovels, two or three claw bars, two or three line bars, dinner buckets, and other things. The usual way of moving the hand car from the track was to unload it, and then take the car off, but on this occasion they had to take the car off with the load on it to prevent collision with the train, and hardly had time to get it off in that way. They also had to lift it up very hurriedly and move off with it quickly to avoid the collision. In doing this, appellee McIntosh was badly ruptured, and his capacity to labor was seriously impaired. He also suffered pain and lost time while suffering from the injury. The train was on time and the section foreman was running on the time of the train. There was a public road crossing a few rods west of them, over which the train passed as it approached them and it failed to whistle or give the statutory signal for the road crossing, by reason of which its presence was unknown to the men on the hand car, until they rounded the curve and were very near it. McIntosh filed suit to recover for his injuries, alleging negligence on the part of the section foreman and also on the part of the trainmen. The proof introduced on the trial by him tended to show the facts above stated. The evidence for the defendant tended to show that his injuries were not as serious as claimed by him, and that the proper signals were given for the crossing by the engineer as the train approached it. The jury found for the plaintiff in the sum of $650.

At the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence the defendant moved the court to instruct the jury peremptorily to find for it. The court overruled the motion, holding that the sole ground upon which he would submit the issue was as to whether or not "it was negligence for the freight train to approach the public crossing at the same time the section men did, without giving the statutory warning." The defendant then announced that it was surprised and was unprepared to meet the case on these views, and moved the court to set aside the swearing of the jury and grant it a continuance, which motion the court overruled. The ground of this motion, as we are informed in the brief, was that in overruling the demurrer to the petition filed by the defendant the court had held the petition good on the ground of the negligence charged on the part of the section boss and the defendant had prepared its case only on this ground. But there is nothing in the record showing that the court had misled the defendant in any way in its ruling on the demurrer at the previous term, and in the absence of evidence we must presume that he ruled correctly in overruling the motion to set aside the swearing of the jury or continue the case. The defendant made no showing that any proof could be had if the case was continued which it did not then have, and no affidavit was filed to show that the ends of justice required a continuance of the case.

At the conclusion of the evidence the court refused the following instruction asked by the plaintiff: "The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the section boss, Monroe Ray, by gross negligence ordered the hand car to be run from the place of work near Boxtown to Ilsey, without proper precaution to protect his crew from collision with trains, and if they further believe from the evidence that Charles McIntosh was with said crew and that he was injured in a reasonable effort to remove said car from the track to prevent a collision with a train, and they further believe from the evidence that said injury was the natural result of the said gross negligence, then the jury will find their verdict for plaintiff. Gross negligence as here used means the absence of slight care."

He then gave the following instruction, to which the defendant objected: "The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence, that the engine mentioned by the witnesses, approached a public road crossing near where plaintiff claims to have been injured without sounding its whistle or ringing its bell, and that by reason of a failure of the defendant's employes in charge of said engine to either ring the bell or blow the whistle while approaching said crossing, a hand car and section hands on same ran into dangerous proximity to the approaching train, which rendered it necessary for plaintiff and others to speedily remove said car from the track, and that plaintiff in assisting to remove said car from the track, and while exercising ordinary care for his own safety, was injured in his person or ruptured, and that such injury was the direct and proximate result of such failure by those in charge of the engine to blow the whistle or ring the bell on approaching the crossing, then the law is for the plaintiff, and the jury will so find."

It is insisted for appellant that, as to a section hand on a hand car, the failure of the train to whistle at a public crossing as required by the statute, is not negligence; that a section hand assumes the risk incidental to riding on hand cars, including the risk of being overtaken by a train; that the peril of throwing off the hand car was one of the ordinary risks of the service which was assumed by the plaintiff; and that the hernia suffered by him was not the natural or proximate result of the negligence of the defendant. It is also insisted that the instruction given by the court is not warranted by the allegations of the petition.

Section 786, Kentucky Statutes, requires that each locomotive shall have a bell and whistle, and that outside of incorporated towns the bell shall be rung or whistle sounded for a distance of at least fifty rods from the place where the railroad crosses at grade any public highway, and that the bell shall be rung or whistle sounded continuously, until the engine has reached such highway crossing. Section 793 provides a penalty for a violation of the statute, and by section 466 a person injured by violation of the statute may recover from the offender such damages as he may sustain by reason of the violation, although a penalty for the violation is thereby imposed. In Cahill v. Cincinnati, &c., R. R. Co., 92 Ky., 345, it was held that the failure of a railroad train to give the signal of its approach to a public crossing, is negligence as to one at a private crossing near by, and thus lawfully upon the track. This case has been followed in subsequent cases and the principle thus decided seems to apply equally to persons on a hand car, rightfully using the track, as to one on a private crossing. (L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Servant, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 1576; L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Bodine, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 147; Wilmuth v. I. C. R. R., 25 Ky. Law Rep., 671.)

A section hand assumes the risks incidental to riding on a hand car where ordinary care is used in its management; but he does not assume the risk incidental to the gross negligence of the section foreman in running the hand car. It is the duty of the section foreman not to expose his men to risks of collisions with trains, thus imperilling their lives, without exercising proper precautions for their safety. In the case before us he was running on the time of the freight train. He stopped at Boxtown, and without taking any precautions for the safety of his men, instead of waiting there for the train to pass, went on until he met the train. Such conduct warranted the jury in finding him guilty of gross negligence, and while the section men assume all risks incidental to ordinary negligence on his part, the company is liable for his gross negligence. (L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Collins, 63 Ky., 114; I. C. R. R. Co. v. Coleman, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 878; Cincinnati, &c., R. R. Co. v. Cooke's Adm'r, 113 Ky., 162.)

In Long's Adm'r v. Illinois Central R. R. Co., 24 Ky. Law Rep., 567, it was held that where the section foreman ordered his men to proceed with the hand car and one of them was killed in a collision by reason of his negligence, there could be a recovery, although he knew they were running upon the time of the train. The court said: "The section foreman, under whose direction he worked, represented the master and it was Long's duty to obey his orders in the usual course of business. When he received an order it was not his duty to sit in judgment upon its propriety, or to enter into a discussion with him as to the facts upon which it was based. He had a right to presume that improper orders would not be given, and to assume that the section foreman could not direct him to take risks that were improper. If he was injured while obeying the orders of his superior, and by reason of his negligence, he may recover, unless the risk was such that a person of ordinary prudence, situated as Long was, would not have taken it."

The court adheres to the rule thus laid down. In that case Long was killed and there might be a recovery under the statute for his death, if only ordinary negligence was shown. But in this case as death did not result, and the common-law rule declared by the court has not been changed by statute in cases where death does not result, there can be no recovery on account of the negligence of the section boss in operating the hand car unless gross negligence is found. The ordinary way of taking the hand car from the track was to unload it and then lift it off. In the case at bar, by reason of the proximity of the train, there was no time to unload the hand car, and when the section boss gave the order to take it off the track, it was, under the circumstances, an order to take it off as it was without unloading it, and to take it off quick, before the train reached it. It is a matter of common knowledge that hernia is liable to be produced by a sudden, violent strain, and the removal of the hand car loaded as it was, quickly from the track would naturally cause such a strain, especially as there were only four hand holds on the car for four men to lift it. The emergency requiring this strain which brought about the injury to appellee was due to the negligence of the foreman as well as to the want of signals of the approach of the train.

In I. C. R. R. Co. v. Langan, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 500, it was held that it is the duty of the railroad company to furnish its employes engaged in handling heavy weights adequate assistance to enable them to handle the weights with safety. In view of the emergency that was presented and the consequences that might have ensued to the train and to themselves from a collision by the train with the hand car, it was a question for the jury whether appellee exercised such care as might be ordinarily expected of a person of usual prudence situated as he was, and whether the injury that resulted to him in obeying the order of his superior was the natural and proximate result of the negligence of the defendant above referred to. The order of the boss was, in effect, an order to each of the men to remove the hand car from the track, and it was the duty of each of them, not to wait for another, but to seize the hand hold nearest to him and obey the order to avoid a collision. The circuit court erred in not submitting to the jury the question of gross negligence on the part of the section boss as above defined.

It remains to determine whether the allegations of the petition are sufficient to warrant the instruction given by the court as to negligence on the part of the trainmen.

In the original petition the plaintiff alleged that his injury was proximately caused by the gross negligence of the defendant's section boss in the operation of the hand car, and by the gross negligence of the trainmen in the operation of the engine and train approaching them. The defendant entered a motion that he make his petition more specific, and this being sustained, he filed an amendment alleging as to the train, that it was at the time being run in a rapid, reckless, negligent and dangerous manner, and without giving proper signals. The defendant filed a general demurrer to the petition, which was overruled, and without further motion filed an answer controverting its allegations. On the trial without objection, proof was given by the plaintiff as to the location of the crossing, and as to whether or not the train gave the statutory signals as it approached it. The rule in this court is that where a matter is defectively alleged and evidence is given on it by both the parties without objection on the trial, the court will treat the defective averment as cured by the proof. We would apply this principle here, but for the motion and statement made by the defendant at the close of the plaintiff's evidence, which shows that it did not understand that the case was rested on this ground, and was in effect an objection to the evidence. The allegation that the train was run without proper signals was a mere conclusion of law. A denial of it raised no issue of fact to be determined. Appellee can not complain of the speed of the train. The petition should have charged that the crossing was a public one sufficiently near by for the signals there to have apprised the men on the hand car of the approach of the train, in time to have avoided the disaster, and should have stated facts showing that the statutory requirement as to signals, was not complied with. In the condition of the pleadings, instruction 1 should not have been given. There is another objection to this instruction. The failure of the trainmen to whistle at the crossing was not the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury, although it was a link in the chain of circumstances causing it. If the foreman had not run his hand car negligently on the time of the train, there would have been no trouble from the failure to give signals of the approach of the train to the crossing. On the other hand, if these signals had been given, the consequences of his negligence might perhaps have been avoided. If the train had struck the hand car and injured the plaintiff, from either of these causes he would have a right of action, or if in jumping out of the way he had ruptured himself, when placed in peril either by the gross negligence of his foreman or by the negligence of the trainmen in not giving the signal, he might recover. But in the case at bar he got off the hand car after it was stopped and if nothing more had occurred, he would not have been injured. His injury was due, as one of his witnesses expresses it, to the fact that they had to throw the hand car right off and just had time to get out of the way when the train dashed by. This was done at the order of the section boss given after the train had passed the crossing, and it would seem that the rupture of the plaintiff might not have occurred but for the car's being loaded. The order of the section boss for them to throw the car off was proper to avoid a collision, but if by reason of the emergency thus negligently produced the plaintiff was injured in obeying the order of the second boss to prevent a collision or loss of life or property and his injury was the proxmate result of his obeying the order of his boss and was not due to negligence on his part in overstraining himself to get the car off, of which the jury are to judge, he may recover. On the return of the case to the circuit court the plaintiff will be allowed to amend his petition, and on another trial the court in lieu of the two instructions quoted will give one instruction as herein indicated.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for a new trial and further proceedings consistent herewith.

ILLINOIS CENTRAL R. R. CO. v. HEATH.

(Filed May 5, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Railroads—Putting off passenger at wrong station—Signing paper releasing damages—The appellee, with her four small children from three to twelve years of age, in coming from Mattoon, Ill., to Kentucky, was, by mistake of the conductor of appellant's train, put off the train at Caneyville, Ill.; instead of Caneyville, Ky., her destination. The conductor learning his mistake had her brought to Paducah, Ky., paying her board there and sent her to her home at Caneyville, Ky. While at Paducah she signed a paper in consideration of $2 paid her by the conductor, releasing him and the railroad company from all damages for being put off, which the company relied on as a settlement in her suit for damages. Held—That the evidence conclusively shows that she understood the paper when she signed it, and that no fraud was practiced in procuring her signature to it, and she not having been in any way injured, is bound by the settlement, and the court should have peremptorily instructed the jury to find for the defendant.

J. S. Wortham and Pirtle & Trabue for appellant.

J. C. Graham, Bennett H. Young and M. W. Ripy for appellee.

Appeal from Grayson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

On July 14, 1901, appellee purchased a ticket of appellant's station agent at Mattoon, Ill., for Caneyville, Ky. She had with her four children, aged twelve, nine, five and three years. When she reached Carbondale, Ill., she changed cars and boarded a mixed train composed of a sleeper, one day coach and a number of freight cars. This was after midnight. The conductor on that train took up her ticket. About 4 o'clock the next morning, and just before light, they reached a station called Caneyville, in Illinois. The conductor did not know there was such a station as Caneyville, Ky., and supposed he had reached the place where appellee was to get off. He went in the car and told her so, helped her to wake up the children and get off. He had overrun the station a little, and she and the children walked back to the platform. She objected to getting off, saying it did not look like Caneyville, but the conductor said it was Caneyville, and the place for her to get off. She says that she there said to the conductor that she wanted to go to Caneyville, Ky., and he was very crabbed to her, and rude, but this he denied. She stayed a while at the platform and then at the advice of a man there, walked with the children down to the next station, which is two and two-third miles off. This was a telegraph station; the agent telegraphed to the conductor; he looked at his tickets and found he had made a mistake; the plaintiff and her children were then put on the next train and carried to Paducah, Ky., reaching there in the afternoon. The conductor met them at the station, took them to his boarding house, gave them lunch, supper and lodging, and the next morning put them on the train for Caneyville, where they arrived safely. The conductor, when he met her at the station, apologized for his mistake, explaining how it had occurred, and at the boarding house again talked the subject over with her, saying that he regretted the mistake, and that he was afraid it would cause him to lose his job. He asked her what she had spent, she said 75 cents, and he then handed her a dollar, and proposed to pay her any reasonable sum that she would say to settle the matter. She then said if he would pay her one dollar more it would be all right. He drew up the following writing, which was twice read over to her in the presence of two witnesses, and she then signed it:

"Know ye all men by these presents that I, Martha J. Heath, and children, of Mattoon, Ill., for and in consideration of $2 in hand paid hereby release Oscar Craig, a conductor employed by the Illinois Central R. R., and the Illinois Central R. R. Co., from all damages incurred by myself and four children, by reason of Conductor Craig putting me off at wrong station by mistake.

"Witness my hand and seal this 15th day of July, 1901.

(Seal) "MRS MARTHA J. her x mark HEATH."

"MRS. MOLLIE CALISSE,
"MRS. MINNIE PERKINS,
"OSCAR CRAIG,
"Witnesses."

On January 18, 1902, she filed this suit to recover damages for her eviction from the train by the conductor at Caneyville, Ill. The defendant relied upon the written release above quoted, and she replied that the paper was obtained from her by fraud; that she could not read or write, and that she signed the paper in utter ignorance of its real contents or purpose, when she was suffering great mental distress, being unaccustomed to travel, illiterate, ignorant of law, and not knowing that she had a cause of action against the railroad company, her sole purpose being to render a kindness to the conductor and prevent his losing his employment. Her testimony in regard to the paper on the trial was as follows:

"Q. What did he say to you?"

"A. He says, are you the lady and the four children I set off last night in the dark? I says, I am the one; he says, I beg your pardon, it was all done through a mistake by me; he says, you will have to lay over here until 7 o'clock in the morning and I will pay your hotel fare; he says, have you had any dinner? I says, no, sir; well, he says, come and go with me to my hotel; he says, I am very sorry I did this. I went with him to the hotel and it was too late for dinner, and he went and got a lunch for me and my children; then I went up stairs to wash my little children, and while I was up there Mr. Craig came up into the room; he talked a little bit before he named anything, and then he says. I am very sorry I did this crime, and he says, if I ever get out of this I will never be guilty of any such again."

"Q. What did he say then?"

"A. He says it will cost me to lose my job for that; he says, have you got any money? I says, some."

"Q. How much money did you have?"

"A. I had between three and four dollars."

"Q. What did Craig then say?"

"A. He says, I can help you out some to get your children something to eat; he says, will $2 get you what you want?" I says, yes, sir. He says, well, I have paid your fare here, now will you please sign this writing in order for me not to lose my job. I was crying and in trouble, and I says, yes, sir."

"Q. Did he ask you to sign this paper so he would not lose his job?"

"A. Yes, sir."

"Q. Who was crying, he or you?"

"A. I was crying."

"Q. What was he doing?"

"A. Standing there begging me to sign this paper."

"Q. Did you sign it then or later on?"

"A. Later on."

"Q. Tell us all about this paper?"

"A. I washed my children and went down stairs; when I got down stairs he had a piece of writing wrote."

"Q. Was he waiting at the steps for you?"

"A. He was at the writing desk, I believe, in the hall."

"Q. Did he have the letter fixed up when you came down?"

"A. Yes, sir; but he tore up that piece and says to these women, I didn't get that right; he tore up one piece and wrote another, and he says, will you sign this? I says, I can't read nor write."

"Q. Was this paper read over to you?"

"A. He read over about him losing his job, but if it was anything else I don't remember it."

"Q. Did he read anything in that paper about letting the I. C. R. R. Co. out?"

"A. If he did, I have no recollection of it, because I didn't know I had anything against the railroad company."

"Q. Did you know at that time that you had any legal cause against the I. C. R. R. Co.?"

"A. No, sir, I did't know I did."

"Q. Did you understand this part, 'For and in consideration of $2 paid, I hereby release Craig, conductor on the I. C. R. R. Co., and the I. C. R. R. Co.,' did you understand at this time that you had any cause against the I. C. R. R. Co. why you should be releasing the railroad company?"

"A. I did not; no, sir."

"Q. Tell us why you signed that paper?"

"A. For sympathy for Mr. Craig. I thought he had treated me well after putting me off the train, and for sympathy to keep him from losing his job as he told me."

"Q. Did he tell you that?"

"A Yes, sir."

"Q. Was $2 all he gave you?"

"A. Yes, sir."

When this occurred she had gotten her ticket back, and was in Kentucky. She was hurt in no way, was under the influence of no anodyne, and from her own testimony, as well as the testimony of the other witnesses who were present, it is apparent that the conductor practiced no fraud on her at all; that the only thing he did was to treat her kindly and considerately, apologizing profusely for his mistake, and appealing to her womanly kindliness of heart to settle the matter and not cause him to lose his job, which he was obviously in great danger of doing. She was not overreached by the conductor, she simply allowed her feelings to induce her to return him kindness for kindness after he showed such regret for his mistake, and was so kind to her and the children in the strange city of Paducah. She understood that she was releasing the conductor when she signed the paper; but he was only the representative of the railroad company, and to release him and not release the railroad company would have been no service to him in holding his job. What he wanted was a release of the railroad company which would show the company that he had settled with the woman and fixed up the wrong which he had committed. Although appellee could not read or write, and although she was ignorant of travel or the ways of the world, her testimony on the trial shows that she is a woman of good common sense, and such a woman could not fail to understand that what the conductor wanted to settle with her was his wrongfully putting her off the train; and that any settlement to enable him to hold his job, or help him to hold it, must be a complete settlement. It is true she settled for a very inadequate consideration, but the amount of the consideration is not material, except as it may be a badge of fraud. But the facts here show plainly the entire want of fraud, and that the plaintiff fixed the amount to be paid herself low because she was touched by the kindness of the conductor and his apprehension that the transaction would get him also into serious trouble. Persons who make settlements can not be relieved from them because they do so upon an inadequate consideration from feelings of kindness in return for kindness shown. There being no fraud in the settlement, appellee was bound by it, and the court should have instructed the jury peremptorily to find for the defendant.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

1. Taxation—Domestic corporations—Refrigerator cars—In use out of State—Under section 4020, Kentucky Statutes, providing "that all real and personal estate within this State, and all the personal estate of persons residing in this State, and of all corporations organized under the laws of this State, whether the property be in or out of this State, shall be subject to taxation unless the same shall be exempt by the Constitution," and Id., section 4022, providing that "for the purposes of taxation, real estate shall include all lands within this State and improvements thereon, and personal estate shall include every other species and character of property," the appellee being a corporation organized under the laws of this State, all of its refrigerator cars which it leases out to various parties, whether in this State or out of it, are subject to taxation.

2. Constitution—Uniform taxation—Under section 171, Kentucky Constitution, providing that "taxes shall be uniform on all property subject to taxation within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax, and all taxes shall be levied and collected by general laws," does not limit the power of taxation to property actually within the territorial limits of the taxing jurisdiction. The subject matter of this section is uniformity, and it does not attempt to enumerate the subjects of taxation, but Id., section 172, does provide what property shall be taxed, viz, "All property not exempted from taxation by the Constitution shall be assessed for taxation."

3. Discrimination—Fourteenth amendment—Equal protection—The fact that all of appellee's cars are taxed, whether in this State or not, while in assessing the property of railroads the cars in use out of the State are omitted, is not an unjust discrimination against appellee, or in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Federal Constitution as to the "equal protection" of the law, as railroad corporations occupy an unique position in our fiscal system, and are, by the express language of the Constitution, taken out of the category of other property as to the manner in which they are to be taxed.

H. L. Stone and Samuel B. Kirby for appellants.

Forcht & Field, Humphrey, Burnett & Humphrey for appellee.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

The appellee, Union Refrigerator Transit Co., is a corporation organized under the laws of this Commonwealth, having its home office in Crescent Hill, Jefferson county, Kentucky, and its principal place of business in St. Louis, Mo. It is the owner of two thousand refrigerator cars, which it leases out to various parties needing them for the preservation of their goods while in transit throughout the United States, Mexico and Canada. These cars are about the value of $200 each.

This proceeding was instituted by the auditor's agent of Jefferson county, under section 4241, Kentucky Statutes, for the purpose of forcing appellee to list its cars for State and county taxation; this was resisted by the appellee before the county court, with the result that a judgment was rendered requiring it to list such a proportion of its cars as, under a system of averages, were shown to be used in the State of Kentucky during the fiscal year; the remainder were held not to be subject to taxation here. From this judgment, the Commonwealth appealed to the Jefferson Circuit Court where the judgment of the county court was affirmed. To reverse these judgments this appeal is prosecuted.

There is no complaint in this record of a want of regularity in the proceedings, the question for adjudication being, whether or not all of the cars owned by appellee, whether in or out of this State, are subject to taxation here. It is insisted by appellee that such of its cars as are used in foreign commerce, are not subject to taxation in Kentucky under the language of the statute; and that, if they are so taxable, then the statute is void, because violative of the State Constitution and of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Federal Constitution. Of these, in their order.

The following sections of the Kentucky Statutes are applicable to the subject in hand:

"Section 4020. All real and personal estate within this State, and all personal estate of persons residing in this State, and of all corporations organized under the laws of this State, whether the property be in or out of this State, including intangible property, which shall be considered and estimated in fixing the value of corporate franchises as hereinafter provided, shall be subject to taxation unless the same be exempt from taxation by the Constitution, and shall be assessed at its fair cash value, estimated at the price it would bring at a fair voluntary sale."

"Section 4022. For the purpose of taxation, real estate shall include all lands within this State and improvements thereon; and personal estate shall include every other species and character of property, that which is tangible as well as that which is intangible."

The slightest examination of these sections show that they leave nothing for construction. Appellee being a corporation organized under the laws of this State, its personal property, whether tangible or intangible, and whether in or out of the State, must be taxed here by the terms of the law. With the question of whether or not the modern tendency of legislative enactment and judicial construction is to trench upon the legal maxim mobilia sequuntur personam, we have nothing to do; and it may be, therefore, freely conceded, for the purposes of this case, that all that is said in this regard by counsel for appellee is true. Our State upholds and enforces the ancient fiction in all its original severity; and we do not understand that it is open to us to destroy, by construction, the integrity of a statute, the words of which are so plain that "he who runs may read." And whatever may be said as to the judicial utterances of other jurisdictions, our court has uniformly held, that for the purpose of taxation the situs of personal property of every description is the domicil of the owner. The case of Wren v. Boske, Sheriff, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 2d part, page 1780, presented this state of facts: The appellant, Wren resided in Scott county; he owned a farm in Kenton county, upon which he had horses, mules, cattle and sheep, which had been there for eight years. This personal property he listed with the assessor of Scott county, where he resided, but, notwithstanding this, it was assessed for taxation in Kenton county, and he instituted an action to restrain the sheriff of Kenton county from selling it for taxes. This court said: "It is conceded that the stock had obtained a situs in Kenton county, and if personal property in this State which has obtained a situs in a county other than that of the owner's residence, may be assessed in that county, although the owner gives it in for taxation in the county of his residence, then the judgment of the circuit court dismissing the plaintiff's petition is right. We are referred to a number of decisions holding that personal property of nonresidents of the State, which has obtained a situs in the State, may, if the legislature so provides, be taxed in that State, and the same rule no doubt would apply between the different counties of the same State if the legislature so provided. But the question after all is one of legislative intent."

The court then held that the property could only be taxed at the domicil of the owner.

In the case of Langdon Creasy Co. v. Trustees of Owenton Common School District, &c., 25 Ky. Law Rep., part 1st, page 823, it appears that the corporation had its domicil in Covington, Ky.; it also had a retail grocery store in Owen county, Ky., where its goods were sought to be taxed for local purposes. This court held, approving Wren v. Boske, Sheriff, that the personal property of the corporation was only taxable in the county of its residence. It was said: "As appellant corporation has a legal residence, and not being in the class of corporations which are required to report to the auditor, it must be assessed in the same manner as that of a natural person. It seems to us that there is no escape from this conclusion. The legislature has the unquestioned authority to fix the situs of property for the purpose of taxation. * * * The case of Wren v. Boske is made to turn upon the legislative intent, and this case is likewise made so to turn."

In the case of Gates v. Barrett, 79 Ky., 295, it is said: "In general, movable property is to be assessed for taxation at the place of the owner's residence." (Boske, Sheriff v. Security Trust and Safety Vault Co., 22 Ky. Law Rep., 181; Covington v. Wayne, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 826; City of Louisville v. Shirley, 80 Ky., 71.)

In Cooley on Taxation, 3d edition, volume 1, page 86. the rule is stated: "If a person is domiciled within the State, his personalty, in contemplation of law, has its situs there also, and he may be taxed in respect of it at the place of his domicil. * * * However, the maxim mobilia sequuntur personam is not of universal application, does not rest on any constitutional foundation, and gives way before express laws; and a State may, at its option, impose taxes on tangible personal property within its limits irrespective of the residence or allegiance of the owner, although this would not be true of property merely passing through the State and not having a situs therein."

Id., 673: "The proper place for the taxation of a corporation in respect of its personalty is the place of its principal office, unless some other rule is prescribed by statute."

In Burroughs on Taxation, page 186, the rule is thus stated: "A corporation is taxable for its personal property at its domicil, which is the State of its creation, and within that State, in the town where it has its principal office or place of business."

In the Am. and Eng. Encycl. of Law, 1st edition, volume 25, page 133, it is said: "In the taxation of personal property, two inconsistent doctrines often come into conflict, the one mobilia sequuntur personam, demanding that the property shall be taxed at the owner's domicil on the theory that personalty has no other situs; the other, that it should be taxed like real property, where it is situated. Ordinarily the first rule will prevail, and, as a general rule, personal property is taxable at the domicil of its owner. This is often so provided by statute. The State may, however, and often does, make it taxable at its actual situs. The fact that double taxation may result from the assessment in two States does not affect the validity of the assessment."

It is urged, however, that the statute which requires movable personal property, situated in a different jurisdiction, to be taxed at the domicil of the owner is invalid, as being in controvention of the provisions of section 171 of the Constitution, which is as follows: "The general assembly shall provide by law an annual tax, which, with other resources, shall be sufficient to defray the estimated expenses of the Commonwealth for each fiscal year. Taxes shall be levied and collected for public purposes only. They shall be uniform upon all property subject to taxation within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax, and all taxes shall be levied and collected by general laws."

It is said that the language "they shall be uniform upon all property subject to taxation within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax" limits the power of taxation to property actually within the territorial limits of the taxing jurisdiction. This, we think, is erroneous. The subject-matter of the language in question is uniformity. There is no attempt to enumerate the subjects of taxation. Nor can the language be read as if it was said that taxes shall be uniform upon all property within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax. The language is, that taxes shall be "uniform upon all property subject to taxation," leaving the question as to what property is subject to taxation undetermined. Section 172, however, does provide what property shall be taxed. It is as follows: "All property, not exempted from taxation by this Constitution, shall be assessed for taxation at its fair cash value, estimated at the price it would bring at a fair voluntary sale." * * * This language needs no construction, and it requires that all property of which the State has jurisdiction, except that which is exempted, shall be taxed; and, instead of limiting the subjects of taxation to personal property having an actual situs within the territorial limits, the section extends the zone of taxation, until it equals that of jurisdiction.

Nor can it be maintained that the statute is invalid for the reason that it denies to the owners of such personal property "the equal protection of the laws." This precise question arose in the case of Coe v. Errol, 116 U. S. Rep., 524. There the question was, whether certain logs, which were situated within one State, could be taxed therein, when they were also taxed in the State where the owner resided. And it was said by the court: "We have no difficulty in disposing of the last contention of the question, namely, the fact (if it be a fact) that the property was owned by persons residing in another State; for, if not exempt from taxation for other reasons, it can not be exempted by reason of being owned by nonresidents of the State. We take it to be a point settled beyond all contradiction or question, that a State has jurisdiction of all persons and things within its territory, which do not belong to some other jurisdiction; such as the representatives of foreign governments with their houses and effects, and property belonging to or in the use of the government of the United States. If the owner of personal property within a State resides in another State which taxes him for that property as part of his general estate attached to his person, this action of the latter State does not in the least affect the right of the State in which the property is situated to tax it also. It is hardly necessary to cite authorities on a point so elementary. The fact, therefore, that the owners of the logs in question were taxes for their value in Maine, as a part of their general stock in trade, if such fact were proved, could have no influence in the decision of the case, and may be laid out of view."

In the case of Blackstone v. Miller, 188 U. S. Rep., 202, the question for adjudication was, whether a law which taxed the succession to a tangible chattel at the situs of the chattel was valid, when it appeared that the same subject was taxed at the domicil of the owner. The court said: "To come closer to the point, no one doubts that succession to a tangible chattel may be taxed wherever the property is found, and none the less that the law of the situs accepts its rules of succession from the law of the domicil, or that by the law of the domicil the chattel is a part of a universitas and is taken into account again in the succession tax there. * * * No doubt this power on the part of two States to tax on different and more or less inconsistent principles, leads to some hardship. It may be regretted, also, that one and the same State should be seen taxing, on the one hand according to the fact of power, and on the other, at the same time, according to the fiction that, in succession after death, mobilia sequuntur personam and domicil governs the whole. But these inconsistencies infringe no rule of constitutional law."

In the case of Kidd v. Alabama, Id., 730, the question was, whether or not the fiscal laws of Alabama, which undertook to tax shares of stock in railroads held by residents of the State (the railroads being situated in other States), were inimical to the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. In answering the argument that they were invalid, the court said: "We say that the State, in taxing stock, may take into account the fact that the property and franchises of the corporation are untaxed, whereas in other cases they are taxed; and we say untaxed because they are not taxed by the State in question. The real grievance in a case like the present is that, more than probably, they are taxed elsewhere. But with that the State of Alabama is not concerned. No doubt it would be a great advantage to the country, and to the individual States, if principles of taxation could be agreed upon which did not conflict with each other, and a common scheme could be adopted by which taxation of substantially the same property in two jurisdictions could be avoided. But the Constitution of the United States does not go so far. * * * The State of Alabama is not bound to make its laws harmonize in principle with those of other States. If property is untaxed by its laws, then for the purpose of its laws the property is not taxed at all."

These opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States not only clearly recognize the right of the State to enforce the maxim mobilia sequuntur personam in fiscal matters in its original vigor, but they clearly deny that, in so doing, it contravenes the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

It is said that the fact that all of appellee's cars are taxed, whether in this State or not, while in assessing the property of railroads, the cars in use out of the State are omitted, is an unjust discrimination against it, and is violative of the Fourteenth Amendment as to the "equal protection" of the laws. Railroad corporations occupy an unique position in our fiscal system. They are, by the express language of the Constitution, taken out of the category of other property as to the manner in which they are taxed; but, in so doing, it is not intended to violate the fundamental principle of the Constitution as to uniformity in taxation, but on the contrary, to enforce and secure it; and it is confidently believed that the system devised does accomplish the end desired as nearly as may be. We will not burden this opinion with any attempt to show the reasons for the distinction in the fiscal law as to railroads, nor the fact that they are not unduly favored in their isolation; these are obvious, and this court has uniformly upheld the validity of the statutes which provides and enforces the anomalous mode of taxation applicable to them. Kidd v. Adams, supra, and the Kentucky Railroad Tax Cases, 115 U. S. Rep., 321, are conclusive of the Federal question.

GAMBREL v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed May 6, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Criminal law—Instructions—Upon the trial of appellant upon an indictment which charged him and others with "unlawfully confederating and banding themselves together for the purpose of intimidating, alarming, disturbing and injuring" M. and others, it appears from the evidence that in passing along a public highway, appellant and party were attacked by a dog when they fired at it and were fired upon by persons in the house, and in turn fired themselves at the persons who shot at them, the court erred in failing to give the whole law of the case, and should have further instructed the jury that if they believed from the evidence that if appellant and his party, without any purpose to intimidate, alarm or injure Mrs. M. or others of her family, while passing her residence, were attacked by a bull dog in the public road, and shot him to prevent his biting them, and were then fired upon by persons in the house or yard, which fire they returned, believing it was necessary to do so to protect themselves from injury or apparent injury, such shooting on the part of appellant did not authorize his conviction.

J. M. Robinson for appellant.

N. B. Hays and Lorraine Mix for appellee.

Appeal from Knox Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

The appellant, Galloway Gambrel, was indicted in the Knox Circuit Court, jointly with Nelson Gambrel, Silas Gambrel, John Taylor and Jacob Taylor for the crime of "unlawfully confederating and banding themselves together for the purpose of intimidating, alarming, disturbing and injuring" Margaret Messer and others; and having been accorded a separate trial, appellant was found guilty by the jury, and his punishment fixed at confinement in the penitentiary for one year.

He complains that his conviction was illegal, and asks that the judgment of the lower court be reversed and a new trial granted him. One of the grounds for a new trial in the lower court, and now urged for a reversal, is that that court erred in refusing to peremptorily instruct the jury upon the conclusion of the Commonwealth's evidence, to find the appellant not guilty. It appears from the bill of evidence that appellant and his brothers, Nelson and Silas Gambrel, after attending a log rolling at the home of their father, started together and in company with the wife of Silas Gambrel, about dark, to go to Silas Gambrel's home, in doing which they had to pass the residence of Margaret Messer, who lived upon the public road. When they reached the house of Mrs. Messer, one or more of the party fired two or three pistol shots out in the road near the house at a dog, which howled and ran into the yard, and was found the next morning near the house with a bullet hole in his back, dead. Other shots were then fired from the house of Mrs. Messer and by the Gambrels out in the road. The only persons in the Messer house were C. T. Messer and one Hubbard, the latter being somewhat sick and in bed. Margaret Messer was then only a short distance from home, on her return from Barbourville, where she had been that day on horse back. When the shooting began, A. Messer, who lived near his mother, and a man by the name of Hart, who was at his home, ran to the residence of Margaret Messer. The shots from the Messer house were fired by C. T. Messer, A. Messer and Hart at the persons who were shooting from the road. On the following morning bullet holes were found in the Messer dwelling smoke-house, wellhouse, and a tree in the yard. According to the evidence, from twenty to fifty shots altogether were fired.

The witnesses all agreed that not less than two shots were fired out in the road before the dog howled. Some of the Commonwealth's witnesses say three shots were heard by them just before or about the time the dog howled. It is evident that these shots, whether there were two or three of them, were fired at the dog. The shooting that followed the howling of the dog was, as already stated, done by those in the house or yard, and the Gambrels out in the road. All the parties on the ground were armed with pistols, except Hubbard, the sick man, and the wife of Silas Gambrel. The evidence is conflicting as to whether the shooting that occurred after the dog was wounded was commenced by the persons in the house or yard, or those out in the road. Two or three of the Commonwealth's witnesses testified that the house was shot at by the Gambrels before any shooting was done from the house or yard. Upon the other hand, appellant and his associates testified that none of them shot into the yard or toward the house until after they were shot at from the house or yard. They further testified that they were peaceably passing the Messer house when they were attacked by the Messer dog out in the road; that the dog belonged to the breed known as the bull dog, and was a very large, strong and vicious animal; that when he attacked the Gambrel party, appellant attempted to keep him from biting by kicking him, to which the dog seemed to pay no attention; thereupon appellant, to prevent himself and party from being bitten and maimed or killed by the dog, and for no other reason, according to his testimony, shot at him twice with his pistol, the last of which shots struck and wounded the animal, and caused him to howl and flee toward the house. Appellant and his brothers and the wife of Silas, also testified that after the shooting of the dog they were shot at by persons in the Messer house and yard, whose fire they returned, but only in their necessary self defense, and for the purpose of protecting themselves from death or great bodily harm.

Thus it will be seen that it is hard to determine from the evidence whether the shooting on the night in question after the wounding of the dog, was commenced by the Gambrels or the Messers. The matter was a question of fact that should have been and was properly left to the determination of the jury. The only evidence relied upon by the Commonwealth as tending to show that there was a confederating or banding together of the appellant and his brothers for the unlawful purpose of intimidating, alarming or injuring the Messers, or any of them, was that for several years there had existed ill will between the Gambrels and the Messers, though it was not proved that there had been any fighting or other trouble between them. Also that each of the Gambrels was armed with a pistol on the night of the shooting. In addition, two or three of the Commonwealth's witnesses testified that they found, on the morning after the shooting, a place in the bushes near the Messer house where a horse appeared to have been hitched or standing. They judged it to be a gray horse because of the gray hair found on the bushes at the place, and no doubt inferred that the horse had been hitched because of the many tracks appearing to have been made by a horse confined to a limited space. In addition, it was stated by Taylor, a Commonwealth's witness, that he saw the Gambrels that night before they reached the Messer house; one of them asked him to go with them, at which time one of the party was riding or leading a gray horse. But the Gambrels all testified that none of their party had a gray horse, and that there was but one horse with them on that occasion, a bay mare, that was ridden by the wife of Silas Gambrel. They further testified that the mare was not hitched near the Messer house that night; that she became frightened when the shooting began; that she threw her rider, Mrs. Silas Gambrel, to the ground.

We very much doubt whether the evidence relied on by the Commonwealth as showing the alleged confederating and banding together of the defendants named in the indictment, for the purpose of intimidating or injuring the Messers, was sufficient to establish that fact; but it will not do to say there was no evidence whatever on that point, and the trial court was not authorized to give a peremptory instruction unless there was a total failure or absence of proof. We are of opinion, however, that the trial court in instructing the jury failed to give the whole law of the case. In addition to the instructions given, the jury should have been further instructed by the court that if they believed from the evidence that appellant and his brothers, without any purpose to intimidate, alarm or injure Mrs. Messer or others of her family, while passing her residence on the way to the home of Silas Gambrel, were attacked by the Messer bull dog in the public road, and they shot him to prevent his biting some of the party, and were then fired upon by persons in the Messer house or yard, which fire they returned, believing at the time, and having reasonable, or apparently reasonable, grounds to believe, that it was necessary for them to do so in order to protect their lives or persons from injury, or apparent injury, at the hands of such persons, then such shooting on the part of appellant or those with him did not authorize the conviction of appellant under the charge in the indictment, and the jury should so find.

Wherefore, for the failure of the court to properly instruct the jury as indicated, the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with directions to the lower court to grant appellant a new trial and for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Whole court sitting.

ILLINOIS CENTRAL R. R. CO. v. JONES' ADM'R.

(Filed May 6, 1904.)

1. Federal court—Jurisdiction of, in removable cases from State court—To give the United States Circuit Court jurisdiction of a suit begun in the State court between citizens of different States, and where the amount in controversy is over $2.000, the petition for removal must affirmatively show such facts (not legal conclusions) or the facts must otherwise affirmatively appear in the record, entitling the petitioning defendant to have the case removed. Otherwise the Circuit Court of the United States will not acquire jurisdiction of the case for any purpose. Its jurisdiction depends not only upon the existence of such facts, but upon their being affirmatively shown upon the face of the record when the removal is sought. The Federal court has no jurisdiction to hear evidence as to additional facts in order to give it jurisdiction, where the record did not affirmatively show a removable case when the motion was acted on in the State court.

2. Same—Practice—Such facts properly pleaded must be taken as true by the State court. It has jurisdiction to adjudge whether such facts show a removable cause, but not as to whether such facts are true. The decision of the latter question is exclusively within the jurisdiction of the Federal court.

3. Same—Appeal—From the judgment of the State court ordering such removal, an appeal will lie to the Court of Appeals.

4. Same—Jurisdiction of, can not be conferred by consent—Where necessary jurisdictional facts do not appear on the face of the record, no presumption of their existence will be indulged. Nor can such jurisdiction be conferred by consent; nor can the lack of jurisdiction be waived by appearance, or motion, or even a trial on the merits.

5. Case overruled—Stephenson v. I. C. R. R. Co., 25 Ky. Law Rep., 442, in so far as in conflict with this opinion, overruled.

6. Master and servant—Negligence—Flying switch—To make a flying switch, forbidden by the rules of a railroad company because dangerous to those engaged in it, in such manner as to disregard the safety of the brakemen doing the work, and by failing to exercise ordinary care to avoid injuring them, is actionable negligence on the part of the master and the superior servants ordering and permitting the work, although the brakeman voluntarily engaged in it.

7. Same—Contributory negligence—If the brakeman doing such work was himself guilty of negligence, but for which the injury would not have occurred, he can not recover damages for his injury, unless those in charge of the train knew of his danger in time to avoid it, in which event his contributory negligence is immaterial.

8. Same—Instructions—An instruction submitting the question of plain-tiff's contributory negligence as above defined, but adding that if the defendnat did not know of plaintiff's danger, but might have known of it in time to avert it by the exercise of ordinary care, is erroneous. Defendants were not bound to anticipate that the servant might be negligent. They were, therefore, not bound to be diligent to ascertain whether by his negligence he was in danger.

E. H. James, F.A. Wilson, John C. Gates, P. H. Darby, J. M. Dickinson and Pirtle, Trabue & Cox for appellants.

Hendricks & Miller and Mulloy & Utley for appellee.

Appeal from Lyon Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

On a former appeal, we held that the petition by appellant Illinois Central R. R. Co. for the removal of this cause into the United States Circuit Court did not show, nor did the whole record show on its face, a separable controversy, and, therefore, that the lower court did not err in refusing to order the removal. After the motion for removal had been overruled in the State court, appellant filed a transcript of the record in the United States Circuit Court for the district of Kentucky at Paducah. Appellee appeared in that court and moved to remand the case. The order of the court overruling the motion to remand recited that it was upon evidence heard. What the evidence was, the record does not show. Time was given by the order in that court to appellee to file a bill of exceptions, and to the defendant to file its answer, and to the plaintiff, appellee, time thereafter in which to reply. At a subsequent term of that court appellee appeared, and dismissed his petition without prejudice. In the meantime the case in the State court was being proceeded with. Upon the return of the case from this court, appellant offered to file a supplemental answer, alleging the filing of the transcript in the U. S. Circuit Court, and the various steps taken therein, including the dismissal of the petition without prejudice. The court refused to permit the amendment, or the exhibits, copies of the proceedings in the Federal court, to be filed. This action is one of the grounds now urged for a reversal of the judgment.

Appellant contends that as there was but the one action, when it was removed into the U. S. Circuit Court by the filing of the transcript, and by the overruling in that court of the motion to remand, thereafter an appearance by the plaintiff (appellee) was a waiver of the question of jurisdiction over his person, if there was such question, and the subsequent dismissal of the action without prejudice was actually a dismissal of the identical action now being tried. On the other hand, appellee contends that unless the United States Circuit Court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter, to wit, a controversy involving more than $2,000 wholly between citizens of different States, or was separable so that when separated it would constitute such an action, jurisdiction could not be conferred upon that court, by waiver or consent; that, therefore, all proceedings there were void.

Under the act of congress (sections 2 and 3, Act of March 3, 1875, chapter 137, sections 1-10, as amended, 1887, 1888), if the petition for removal be filed in the State court in due season, and be accompanied by sufficient bond and motion, and if the petition states facts showing, or if it and the record together then show a prima facie right to the removal by the petitioner, it is the duty of the State court to proceed no further than to satisfy itself as to the sufficiency of the bond. The proper practice then is for the other party, if dissatisfied, to controvert in the Federal court the facts alleged in the petition for the removal, and have the case then remanded if improperly removed. If the State court orders this removal upon an insufficient petition, the party aggrieved may also prosecute an appeal at once to the State Appellate Court to have the order reviewed.

In recent years the right of removal has been more frequently and stubbornly resisted. And without doubt artful subterfuges have been resorted to by pleaders to control the question of jurisdiction. When that question depends upon a fact properly made an issue, the ascertainment of such facts is necessarily within the sole jurisdiction of the United States Courts, and their determination of jurisdictional facts is conclusive, binding alike upon the parties and State courts. If the facts properly alleged in the petition for removal of this case showed such a separable controversy between appellant, railroad company, a citizen of Illinois, on the one side, and appellee, a citizen of Kentucky, on the other, which could and ought to be tried without regard to the presence of, or right to have, either of the other defendants joined in the suit, then the Federal court had jurisdiction of this case. But whether upon the facts stated in the petition and record there was presented a Federal case, was within the jurisdiction of the State court to adjudge. (Kansas City &c., R. R. Co. v. Daughtry, 138 U. S., 298; McDonald v. Salem Capital Flour Mill Co., 31 Fed., 577; Burlington C. R. & N. Ry. Co. v. Dunn, 122, U. S., 513; Stone v. South Carolina, 117 U. S., 430.)

While the State courts can not inquire whether the facts alleged in the petition for removal are true, yet, when the petition for removal and the record do not show a prima facie right to the removal, the State courts may refuse to surrender the case, and will proceed to its trial. Filing a copy of the record in the Federal court upon such an insufficient petition does not, in our opinion, give the latter court jurisdiction to try the question of jurisdictional facts. If both the State and Federal courts could try the same facts as to jurisdiction, different conclusions might be reached, and unseemly conflict and confusion result. To avoid these, the congress has wisely made the condition of the Federal court's jurisdiction to depend upon the filing in the State court in due time of a petition, in which, according to the unbroken current of the decisions of the Federal courts construing the act, all necessary facts to show prima facie a right in the petitioner for the removal must be set out, not as conclusions of law; or, such necessary facts must affirmatively and explicitly appear elsewhere in the record when the application to the State court for the removal is made. (Crehore v. Ohio, &c., R. R. Co., 131 U. S., 240; Freeman v. Butler, 39 Fed., 1 (opinion by Barr, district judge); Seddon v. Virginia T. & C. S. & I. Co., 36 Fed., 6; Jackson v. Allen, 132 U. S., 27; Smith v. Horton, 7 Fed., 270; Amory v. Amory, 95 U. S., 186; Weed Sewing Machine Co. v. Smith, 71 Ill., 204; Chester v. Chester, 7 Fed., 1; Burlington, &c., Ry. Co. v. Dunn, 122 U. S., 517; Railway Co. v. Ramsey, 22 Wall., 322; Grace v. American Central Ins. Co, 109 U. S., 278; Gold W. & W. Co. v. Keyes, 96 U. S., 199; Carson v. Dunham,

The truthfulness of these facts may then, and not till then, be inquired into in the Federal court. As the petition for the removal and the record in this case did not in our opinion, state facts sufficient to confer jurisdiction upon the United States Circuit Court, that tribunal had not the right to inquire into their truthfulness, nor to hear evidence as to other facts not alleged in the record or the petition for removal, and by adding such evidence to the insufficient allegations, find the needed jurisdictional facts. Applying these principles to this case, the United States Circuit Court never had jurisdiction of this action for any purpose. Nor can such jurisdiction be conferred by consent, or appearance, or even a trial therein without objection on the merits of the case. (Pepper v. Fordyce, 119 U. S., 469; Mexican National R. R. Co. v. Davidson, 157 U. S., 201; Southword v. Reed, 36 Fed., 451; Kingsbury v. Kingsbury, 3 Biss., 60.; Re Hopkins, 18 Bank Reg., 389.)

The recent case of Stephenson v. I. C. R. R. Co., 25 Ky. Law Rep., 442, seems to be in conflict with the conclusion now reached, and the reasons assigned therefor. The question of jurisdiction herein discussed was not considered nor presented in that case. But in so far as it is in conflict with the principles of this opinion, it will no longer be regarded as authority. It follows that the ruling of the trial court was correct in refusing the amended or supplemental answer setting up the proceedings in the United States Circuit Court, as the matter thus attempted to be pleaded did not constitute a defense, and was wholly immaterial to the case. This suit charges appellant railroad company and the conductor and engineer of one of its trains, with negligently killing appellee's intestate. The negligent acts charged are, that in attempting a running or flying switch, appellees' intestate, a brakeman on the train, while uncoupling the cars to be switched off, was run over by being thrown under the cars, by the negligence of the company's engineer and conductor in starting up the engine too suddenly and without warning.

There was evidence to show that the train crew, with the concurrence of the engineer and conductor, were attempting what some of the witnesses called a flying or running switch. This was prohibited by a rule of the company because of its danger to those who engaged in it; that the decedent voluntarily took part will not alone prevent his recovery, if his superiors ordered it, and then negligently failed to take ordinary care required by the circumstances to avoid injuring him. To start the train suddenly and without warning, and without a signal from him while he was trying to uncouple the cars, whereby he was injured, presented a case of actionable negligence. Whether he was guilty of contributory negligence is not so clearly shown, though it should have been and was submitted to the jury. The motion for a peremptory instruction was properly overruled. But we are of opinion that the court erred in defining the law of contributory negligence to the jury. After telling them that if the decedent was himself at the time of his injury guilty of such negligence that but for it he would not have been injured, notwithstanding defendants' negligence, if they were negligent, yet the court said to the jury that if the defendants knew of decedent's peril, or by the exercise of ordinary care might have known of it, in time to avoid injuring him, then his contributory negligence was unavailing as a defense.

If the defendants knew of the peril of the decedent in time to have avoided injuring him, unquestionably his contributory negligence was immaterial. Appellants were not aware, so far as anything in the record shows, that decedent was between the cars, or was required to be between them. It merely showed that he was to uncouple and did uncouple, the two cars from the rear of the slowly moving train. This was done, or could have been done, by a lever worked from the side of the car. Whether he had unnecessarily and negligently gone between the cars, or was negligently leaning his weight on the front car when he was doing the work, is not shown to have been known to either the conductor or engineer. Nor were they required to suspect it and to look out for it. One is not bound to anticipate that another may be negligent.

For the error indicated the judgment is reversed and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

BURKS, &c. v. FERRIELL.

(Filed May 6, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Roads and passways—Where a road was changed from one side of a creek to another on account of washes, its use for a long period of years amounts to a dedication; and where the owner of land which it traversed sought to obstruct it so as to prevent its use by the public, the circuit court erred in not granting the prayer for the removal of the obstructions.

H. W. Rives for appellant.

Ben Spalding for appellee.

Appeal from Marion Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

In the month of October, 1903, the appellants, C. B. Burks, and five other citizens of Marion county filed their petition in equity in the Marion Circuit Court against appellee, alleging that they, as citizens of Marion county, had a special interest in the public county road known as the Greensburg and Bardstown road by the way of Hardin's creek; that when the Greensburg and Bardstown road by the way of Hardin's creek was established, and for some years thereafter, that portion between Burks' mill and the Hickory Camp Branch was located on the west bank of Hardin's creek and very close to the creek. But about fifty years ago the creek, by washes of its western bank, so encroached upon the road in places that public travel was forced to the eastern bank of the creek; that since that date this road on the eastern bank has been used by the public as a public highway and as a matter of public right, to shortly before the institution of this action. Within two months prior to the filing of the action, the appellee, actuated by an unlawful purpose and motive, and with the intent to stop public travel over this road, erected a fence directly across it, extending to and into the creek, and to further accomplish his unlawful purpose, felled a tree across the road. He alleged that many citizens in Marion and Washington counties, as well as themselves, had no other outlet than by this road to the church, depot and postoffice, and asked that the court grant an order directing these obstructions to be removed and enjoining the further obstruction of it.

The appleee denied that it was a public highway, but admitted the obstruction of it and claimed that he had a right to obstruct it. The evidence showed that the Greensburg and Bardstown road was established long prior to the civil war, and that this road in passing from Burks' mill to Hickory Camp Branch, a distance from a quarter to half mile, passed on the west bank of Hardin's creek and very close to it; that some time during the war the waters in the creek washed the west bank away and made it impossible for the traveling public to pass upon that side of the creek, and the travel crossed the creek and came down upon the east bank.

From the close of the war the surveyor with his hands, worked and kept up this road on the east bank to shortly before the bringing of this action. The persons owning the land on the east bank (the land which appellee owned and has now owned for about seven years), with their hands living on the lands, worked this road on the east bank under the surveyor of the road. If there was ever any order changing this highway from the west to the east bank, it was made prior to the close of the civil war, as the records were burned during the war. The evidence conduces to show that the persons owning this land prior to appellee's purchase assented to the change and by working upon the road, being called out by the surveyor, and doing this without any objection, is evidence of a dedication of it to the public; and the working of it by the surveyor and hands and the using of it by the traveling public, is evidence of an acceptance of it by the public. When both of these exist for more than fifteen years (in this case fifty years) the evidence of both the dedication and the acceptance is conclusive. See the case of Riley v. Buchanan, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 863, in which all the decisions in this State and in many other States are referred to and revived, and this case settles the questions involved herein.

The lower court seems to have erred upon the idea that it was necessary to show an order of the county court changing this road from the west to the east side of the creek, and that a public road could be established in no other way than by an order of the county court. In this, the lower court was mistaken as expressly decided in the case referred to. The court should have granted appellant's prayer and ordered the obstructions removed and enjoined appellee from further obstructing it.

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

BURKS v. FERRIELL.

(Filed May 6, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Criminal law—Mistake in warrant—Appellant, who made an affidavit for a warrant charging a certain offense, should not be held responsible for the mistake of the officer in issuing a warrant which charged another offense.

2. Same—Malicious prosecution—Where the evidence showed that one had probable cause for believing that another had committed a public offense, it matters not how malicious he was at a time he sought and secured a warrant of arrest for the latter, because if he had probable cause to believe that the offense had been committed, he can not be made responsible for taking out the warrant. If the law was otherwise it would be a great hindrance in enforcing the criminal law of the Commonwealth.

H. W. Rives for appellant.

Ben Spalding for appellee.

Appeal from Marion Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

The appellee filed his petition in the Marion Circuit Court in the month of October, 1903, in which he alleged that appellant, on the 31st of July, 1902, in Marion county, did wrongfully and maliciously, without legal authority or probable cause, procure a warrant of arrest to be issued against appellee by the police judge of the town of Lebanon, charging the appellee with having obstructed a passway by building a fence across same and cutting a tree across it; and that on the hearing and at the conclusion of the Commonwealth's testimony, the court dismissed the warrant; that he was greatly humiliated and distressed and damaged in the sum of $2,500.

The issues were made, a trial had and a judgment was rendered in favor of appellee against appellant for the sum of $200. The court refused to grant appellant a new trial and he has appealed. The evidence showed this state of case; that the Greensburg and Bardstown public road passed along Hardin's creek between Burks' mill to Hickory Camp Branch, a distance between a quarter and a half mile. This public road passed along the creek along the west bank until some time during the civil war when the waters of the creek washed away the west bank and the road. Then the travel turned across the creek and along the east bank between these two points. The owners of the land along the east bank appear to consent to it and they, with the other hands of that road precinct, worked this road on the east bank as the public highway. Appellee purchased this land about seven years prior to the institution of this action, and a few months prior thereto he set his fence out across this road and felled a tree across it, thereby stopping the public travel altogether. For further particulars as to this road see the opinion this day rendered in the case of Burks, &c v. Ferriell, ante, page 35.

When appellee obstructed this road, as stated, the appellant applied to the police judge of Lebanon for a warrant against appellee, and make an affidavit before this officer that appellee Ferriell had committed this offense of obstructing a public road by building a fence and cutting a tree across it. It appears that by some oversight, Thomas, the police judge, issued the warrant against appellee for obstructing a passway, and on the trial the county judge who tried the case, after hearing the evidence for the Commonwealth, entered an order dismissing the warrant for the reason that the proof showed that he had not committed the offense of obstructing a passway, but was guilty of the offense charged by the appellant in his adffiavit of obstructing a public road; and the judge, upon his own motion upon this evidence, issued a warrant for this offense. This warrant was, for some cause or defect, afterwards dismissed. Appellee, in his pleadings, expressly avowed that he did not claim any damages for the wrongful issual of the last warrant, but rested his claim for damages alone upon the wrongful, and malicious issual of the first warrant, charging the obstruction of a passway.

We are at a loss to understand upon what principle appellee can sustain his claim. His effort was to obtain a warrant for the obstruction of a public road and his affidavit so stated. The officer, by mistake, issued it for obstructing a passway and the appellant ought not be held responsible for the mistake of the officer. The evidence in this case, and as decided in another case between these same parties, shows that appellant not only had probable cause for believing that appellee had committed the offense charged, but he had actual grounds to believe it. as appellee was in fact guilty. It matters not how malicious appellant was at the time he sought and secured the warrant, if he had probable cause to believe that the appellee had committed the offense, he can not be made responsible for the conduct.

In Masker v. McCourt, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 1897, the court said: "Where one, through malice, procures a wararnt for the arrest of another, he is not liable to an action therefor if he acted on reasonable or probable cause." To the same effect is the case of Redman v. Stivers, 11 Ky. Law Rep., 428.

The dismissal of appellee on the trial of this warrant, did not relieve the appellee from proving on the trial of this case a want of probable cause on the part of appellant. See Lancaster v. Langston, 18 Ky. Law Rep., 2-9, in which the court said: "The fact that on the trial of the case, wherein the order of arrest was obtained, the judgment was for the defendant herein, does not create the presumption on the trial of this case that the suit was prosecuted maliciously and without probable cause. As the plaintiff must prove malice, the proof of the want of probable cause devolves on him. Even if appellee had actually been innocent of the offense charged, yet if appellant, when the warrant was obtained, had actually reasonable grounds to believe and did believe that appellee was giulty of the offense, he can not be mulched in damages for having procured the warrant. If the law was otherwise it would be a great hindrance and almost an impossibility to have the criminal law of the Commonwealth enforced. Individuals would be afraid to put the criminal law in motion for fear that they would be made responsible in damages, if perchance, it turned out that the party prosecuted was innocent.

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

HELLARD v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed May 6, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Homicide—Self-defense—Instructions—Abandonment of combat—It appearing from the evidence that appellant shot at deceased twice, with a pistol, as he passed defendant's house, about seventy-five yards off, that deceased, after firing at appellant with a gun, threw the gun down and walked to appellant's house, got his axe at the woodpile, went into his yard and ran him around the house once or twice, appellant as he ran fired two or three times, the last shot killing deceased. The court, in its instructions on self-defense, refused to qualify the instruction by adding thereto, "unless you believe from the evidence that defendant in good faith abandoned the difficulty or mutual combat, before he shot deceased." We think this was error. The court should have permitted the jury to determine whether or not appellant had, in good faith, given up the intention, if he had such, of further attempting to harm deceased.

C. C. Williams for appellant.

N. B. Hays and Loraine Mix for appellee.

Appeal from Rockcastle Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

The appellant was tried at the February, 1904, term of the Rockcastle Circuit Court on the charge of murder by shooting and killing one Abe Drew. He was convicted of the crime of voluntary manslaughter and sentenced to a term of twenty-one years in the penitentiary.

Appellant complains of the action of the lower court in refusing to allow him to prove by J. J. Drew, a cousin of the deceased, that when he went to Hellard's house after the dead body, he stated to R. M. Johnson and family, that from what Ralph Drew told him immediately after the shooting, Hellard ought to be acquitted; that he, witness, would have done the same thing that Hellard did. The court was right in refusing to allow this statement to go to the jury. It amounted only to an opinion of the witness and that formed from hearsay, which was clearly incompetent. The only witness introduced for the Commonwealth who professed to have been present at the killing, was Ralph Drew, a son of the deceased. He stated that he and his father were walking up the public road which passed appellants' house, and when about seventy-five yards from the house, they saw appellant chopping wood on the side of the road immediately in front of his house; that when appellant saw them coming, he at once went to his door and his wife handed him a pistol; that he then took a rest on the fence and fired two shots at the deceased; that deceased then took from witness a shot gun which he was carrying, cocked it and fired. Witness thought it went off accidentally. Then the deceased threw the gun down and walked slowly to appellant's gate, picked up the ax, went into appellant's yard after him, with the ax raised in a striking position, and ran him around the house once or twice. Appellant, as he ran, fired two or three shots at deceased, the last one killing him.

Appellant contended that the court erred in adding the following to the instruction on self-defense: "Unless you should further believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant sought and brought on the difficulty with the deceased, in which the shooting occurred, in the use, or the threatened use of a deadly weapon; or that the defendant and the deceased mutually and willingly entered into a combat with each other with deadly weapons, in either of which latter state of case, the defendant can not be excused on the grounds of self-defense."

We are of the opinion that the court did not err in making this addition to this instruction, but did err to appellant's prejudice, is not also adding, "unless you believe from the evidence that he, in good faith abandoned the difficulty or mutual combat before he shot Drew." (19 Ky Law Rep., 418.)

We are of the opinion that, under the proof introduced, it was prejudicial to the substantial rights of appellant not to give him the benefit of this addition to the instruction. According to Ralph Drew's testimony, after the appellant fired the two first shots, his father walked slowly the seventy-five yards, picked up the ax and entered appellant's yard, running him around his house when he fired the last two or three shots. From these facts, and others in the record not necessary to mention, we think the court should have permitted the jury to determine whether or not appellant had in good faith given up the intention, if he had such intention, of further attempting to harm the deceased. According to the theory of appellant and his witnesses, he had a clear case of self-defense. But we refrain from further discussing the evidence or expressing an opinion thereon for the reason that the case will have to be tried again.

Wherefore, the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

MESSER v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed May 6, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Indictment—Forgery—Two offenses charged—Demurrer—Where an indictment charges two offenses, one for forgery and one for uttering and publishing a forged instrument, a demurrer thereto should have been sustained and the attorney for the Commonwealth required to elect which of the offenses in the indictment he would prosecute.

Phillips & Fugate for appellant.

N. B. Hays and Loraine Mix for appellee.

Appeal from Knott Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The appellant, Flem Messer, was convicted and sentenced to the penitentiary for a term of two years under the following indictment found against him by the grand jury of Knott county, at the November term, 1903, of the Knott Circuit Court: "The grand jury of Knott county in the name and by the authority of the Commonwealth of Kentucky accuse Flem Messer of the crime of forgery committed as follows: The said defendant on the 10th day of November, 1903, in the county and circuit aforesaid did unlawfully, willfully, maliciously and feloniously forge William Roberts' name as presiding judge of the Knott County Court to an order directed to J. H. Amburgey, who was then clerk of the Knott County Court, directing said Amburgey to issue to said Messer a land warrant for one hundred acres of land; also forging said Roberts' name as judge of the Knott county court to a receipt for $5 in payment for the above-mentioned land warrant, he, the said defendant, uttering and publishing same to be true, when in fact each and both of said instruments were forgeries and fraudulent, and were so known to be by the defendant at the time, and the same was done for the purpose of perpetrating a fraud against the said Roberts and the Commonwealth of Kentucky, against the peace and dignity of the Commonwealth of Kentucky."

The defendant is charged in this indictment with three separate and distinct offenses. First, for forging the name of William Roberts as presiding judge of the Knott County Court to an order directing Amburgey, who was then clerk of the Knott County Court, to issue to defendant a land warrant for one hundred acres of land; second, with forging Roberts' name to a receipt for $5 in payment for the land warrant, and, third, with uttering and publishing as true each and both of these instruments. The instructions given to the jury closely follow the indictment, and authorize the conviction of defendant if the jury believe beyond a reasonable doubt that he was guilty of either of these separate offenses. They are as follows:

"Instruction No. 1. The court says to the jury that if they believe and find from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant, Flem Messer, in Knott county, Kentucky, and before the findling of the indictment herein, forged the name of William Roberts, as presiding judge of the Knott County Court, to an order directed to J. H. Amburgey, clerk of the Knott County Court, to issue a land warrant to the said Flem Messer, for one hundred acres of land, of date July 29, 1903, they will find him guilty and fix his punishment at confinement in the State penitentiay at hard labor for a period of years, so it be not less than two nor more than ten years, in the discretion of the jury.

"Instruction No. 2. The court says to the jury that if they believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant, Flem Messer, in Knott county, Kentucky, and before the finding of the indictment, forged the name of William Roberts, as presiding judge of the Knott County Court, to a receipt for $5, for a land warrant for one hundred acres of land in Knott county, Kentucky, they will find him guilty, and fix his punishment by confinement in the State penitentiary for any period of time, so it be not less than two nor more than ten years, in the discretion of the jury.

"Instruction No. 3. The court says to the jury that if they believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant, Flem Messer, in Knott county, Kentucky, and before the finding of the indictment herein, knowingly uttered and published as true and genuine the order and receipt referred to in instructions one and two, knowing at the same time that said order and receipt were forged, they will find him guilty, and fix his punishment by confinement in the State penitentiary for any period of years at hard labor, so it be not less than two years nor more than ten, in their discretion."

To each and all of these instructions the defendant objected and excepted.

Section 126 of the Criminal Code is as follows: "An indictment, except in the cases mentioned in the next section, must charge but one offense, but if it may have been committed in different modes and by different means, the indictment may allege the modes and means in the alternative."

Section 127 sets out the offenses which may be charged in one indictment.

Section 262 provides that convictions may be had for any degree of an offense charged in an indictment included in or lower than that charged. Section 263 specifies the degrees of offense referred to by section 262. While counsel for the State does not deny that forgery and uttering a forged instrument are separate and distinct offenses, and can not properly be joined in an indictment, and it has been so decided by this court (Huff v. Commonwealth, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 1064), he relies upon an unpublished opinion (Rawlings v. Commonwealth, a syllabus of which is found in 7 Ky. Law Rep., 595) as authority for the contention that as the indictment has but one count, and in the naming part thereof the only offense designated is forgery; that it only charges one offense, notwithstanding it also described the offense of uttering a forged instrument; and that the evidence being sufficient to support a conviction for forgery, the defendant was not prejudiced by the instructions given to the jury authorizing them to find him guilty if they believed he either forged or uttered the order or receipt. An examination of the manuscript opinion discloses the fact that a demurrer to the indictment was sustained in that case, and the language of the opinion relied on was pure dicta, and is, in our opinion, wholly unsound, misleading, and in direct conflict with section 126 of the Criminal Code. It has been held by this court in numerous cases that an indictment must name the offense charged, and that a conviction could be had only for the offense named. (Books v. Commonwealth, 98 Ky., 148; Commonwealth v. Tuckman, 17 Ky. Law Rep., 117; Miller v. Commonwealth, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 1238.) The demurrer to the indictment in this case should have been sustained, and the Commonwealth required to elect which of the offenses named in the indictment it would prosecute. (Clark v. Commonwealth, 55 Ky., 211; Commonwealth v. Monarch, 69 Ky., 299; Monti v. Commonwealth, 26 Ky., 132; Waddell v. Commonwealth, 84 Ky., 279; Commonwealth v. Perrigo, 60 Ky., 5; Huff v. Commonwealth, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 1065.)

For reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

FRANCIS, &c. v. MILLION, &c.

(Filed May 6, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Judicial sales—Purchase by joint owner—Liability to co-tenants—The fact that one of several heirs having a joint interest in a tract of land, bought it at public judicial sale at less than its real value, does not make the purchaser liable to have the excess between his bid and the actual value of the land, charged to him as an advancement, only in the distribution of any surplus of his father's or mother's undevised estate, if any.

2. Buying adverse claim—Public sale—Bad faith—Joint tenants—The fact that one bought at public sale an adverse claim to a tract of land in which he and his sister owned a joint interest, will not vitiate the sale in the absence of an allegation of fraud or bad faith in the purchaser, although he bought such interest at less than its real value; and the fact that the purchaser sold the land at an advance of $2,000 a year later, proves nothing against the good faith of his purchase.

3. Joint tenants—Counsel fees—Costs—Section 489, Kentucky Statutes, which allows the recovery of costs and fees and other expenses by one joint owner against others having interests in common with them, but who did not appear, or have counsel in the case, applies only to actions brought for the recovery of property by such joint owners, or suits for the settlement of estates. It does not apply to expenses incurred in defending the joint title in unsuccessful suits brought by others.

Grant E. Lilly for appellants.

Geo. C. Webb for appellees.

Appeal from Madison Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

This case grows out of Cunningham v. Estill, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 559. It was there held that appellants Mrs. Cunningham and Mrs. Francis, and appellee Wallace Estill, the three children of Jonathan T. Estill, became vested in remainder with the fee to the residue of a certain tract of land, after selling enough to pay Jonathan T. Estill's debts. This suit was brought by a judgment creditor of Wallace Estill to subject his undivided one-third of the land to the payment of the plaintiff's judgment debts. Mrs. Cunningham and Mrs. Francis interpleaded and defended, claiming that Wallace Estill was not entitled to a third of the land, for the following reasons: First, that their father had colluded with Wallace when a portion of the original tract had been sold in the suit to settle Jonathan T. Estill's assigned estate, by reason of which Wallace had bought in that portion therein sold, viz., 112 acres at $2,000 less than its actual value; that that sum should, therefore, be charged to Wallace as an advancement, and should be deducted from his one-third in the remainder of the land; second, that Wallace, as joint owner, held a fiducial relation toward his sister, and could not, without their consent, acqu're a hostile title to this land; third; that in a suit brought by the sisters against their father and his assignee, Smith (the case of Cunningham v. Estill, supra), they had incurred certain expenses, including counsel fees in recovering and defending the common title, for the benefit of the three, and that Wallace Estill's part of the land should be charged with one-third of such costs.

As to the first proposition, it can not be regarded as an advancement in any event. For whatever may have been the purpose of the parties, the advantage, if any, gained in the matter by Wallace Estill could be charged against him as an advancement only in the distribution of any surplus of his father's or his mother's undevised estate. This estate in suit is not one inherited by Wallace Estill from any person. It is an estate by purchase, derived by the deed between Jonathan T. Estill and his wife, the one discussed in the Cunningham case above cited. It is also claimed that Wallace Estill was a joint tenant with his sister in the remainder estate in this land, and that he will not be allowed to profit at their expense by buying in an adverse claim to the common title. Conceding this to be true, there is no sufficient allegation of fraud or bad faith on his part to vitiate the transaction. He bought at a public competitive sale, made by the court's commissioner. The sale was duly reported to and confirmed by the court. A mere statement that he bought it for less than its actual value, is not enough. The best test of actual market value is a sale on the market under circumstances calculated to elicit full and free bidding by intending purchasers. Opinions as to what a thing would bring are necessarily less convincing as to its value than the fact of what it did bring. There is no sufficient allegation to detract from the presumption that the officers of the court did their full duty, and that the sale was a fair one.

The fact alone that the purchaser sold the land a year later for an advance of $2,000 proves nothing against the good faith of the first sale. Besides, appellants waited for nearly thirteen years before claiming any benefit of that transaction, or offering to share with their brother the burden imposed by his purchase. "Equity aids the diligent, not the slothful."

The circuit court held that appellants were entitled to be reimbursed by one-third of their expenses, including counsel fees, in the Cunningham suit to establish the common title. But the court refused to allow an item for counsel fees incurred by appellants in resisting the enforcement of a lien for the fees of attorneys in the Cunningham suit. Appellants were sued for $3,300, as counsel fees in establishing the title in the suit of Cunningham v. Estill. By defense the claim was reduced to $2,200. In conducting this defense the fee in question was incurred. It is claimed by appellants that appellee Wallace Estill's interest in the land should be charged with one-third of that fee, as he got the benefit of the defense.

Section 489, Kentucky Statutes, which allows the recovery of costs, and fees and other expenses by one coparcener or joint owner against others having interests in common with them, but who did not appear or have counsel in the case, applies only to actions brought for the recovery of property by such joint owners, or suits for the settlement of estate. It does not apply to expenses incurred in defending the joint title in unsuccessful suits brought by others.

Judgment affirmed.

WEBER v. GARDINER.

(Filed May 6, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Homestead—Execution levy thereon and sale—The levy of an execution and sale of a house and lot owned and occupied as a homestead by the execution debtor, creates a lien thereon subject to the owner's right of occupancy during her life, and the purchaser can only acquire the title thereto by paying the occupant $1,000 and satisfying the prior liens thereon for purchase money, taxes, etc.

2. Same—In an action by the owner to set aside a sale of her homestead made under an execution against her, it was error in the lower court to set aside the sale and adjudge that no lien was thereby created, though such lien was subordinate to the value of appellee's homestead and the liens for purchase money, taxes, improvements, etc., yet unpaid; and upon return of the case appellant should be allowed, by proper pleading, to bring the lienholders before the court, that their liens may be enforced. But in the event the appellant should decline to demand a sale of the house and lot, or to bring the lien holders into court for that purpose, the chancellor may again enter judgment quashing the sale and appellant's lien, and dismiss her petition.

W. T. Burch for appellant.

Samuel Avritt for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

The appellee, Isabella Gardner, owns a small house and lot in the city of Louisville, which she purchased in 1892 at a cost of $2,050. In the year 1900 she became indebted to the appellant, Wilhelmina Weber, to the amount of $152.68.

In the year 1901 appellant instituted suit against appellee to recover the debt mentioned, and shortly thereafter obtained judgment therefor, upon which she caused an execution to issue, which was levied by the sheriff upon the house and lot of appellee. The property was duly appraised at $1,600, and soon after sold by the sheriff in satisfaction of the execution, appellant becoming the purchaser at the amount of the execution debt, which was then $190.95. At the time of the sale appellee was residing upon the lot, and claiming it as a homestead, and had continuously so occupied and claimed it ever since the year 1893. But the lot not being divisible, a homestead was not set apart to her by the sheriff, before or at the time of the execution sale, nor was there $1,000, or any other sum, paid to her in lieu of a homestead.

No steps were afterward taken by appellant either to obtain a deed to, or the possession of the property, or to enforce a lien thereon by virtue of the execution sale. But on March 24, 1908, this action was instituted by appellee to set aside the sale made of the house and lot under appellant's execution, and such lien, if any, as the latter may have acquired thereby, upon the ground, as alleged, that she is entitled to a homestead in the property of $1,000, she being a bona fide housekeeper with a family; that the property is not worth exceeding $1,600, and further that there are liens thereon for unpaid purchase money, taxes and repairs, aggregating $983. The averments of the petition were denied by the appellants' answer, and in addition, it was alleged therein, that appellee had, after the debt of appellant was created, expended considerable sums in adding to, and otherwise improving the property, and that in any event it was liable for her debt to the extent of the cost of such improvements. The affirmative matter of the answer was controverted by reply, and upon the issues thus made, proof by depositions was taken by the appellee. Upon the hearing the chancellor rendered judgment declaring appellee entitled to a homestead in the property, setting aside the sale made by the sheriff and quashing the levy under appellant's execution. Appellant complains of the judgment and insists upon a reversal.

The following facts seem to be established by the evidence found in the record: That appellee was to pay for the house and lot when purchased in 1892, $2,050; that she had paid of this sum $1,780.32, and yet owes of the purchase money, principal and interest, $770; also for painting the house, $75; for repairing gutters, $6, and city taxes, $132; making a total of $983, all secured by liens on the property; that appellant's debt was created in 1900, and that all sums that have been credited to appellee on the purchase of the house and lot were paid before appellant's debt was created; that appellee is, and for years past has been, a bona fide housekeeper with a family, and that she and her family, consisting of an imbecile daughter and crippled son, were occupying the house and lot in controversy as a homestead, at the time of the creation of appellant's debt and the sale of the property under her execution; and, finally, that the value of the house and lot is $1,600. It is apparent from the foregoing facts that the property in controversy is not worth the amount of the lien debts and appellee's right of homestead. Of this fact there is manifestly no doubt in the mind of appellant, as she rejected the offer made by appellee in the petition, to accept of appellant $1,000 in lieu of a homestead, if the latter would pay the lien debts against the property, or receive a conveyance of the same and assume the payment of the lien debts. It is, however, insisted for appellant that certain improvements were made upon the lot after her debt was created, in the shape of an additional building, and by painting the dwelling house, and that to the extent of these alleged improvements, the property should be subjected to the payment of her debt.

The painting can not be said to be an improvement in the sense contended for by appellant. It did not add to the value of the property except by way of preventing waste and depreciation. The building referred to is a cheap box house or shed room of poor material, which was erected in the rear of and adjoining the dwelling house, by appellee's son and one Wright, at a cost of $150, for use in the manufacture of potato chips. But it was in proof that this small room was put there, by the persons building it, under an agreement with appellee that it might be removed by them at any time. So it is not owned by appellee, is not a part of her lot, and does not in the least add to its value. It is evident that a sale of the house and lot in controversy would not realize a sum sufficient to pay the lien debts outstanding against the property, and the value of appellees' homestead; and these demands must all be satisfied before appellant can receive anything upon her debt, so it is difficult to understand of what benefit it would be to appellant to sell the property. But, as under her execution sale and by virtue of section 1709, Kentucky Statutes, appellant, as purchaser, acquired a lien upon the house and lot subject to the incumbrances existing thereon, she may, upon bringing the lienholders into court, insist upon a sale of the property to satisfy, first, the lien debts, second, appellee's right of homestead, and, finally, her own debt out of any surplus remaining. (Wilson, &c. v. Flanders, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1303; Atkins v. Emerson, 10 Bush, 13.)

It was error, therefore, for the chancellor to set aside the sale under appellant's execution, and also error to declare that no lien was thereby created upon the lot in appellant's favor for her debt, though such lien is subordinate to the value of appellee's homestead and the liens, for purchase money, taxes, painting, etc., yet unpaid, as shown by the record. When the case returns to the lower court the appellant should be allowed by proper pleading to bring the lienholders before the court, that their liens may be enforced. But in the event appellant should decline to demand a sale of the house and lot as herein directed, or to bring the lienholders before the court for that purpose, the chancellor may again enter judgment quashing the sale, discharging the lien thereby created in appellant's favor, and dismiss her petition.

Wherefore, the judgment is reversed and cause remanded for further proceedings consistent with the opinion herein.

CHICAGO, St. LOUIS & NEW ORLEANS R. R. CO. v. SULLIVAN.

Attorney's fees—Bonds—In an ad quod damnum proceeding against appellant it deposited the amount of the judgment with the county clerk as required by statute, and took an appeal to the circuit court when it attempted to take possession of the right of way when appellee resisted on the idea that the money had not been paid over to him which the jury assessed. Appellant then sued out an injunction restraining appellee from interfering with its possession of the right of way, but the restraining order being dissolved by the judge of the lower court, and a judge of the Court of Appeals refusing to reinstate it appellee brought an action upon the injunction bond to recover traveling expenses, attorney's fees and other costs incurred in defending the injunction proceeding. Held—It was error in the lower court in overruling a demurrer to the petition in this action. The law is well settled in this State that the only damage that can be recovered in this class of cases is "such as results from the operation of the injunction itself." The trial court should have given a peremptory instruction to find for the defendant.

Robbins, Thomas & Corbett, J. M. Dickinson, Pirtle & Trabue and Jacob Corbett for appellant.

J. D. Wickliffe for appellee.

Appeal from Ballard Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

A jury awarded the appellee, Jerry M. Sullivan, $3,000 as damages in an "ad quod damnum" proceeding instituted by appellant for a condemnation of a right of way through his farm in Ballard county for their railway line from Cairo to Paducah. The appellant deposited the full amount of this judgment with the county clerk as required by the statutes, and on the same day prosecuted an appeal therefrom to the circuit court. When they attempted to take possession of the right of way, appellee resisted on the ground that they had not paid over to him the money assessed by the jury. The railroad company thereupon brought an action in the Ballard Circuit Court for an injunction restraining the defendant from interfering with their possession of the condemned "right of way." The temporary restraining order was granted by the clerk after the execution of a bond to appellee by appellant, that they would pay such damages as he might sustain by reason thereof. This temporary restraining order was subsequently dissolved by the judge of the Ballard Circuit Court, and upon appeal by the railroad company to a judge of this court, a motion to reinstate was overruled.

Thereupon appellee brought this action upon the injunction bond taken by the clerk, to recover traveling expenses, "attorney's fees," and other costs incurred in defending the injunction proceeding. A demurrer was filed by the defendant, which was overruled by the court, and upon a trial before a jury resulted in a verdict under peremptory instruction for $500 attorney's fees in favor of the plaintiff and the defendant has appealed. The law is well settled by a long line of decisions in this State that the only damage that can be recovered in this class of cases is "such as results from the operation of the injunction itself." The rule is stated with great perspicuity in the New National Turnpike Co. v. Dulaney, &c., 86 Ky., 518, in these words: "When the attachment or injunction is merely ancillary or in aid of the relief sought, or is relied on to secure the relief when obtained, or to prevent the commission of a wrongful or tortuous act that would result in irreparable injury before the termination of the prime cause of action, then a recovery may be had on the bond for the payment of reasonable counsel fees, when the defendant has succeeded in discharging the attachment or dissolving the injunction; but on the contrary when the injunction is the relief sought and in fact gives the relief, if sustained, no recovery for counsel fees can be had."

This case was preceded by Burgin v. Sharer, 53 Ky., 399, and has been followed in Bennett v. Lambert, 100 Ky., 731; Taylor & Apperson v. Hamilton, &c., 108 Ky., 120; Williams v. Allen, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1191; Simpkins v. Well, &c., 22 Ky. Law Rep., 542, and numerous other cases. The proceeding in which the bond sued on was executed was not in any sense ancillary to the condemnation proceedings. The only question involved in the proceedings was whether the railroad company was entitled to the possession of the condemned right of way after having deposited the amount assessed in favor of appellee by the ad quod damnum jury, with the county clerk. If the injunction in that case had been sustained, it covered all the relief sought, and the judgment, therefore, dissolving the injunction does not authorize the recovery of attorney's fees. We think the trial court erred in not giving to the jury a peremptory instruction to find for defendant.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

INGRAM v. ISON.

(Filed May 10, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Sale of land—Plea of infancy—Where appellant sold his land to appellee, representing to him at the time that he was twenty-one years of age and his mother at the same time saying to appellee that appellant was of age, and it appearing that at the time appellant was a married man with two children and the wearer of a full beard, the action of the chancellor in dismissing his petition seeking to set aside the deed, will not be disturbed.

2. Same—Ratification—Where one sold land to another, his rental of it from the vendee two years after he became of full age, was a ratification of the sale and a recognition of appellees' right and title to it.

D. D. Fields and S. B. Dishman for appellant.

Ira Field, D. Hays and Salyer & Baker for appellee.

Appeal from Letcher Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

On September 6, 1896, the appellant, Leander Ingram, sold and conveyed to the appellee, Philip Ison, one hundred acres of land in Letcher county for $100. The deed was duly accepted and put to record by appellee, the possession of the land immediately delivered to him, and the consideration mentioned in the deed paid to appellant.

July 12, 1901, this action was instituted by appellant to set aside the deed and recover the land, upon the ground that he was under twenty-one years of age at the time of the sale of the land and the execution of the deed. It was also averred in the petition that the consideration for the conveyance was grossly inadequate, and that the land was worth three times the amount paid for it by the appellee. The answer of appellee denied the averments of the petition as to infancy, and gross inadequacy of price, and averred that appellant, at the time of the sale and conveyance of the land, represented to appellee that he was over twenty-one years of age, that it was known to appellee that he was a married man and the father of two children, and that he then wore a full beard, and in every way appeared to be over twenty-one years of age.

The answer also averred that appellee in good faith believed when he purchased the land and accepted the deed, that appellant was twenty-one years of age, and was induced by the latter's representation that such was his age, to enter into the contract and take the deed, and further that if appellant was not in fact over twenty-one years of age at that time, he is by reason of his false and fraudulent representations that such was his age, estopped to deny or repudiate the sale and conveyance to appellee; that appellee had in good faith made valuable and lasting improvements upon the land whereby its vendible value was increased, and to the end that he might recover the added value thus given the land, if the chancellor should see fit to set aside the conveyance, the answer was made a counterclaim and set off against the appellant. A reply was filed by appellant traversing the affirmative matter of the answer, and later appellee filed an amended answer in which it was averred that appellant, after he arrived at twenty-one years of age, ratified the sale and conveyance of the land made to appellee during his minority, by renting the land of appellee two years in succession. To this amendment no reply was filed and no order taken controverting it of record.

We find from an examination of the record that the evidence is conflicting as to appellant's age at the time of the sale and conveyance of the land. It, however, appears from his proof that he lacked only a month of being twenty-one at that time. Much of the evidence strongly conduces to show that he had then attained his majority, and it is admitted that he was a married man with two children and the wearer of a full beard. If the determination of the rights of the parties were made to rest upon the matter of his age at the time of the conveyance, it must be confessed that a correct solution of that question would be difficult under the evidence. There is, however, no doubt from the evidence that both the appellant and his mother, at the time of the execution and acknowledgment of the deed, represented to the appellee that he was twenty one years of age, and there is no proof whatever tending to show that appellee had information from any source that he was under that age. In fact, it appears from the evidence that the appellee never had any information that appellant claimed to be under twenty-one at the time of making the conveyance until about a month before the institution of this action.

We are of opinion that the chancellor did right in dismissing appellant's action. He was not entitled to the relief sought. In Schmithimer v. Elzeman, 7 Bush, 298, it was held by this court in a case where an infant femecovert was seeking to set aside a deed that she and her husband had made, to one who had been induced by their false representations that she was twenty-one years of age, to purchase her land, that a court of equity could not grant the relief sought. In discussing the question, the court, in the case supra, said: "Neither infancy nor coverture can excuse parties guilty of fraudulent concealment or misrepresentation, for neither infants nor femes covert are privileged to practice frauds upon innocent ones. In this case the conveyance is only voidable, the contract is fully executed. Appellee asks only to be left in the undisturbed possession of property for which he has paid a fair and full consideration. The chancellor could give no relief without making himself a party to her iniquitous and fraudulent conduct." * * *

In the case at bar the appellee is not asking as against an infant the specific performance of an unexecuted contract. The contract is an executed one, which the alleged infant is seeking to avoid four years after it was made, and as he does not appear with clean hands, he was not entitled to relief. The evidence shows beyond a doubt that the price paid by appellee for the land was its fair value at the time, and no claim can be made of unfair dealing on his part in the contract with reference to the land. Furthermore the judgment should have gone for appellee in the court below upon the ground that appellant, after the conveyance of the land and attaining his majority, ratified the sale and deed by renting the land of appellee, thereby recognizing his right and title to same.

In Haffert v. Miller, 86 Ky., 574, it is said: "The deed of an infant conveying real estate where any valuable consideration passes to him is, as well settled by this court, not absolutely void, but voidable merely, and he has an election after his disability to affirm or avoid it. To confirm, it is not indispensable that he should re-acknowledge the first or execute a new deed, but he may do so after full age by an act in pais * * * and there must be some positive act or words of the minor from which his assent to the deed executed during his minority may be inferred."

The renting of the land by appellant from appellee two years after his reaching full age, was hardly less positive in its ratification of the conveyance theretofore made in infancy, than would have been a writing confirmatory of appellee's title.

Wherefore, the judgment is affirmed.

COX v. SHELBY COUNTY TRUST CO.

(Filed May 10, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Wills—Where testator provided in his will that the trustee should sell his land whenever a fair price could be obtained for it, it was not incumbent upon the trustee to advertise the sale by posting notices or to obtain the consent of any one before making the sale.

2. Same—Power of court—Where one was appointed trustee under a will, the court having the power to limit its authority, did not do so, a sale by the trustee in accordance with the provisions of the will, will not be disturbed.

Gilbert & Gilbert and Harrison for appellant.

J. C. Beckham & Son and Willis & Todd for appellees.

Appeal form Shelby Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

On the 18th day of June, 1879, Fielding Neal made and executed his will, which, after his death, was duly probated in the Shelby County Court.

That part of the will having application to the questions involved in this litigation is as follows: "After my debts and funeral expenses are paid, I give unto my beloved wife, Bettie Neal, one third of all my property, both real and personal, during her life, and at her death the amount so given to her is to go to my granddaughter, Bertie Neal Amis. I bequeath unto my said granddaughter, Bertie Neal Amis, two-thirds of all my estate in trust for the sole and separate use of my said granddaughter, Berite Neal Amis, during her life. In case my said granddaughter should marry, then the said estate is to be held by the trustee hereinafter named, in trust for her, and, in addition to that, is to be held free from the use, control and the liabilities of her husband; upon the death of my granddaughter, Bertie Neal Amis, it is my will that the estate hereby willed to the said Bertie Neal Amis shall go to her children, if she have any, and if she should die without issue and before she is of age, then in that event it is my will that the estate so devised to her shall be equally divided between the children of my three children, namely, James Neal, Richard and Oakley Neal. I appoint A. P. Corrithers executor and trustee, and require that he give good and sufficient security, and should the said A. P. Corrithers fail or refuse to serve, it is my will that a court of competent jurisdiction appoint some suitable person in his place; in this event, bond should be required by the court. It is my will that all my real estate shall be sold whenever the property will bring a fair price, and the proceeds be invested in such a way as the trustee may think best."

Appellant is the Bertie Neal Amis mentioned in the will, she having married W. E. Cox in the year 1898, and by whom she has two or three living children. Corrithers qualified both as trustee and executor under the will.

When appellant became the wife of W. E. Cox, he qualified and executed bond as her trustee and acted as such until the fall of 1897, when he resigned, and the appellee, trust company, was appointed in his stead. The order of court with reference thereto is as follows: "The resignation of W. Ewing Cox, trustee of Bertie Amis Cox, is now accepted, and he is released from all further liability and duty as such trustee except as shown in this judgment for the above sum. And then the court, upon its own motion, appointed the Shelby County Trust Co., trustee of Bertie Amis Cox, under the will of Fielding Neal, to take, hold and manage the estate held in trust for Bertie Amis Cox under the will of said Fielding Neal."

The property devised to Mrs. Neal, the widow of the testator, and appellant was divided between them soon after the probation of the will, appellant receiving in the division as part of the devise to her, a valuable farm consisting of 580 acres, which is the subject of this controversy. Appellee, trust company, on the 14th day of October, 1902, sold this tract of land to its co-appellees herein, McCormick & Olgesby, for the price of $20,500, one-third cash, and balance on time, with interest. This sale was made privately, that is, without order of court or posting advertisements. Appellant instituted this action for the purpose of having this sale set aside by the court, alleging that the property had been sold without and against her consent, and without the power of the trust company to make the sale, and at a great sacrifice. Appellees made an issue with her upon these questions, and the court, after hearing the case, found against her, and she has appealed.

It appears from the record that appellee, trust company, had doubts as to its power to convey this property to its co-appellees in its capacity as trustee under the will, and, on the day of the sale of the land, Corrithers resigned as executor of the will, and the county court appointed the appellee, trust company, administrator de bonis non with the will annexed, and in making the conveyance to its co appellees it signed and executed the deed in both capacities. The resignation of Corrithers, as executor, and the appointment of appellee in his stead was of no force or effect. The office of executor, under this will, ceased when Corrithers made his final settlement in 1890, and turned over the estate in his hands to himself as trustee. If this deed is valid, it is so by reason of the trust company executing it as trustee under the will of Fielding Neal, as authorized by the order of court copied above.

The will not only empowered, but directed, that this property should be sold whenever it would bring a fair price. Appellant claims that this power was given to Corrithers; that the testator reposed personal confidence in him; that he did not mean that this power was to be exercised by any trustee other than Corrithers. We can not agree with this construction of the will. The language directing a sale of the real estate applied equally to Corrithers or any person which a court of competent jurisdiction might appoint to act as such trustee.

Appellant also contends that the appellee, trust company, had no power to execute the provisions of the will in regard to a sale of the property except it was authorized by the court appointing it, and that the court did not give it power to make a sale. We agree with appellant that the court had the power to limit the authority of appellee, and could, by an order of court, have prohibited a sale altogether, or placed it upon terms in making a sale; such as advertising and fixing the terms of the sale and requiring it to report the sale to the court for its confirmation, but as we understand the order of court, it did not limit the powers of appellee, but appointed it trustee of Bertie Amis Cox under the will of Fielding Neal to take, hold, manage or sell it, as authorized by the will of Fielding Neal. In such case it was not incumbent upon the trustee to advertise the sale by posting notices, or to obtain the consent of any one before making the sale. The only requirement was that the trustee should sell it when a fair price could be obtained therefor. (13 B. M., 564.)

There was much proof heard on the question as to whether or not the property brought a fair price, the preponderance of which was in favor of appellees on this question.

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

SCHLITBAUM v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed May 10, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Criminal law—Where the bill of exceptions and the bill of evidence have been stricken from the record, leaving the sole question as to the sufficiency of the indictment for the consideration of this court, the specifications in the indictment being substantially made in the language of the statute, a judgment of conviction will not be disturbed.

Glenn & Ringo and Heavrin & Woodward for appellant.

N. B. Hays and Lorraine Mix for appellee.

Appeal from Ohio Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

This appeal is from a judgment of the Ohio Circuit Court sentencing the appellant to one year in the State penitentiary.

The bill of exceptions and the bill of evidence have been stricken from the record on motion of appellee, which leaves the sole question of the sufficiency of the indictment for the consideration of this court. The appellant was indicted in the Ohio Circuit Court for embezzlement under section 1202 of the Kentucky Statutes. The indictment is specific and certain and contains the requisites of an indictment as defined by the Criminal Code, sections 122 and 124. It charges that the appellant was the agent of the Illinois Central R. R. Co.; that while in its employment and acting as the agent of this corporation, he unlawfully, willfully and feloniously converted $86 of lawful money of the United States, the kind, character and particular description of which was unknown to the grand jury; that this money was the property of this corporation and was converted to his own or to the use of another, one Boatner; that this money came into appellant's possession by reason of his employment with this corporation and that same was converted to his use for the purpose of depriving this corporation of the money. The specifications in the indictment are substantially made in the language of the statutes, which have been approved in the cases of Clark v. Commonwealth, 97 Ky., 76; Clifford v. Commonwealth, 96 Ky., 4; Jones v. Commonwealth, 13 Bush, 356, and Fisher v. Commonwealth, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 300.

Wherefore, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

SOUTHERN RY. IN KENTUCKY v. RAILEY BROS.

(Filed May 10, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Railroads—Damages—Shipment of stock—A judgment against appellant for $1,920 damages for delay in the shipment of seventeen head of horses will not be disturbed where the evidence conduces to show that the damages resulted from the negligence and delay of appellant in its transportation of the horses.

2. Same—In an action against a carrier, for damages resulting to stock which it undertakes to transport, the rule is that if from the preponderance or weight of the evidence the jury can find that the cause of the injury is the carrier's negligence instead of the negligence of some one else, or instead of a mere accident, then the plaintiff's case for recovery is made out.

Wallace & Harris for appellant.

D. L. Thornton for appellees.

Appeal from Woodford Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

In this action judgment was rendered upon the verdict of a jury awarding appellees $1,920 in damages on account of the alleged negligent delay in the shipment of seventeen head of horses from Railey Station in Woodford county, Kentucky, to Chicago, Ill., it being alleged that the horses, by reason of the delay and negligent exposure by appellant, contracted colds, and were diminished in value to that extent. The shipment was made in the latter part of April, 1901. The horses had been prepared with much care and pains for sale at Chicago. They had been trained and carefully groomed and put in condition through the winter months. They were saddle or combined horses. The bill of lading or contract of shipment provided for the carrying of the car of stock from Railey Station to Louisville by appellant, there to be delivered to a connecting carrier. On account of the delay which is unexplained, or at least not satisfactorily explained, the car of stock did not reach Louisville in time to make connection with the regular outgoing train which should have taken it out had it arrived at the time scheduled. Owing to a drawhead in the car being out of repair it had to be repaired at Louisville. This further delayed the delivery of the car to the connecting carrier. Although the parties had agreed for a reasonable delay within which this drawhead might be repaired at Louisville, appellee having selected this particular car, an Arms Palace Horse Car, not owned by appellant, yet there was proof to show that the repairing was not done within a reasonable time, and that the car was thereby unnecessarily further delayed. There was also evidence tending to show that in doing the work, appellant's car repairers left the doors open an unnecessary length of time, so that the horses were chilled. It was proven that on that day the weather was freezing at Louisville, being cloudy, windy and snowing. The person in charge of the horses testified that on the following morning they developed symptoms of cold and influenza, refusing to eat or drink, indeed being so swollen about the throat that many of them were not able to. They continued to grow worse until they reached Chicago. Their condition was such that the sale was postponed for quite a while, and some of the horses were so reduced in value as to entail considerable loss upon the owners.

Appellant contends that it was not shown where or how the horses contracted the colds, that they had been blanketed and kept in warm stables all the winter, that they were walked over frozen ground from the stables to the car the day they were shipped, and that they might have caught the cold in that way; or, that they might have contracted cold because of the sudden and radical change in the weather, and especially as they went north after leaving appellant's line of road, and not at all because of any negligence or fault of appellant. These matters, however, were all for the jury to determine. The facts were elaborately testified to by witnesses. Various theories as to the cause of the sickness were submitted to the jury. It was for them to determine under the facts whether it was caused by appellant's neglect in delaying the shipment and leaving the car doors open as stated; that such might have been the cause is not seriously denied. Appellant contents itself with claiming that neither of the other theories suggested might also have been the cause, and that the verdict of the jury must have been speculative. Whether one cause or another, both or all of which have been proven as existing, led to a given result is a question of fact to be determined under all the evidence.

The cases of Hurt v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 25 Ky Law Rep., 755, and Louisville Gas Co. v. Kaufman, Straus & Co., 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1069, 105 Ky.,

131, are relied on with other cases of the same import. In the Hurt case it was said: "It is not enough to show merely that the plaintiff sustained his injury while in the service of the master. Where the circumstances attending the injury show nothing as to the real cause, but leave it to conjecture whether it was the negligence of the master, the fault of the injured servant, or unaccountable accident, there is a failure of proof. The cause of the injury must be proved. Unless it is shown affirmatively there can be no recovery."

And so say we yet. There is a marked distinction between failure of proof and conflict in proof. Here there was a showing as to the cause of the injury. Like every other disputed fact, it must be determined by the jury under all the evidence. This court has never said, nor are we aware that any authority is to be found, that before a carrier can be held liable for injury because of its alleged negligence, that such negligence must be proved to be the cause of the injury to the exclusion of a reasonable doubt. But the rule is that if from the preponderance or weight of the evidence the jury can find that the efficient cause of the injury is the carrier's negligence instead of the negligence of some one else, or instead of a mere accident, then the plaintiff's case for recovery is made out.

Appellant contends that as the written contract, the bill of lading, did not provide within what time the stock was to be carried, it was improper to admit evidence to the jury proving statements by appellant's depot agent at Railey Station asssuring appellees that the car would be delivered at Chicago, or could be delivered there within so many hours. It is argued that this evidence was in effect the enlarging of a written contract by parol testimony. It is not claimed that the writing contained anything on this point. It was, therefore, implied that appellant would at least use ordinary diligence in transporting the stock. The statement of the depot agent was at least competent to show what was the ordinary and reasonable time within which the shipment could be made. It was a statement made by appellant's agent having the transaction in charge, and in the course of the transaction, and operates as appellant's admission of such fact. Where an extraordinary and unusual delay occurs in the shipment under such contract the implied undertaking in the writing is broken, unless the carrier shows that the delay was caused by something beyond its control, that it was unavoidable, or, that it was a necessary incident to the prudent and proper management of its business as carrier of passengers and live stock. We are of opinion that the evidence was relevant. The instructions fairly present the matters at issue to the jury. There was evidence to support the verdict upon all points.

Perceiving no prejudicial error the judgment is affirmed, with damages.

DONELAN, CH'N, &c. v. BIRD, &c.

(Filed May 10, 1904.)

Office and officers—Circuit judge—Vacancy in office—When filled—Under Constitution, section 152, providing "that if the unexpired term will not end at the next succeeding annual election at which either city, town, county, district or State officers are to be elected and if three months intervene before said succeeding annual election, the office shall be filed by appointment until the said election, and then said vacancy shall be filled by election for the remainder of the term." A vacancy in the office of circuit judge occurring by the death of the incumbent on January 1, 1904, his successor should be elected at the regular November election, 1904, the court judicially knowing that at said election presidential electors will be voted for in every county throughout the State, said electors being State officers.

A. T. Root for appellant.

Appeal from Campbell Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

The record herein presents an agreed case in which the parties sought in the court below, and are now seeking in this court, a decision of the question as to when an election in Campbell county for filling the vacancy in the office of circuit judge for the seventeenth judicial district, caused by the death of the Hon. John P. Newman, should take place, whether in November, 1904, or November, 1905.

The decision of the question submitted must turn upon the construction to be given section 152 of the Constitution, for section 1522, Kentucky Statutes, bearing on the subject is but a repetition of what we find in the Constitution. The section of the Constitution, supra, reads as follows: "Except as otherwise provided in this Constitution, vacancies in all elective offices shall be filled by election or appointment, as follows: If the unexpired term will end at the next succeeding annual election at which either city, town, county, district or State officers are to be elected, the office shall be filled by appointment for the remaindegr of the term. If the unexpired term will not end at the next succeeding annual election at which either city, town, county, district or State officers are to be elected, and if three months intervene before said succeeding annual election at which either city, town, county, district, or State officers are to be elected, the office shall be filled by appointment until said election, and then said vacancy shall be filled by election for the remainder of the term. If three months do not intervene before the happening of said vacancy and the next succeeding annual election at which city, town, county, district or State officers are to be elected, the office shall be filled by appointment until the second succeeding annual election at which city, town, county, district or State officers are to be elected; and then, if any part of the term remains unexpired, the office shall be filed by election until the regular time for the election of officers to fill said offices. Vacancies in all offices for the State at large, or for districts larger than a county, shall be filled by appointment of the governor. All other appointments shall be made as may be provided by law. No person shall ever be appointed a member of the general assembly, but vacancies therein may be filled at a special election, in such manner as may be provided by law."

It appears that John P. Newman was duly elected judge of the seventeenth judicial district at the regular election held therein on the 3d day of November, 1903, for the full term of six years, beginning the first Monday in January, 1904; that he received his certificate of election from the State Board of Election Commissioners, and his commission from the governor, after which he took the required constitutional and statutory oaths. But before the arrival of the time for undertaking the performance of the duties of his office, Newman died, his death having occurred January 1, 1904, thereby causing a vacancy in the office to which he had been elected. On January 27, 1904, the governor duly appointed and commissioned the present incumbent, Albert S. Berry, to fill the vacancy, and he has, ever since his appointment, performed the duties of the office.

Obviously, the section of the Constitution, supra, will not permit the appointee of the governor to continue in the office in question, until the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was elected, as the term will not end at the next annual election at which city, town, county, district or State officers will be elected. It is equally manifest that the contingency can not arise that would entitle him to conitnue in office until the second annual election after the happening of the vacancy at which officers of the classes named are to be elected, because more than three months wil intervene between the happenin g of the vacancy, and the time for the holding of the first election thereafter of the character indicated, and it is only where three months do not intervene between the beginning of such vacancy and the next succeeding election at which city, town, county, district or State officers are to be elected, that the Constitution will permit the appointee to hold over until the second annual election occurring after the happening of the vacancy.

As in this case not only three, but more than ten, months will intervene between the happening of the vacancy and the next succeeding annual election, if at such election there are to be elected officers of the character specified in the section, supra, we think this case must be controlled by that part of the section which declares that, "If the unexpired term will not end at the next succeeding annual election at which either city, town, county, district or State officers are to be elected, and if three months intervene before said succeeding annual election at which either city, town, county, district or State officers are to be elected, the office shall be filled by appointment until the said election, and then said vacancy shall be filled by election for the remainder of the term."

The only question that remains to be determined is as to whether at the November election, 1904, there will be elected either city, town, county, district or State officers.

This court judicially knows that on Tuesday after the first Monday in November, 1904, members of congress and persidential electors will be voted for in every county, and elected throughout the State. In Eversole v. Brown, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 925, and Neeley v. McCollum, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 823, it was held by this court that members of congress are not district or State officers within the meaning of section 152 of the Constitution. But in Todd, Mayor v. Johnson, County Clerk, &c., 99 Ky., 550, it was held by this court that presidential electors are State officers within the meaning of the section supra. We adhere to the conclusion expressed in that case, and find that it is sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States in cases of McPherson v. Blacker, 146 U. S., 135; In re Green, 134 U. S., 389.

We are of the opinion, therefore, that an election should be held in Campbell county on Tuesday after the first Monday in November, 1904, for the purpose of electing a circuit judge for the seventeenth judicial district, to fill the vacancy in that office caused by the death of John P. Newman, and to serve during the remainder of the term for which he was elected.

Wherefore, the judgment is affirmed.

COMMONWEALTH v. PARLIN & ORENDORFF CO.

(Filed May 10, 1904.)

1. Corporations—Unlawfully conducting business — Penal action —In a penal action, under section 11, Criminal Code, against a corporation for an alleged violation of section 571, Kentucky Statutes, for carrying on business in this State, in Todd county without first filing in the office of the secretary of State the statement required by said section, giving the name of an agent and location of his place of business where process could be had on him for the corporation, evidence showing that the defendant had, within a year before the filing of the suit, deposited a lot of buggies, wagons and farm implements, with the firm of Glenn & Gates in Todd county for sale, and that said firm had an established place of business and were selling or offering to sell defendants goods as agents and not as drummers, the goods being stored and kept at the agent's place of business, was enough to sustain the prosecution. It was not necessary in such case to prove the contract between the defendant and its agent in Todd county, whether verbal or written.

2. Foreign corporations—Interstate commerce—Federal Constitution—The defendant can not claim exemption on the ground that it was a foreign corporation and that the requirements of the Kentucky Statutes was an interference in the nature of regulating interstate commerce and, therefore, repugnant to the Federal Constituiton, as the statute makes the same requirement of all corporations whether foreign or domestic.

N. B. Hays and J. B. Mallory for appellant.

S. Walton Forgy for appellee.

Appeal from Todd Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

This is a penal action under section 11 of the Criminal Code of Practice against appellee company, a corporation, for the alleged violation of section 571, Kentucky Statutes. It is charged that appellee carried on business in this State in Todd county, without first having filed in the office of the secretary of State the statement required by section 571, giving the name of an agent, and location of his place of business where process could be had upon him for the corporation.

At the close of the evidence for the Commonwealth, the court peremptorily instructed the jury to find the defendant not guilty. This appeal involves the determination of whether there was any evidence tending to establish appellee's guilt. Appellee is an Illinois corporation engaged in the manufacture and sale of farm implements and vehicles. One Leander Gates, of the firm of Glenn & Gates, dealers in such implements at Kirkmansville, in Todd county, was introduced as a witness for the State. He testified that his firm within a year before the beginning of this proceeding had in their custody a lot of buggies, wagons and farm implements, the property of appellee, which they, as agents for appellee, were offering to sell, and that they had sold some of them, although the witness could not recollect and would not undertake to detail any transaction where an actual sale had occurred within the year. The witness was asked whether his contract with appellee was in writing. He answered that it was Upon being requested he produced what he said was understood to be a copy of it. He would not say, however, that it was a copy, or whether he had ever compared it with the original. The original contract was not produced, nor was its absence accounted for, nor was a notice served upon appellee to produce it. The objection of appellee to the introduction of the alleged copy was, therefore, properly sustained.

It is argued that as the contract between appellee and its agents, Glenn & Gates, was not proven, that the Commonwealth failed to establish its case. We think not. The terms of the contract do not appear to us to be at all material to this prosecution. The fact that Glenn & Gates conducted appellee's business in Todd county in this State within a year before the beginning of the prosecution, by selling or offering to sell their wares at an established place of business and not as drummers, the wares being stored and kept at the agents' place of business, was enough to sustain the prosecution. What appellee was to pay its agents for their services, or how, or when, or at what prices the goods were to be sold, do not appear to us to be material in this case. The copy of the contract above alluded to, if it is a copy, would be relevant only as indicating whether Glenn & Gates were agents of appellee in the sale of the goods, or whether they were themselves purchasers of the goods; the contract alluded to being the evidence of the terms of the sale, securing to appellee payment of the selling price of the goods. The latter seems to be appellee's version of what the contract is. The contract, at least the purported copy, is as follows:

"AGENCY CONTRACT.

"This agreement, made and entered into this 2d day of October, 1901, by and between Parlin & Orendorff Co., of St. Louis, Mo., first party, and Glenn & Gates, of Kirkmansville, Ky., second party; Witnesseth: Said first party does hereby appoint said party its agent for the receiving, keeping and selling in its behalf, of such goods as are designated, in the price list hereto attached, such agency to continue until the 1st day of January, 1903, unless sooner terminated by the said first party.

"Said first party agrees to furnish to the said second party any such goods mentioned in the price list hereto attached, as may be ordered by said second party during the continuance of this agency, upon the following terms and conditions, viz.:

"Said second party shall, at his own expense, keep all goods shipped by first party under this contract, insured against loss by fire, to the benefit of said party, to an amount not less than two-thirds of the invoice price of the goods so shipped, while in his custody, and shall safely house or store, and keep free from taxes or other charges to said first party, all such goods, and shall be responsible for said goods, and for all damages to said goods while in his possession. First party is to have insurance issued, send invoice for cost of same to second party, who agrees to remit for the expenses of same, immediately upon the receipt of such invoice.

"Said second party is to have the exclusive sale in Kirksmansville, Ky., of all implements manufactured by the first party, as shown by the list hereto attached, during the continuance of this contract, and is not to handle any other goods of such classes manufactured by any party other than the first party.

"All goods shipped to said agent under this contract will be invoiced to him at a certain price to be agreed upon at the time of such order, and such agent to sell said goods as far as possible for cash, and when sale can not be made for cash, in no case shall the time of payment of any note extent beyond January 1, 1903. He shall take the notes only of parties of well-known responsibility and good reputation, for the payment of their debts in the locality where they reside; and the said first party reserves the right at any time to reject any note taken by agent, in case it shall not be deemed good by the first party, in which event said second party agrees to take up said note in cash or in commercial paper satisfactory to said party.

"Said second party is to see that all the implements are properly set up, and is to deliver no goods until settled for by cash or notes taken on blanks furnished by first party, duly filled out, without alteration or erasures.

"Said second party agrees to keep all moneys and notes received on said sales, separate and apart from other transactions, and to remit the full invoice price of all goods sold in cash or note to said first party, first endorsing each note in the following form, viz.: For value received, I hereby promise to pay the within note at maturity or any time thereafter, or any renewals of the same, and hereby waive protest, demand and any notice of nonpayment thereof.

"Any notes turned over to first party by second party that shall remain unpaid sixty days after maturity, are to be taken up by said second party. This contract is to be a full guarantee for the payment of all notes turned over to first party by second party and a failure of said agent to endorse said note shall not affect this guarantee. Said second party agree to defend and collect said notes without expense to said first party.

"The ownership of all goods under this contract shall remain in said first party until sold in the usual course of trade by said agent, and the proceeds of all sales of goods to the amount of the invoice price thereof, whether in cash, notes or accounts, shall at all times be the property of the said first party. Settlement between parties to be made on the first of each month for all goods sold during the previous month, and remit proceeds of all sales for goods furnished under this contract, as soon as sold in the same proportion as the sales are made; either cash, part cash and part in notes or all notes, at the invoice price thereof, to said party of the first part. Final settlement to be made July 1, 1902, for the spring trade and November 1, 1902, for the fall trade, and at such time said party of second part shall turn over to said first party cash or notes as hereinbefore provided, for the full invoice price of goods shipped under this contract, which have been sold by said second party. The difference between the invoice price and expenses (including freight, taxes and insurance) and the price at which said goods are sold by said second party is to be in full for all compensation and expenses under this contract.

"Conditions named under head of notice and warranty, form part of this contract.

"First party is not to be liable for damages on account of its inability to fill any order sent in by the said second party.

"Five per cent. commission will be allowed the said agent on all cash paid said first party on the first of the month following any sale or sales, or within fifteen days from the date of any invoice. No commission is to be allowed on payments made at regular time for settlement.

"This contract may be revoked by said first party at any time without notice of said second party, and in case of revocation, settlement shall at once take place between said parties for all goods sold unto date, and all goods remaining unsold shall be delivered to said first party, at some point in Hopkinsville, Ky., as may be designated by first party, free of freight and charges both ways, or to some point nearer Kirkmansville as first party may direct.

"By agreement between the parties hereto, this contract is to cover and embrace any and all goods now in the hands of said second party held under any previous contract or agreement between the parties hereto and such goods are to be sold and settled for as herein provided, irrespective of the terms of any previous contract. Also all goods received from G. D. Rose stock, except wagons, as per list of same with prices and terms attached, dated November 1, 1901.

"This contract shall not be binding until acceptance is endorsed thereon at St. Louis, Mo., by Parlin & Orendorff Co.

"PARLIN & ORENDORFF CO.,
"By J. G. HARDY, Traveling Agent.

"Signed GLENN & GATES.

"Accepted by Parlin & Orendorff Co, St. Louis, Mo., ————————, 190————, "Manager."

We are of opinion that such contract, as the copy above indicates, constitutes only an agency, and is not a selling by the owners as wholesalers to the alleged agents as retailers, retaining merely a lien upon the property to secure the payment for goods delivered under it.

It is next insisted by appellee that it was engaged in interstate commerce, and that the requirement by the Commonwealth of Kentucky that it should comply with the conditions imposed by section 571, Kentucky Statutes, was an interference in the nature of a regulation of interstate commerce, and is, therefore, repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. Section 571 makes the same requirements of all corporations, whether domestic or foreign. It applies only to those corporations doing business in Kentucky, and having an established place of business therein. To sales by nonresidents, or foreign corporations, effected by drummers or correspondence or otherwise than through agents at an established place for conducting such business in this State, the section does not apply. (Commonwealth v. Hogan, &c., 25 Ky. Law Rep. 41.) That the State may, in the fair exercise of its police power, compel all corporations establishing a place of business within the State and carrying on business thereat, to comply with the conditions of section 571, is not violative of the provisions of the Constitution of the United States reserving to congress the exclusive control of the regulating of commerce between the States, is settled in this State by the cases of Commonwealth v. Read Phosphate Co., 23 Ky. Law Rep., 2284; Knoxville Nursery Co. v. Commonwealth, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1483; Commonwealth v. Hogan, &c., Co., supra.

One G. D. Rose had, prior to October, 1902, handled appellee's goods in Kirkmansville as its sole representative. Rose died about October, 1902, and appellee subsequently brought a suit against his administrator to recover certain wagons and other vehicles and implements, claiming in the suit that it was the owner of the goods, and that Rose was merely their selling agent.

Appellee filed with its petition against Rose's administrator copies of what purported to be contracts between them, showing such agency. In this prosecution the Commonwealth was permitted to prove the contents of the suit against Rose. For what purpose we can not understand, unless it was to show that appellee had an established agency at this point. This, however, might have been done, as it was, by other evidence. The Rose suit was more apt to be misleading than helpful to the jury. The danger is that the jury might infer that because appellee had had a contract with Rose, constituting him an agent to do business for it in Todd county at a time, that is now barred from prosecution by the statute of limitation, that probably appellee had the same arrangement or a similar one with Glenn & Gates. We are of opinion that the Rose record was irrelevant.

But for the reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded for a new trial under proceedings consistent herewith.

CITIZENS NATIONAL BANK v. COMMONWEALTH.

MARION NATIONAL BANK v. SAME.

FARMERS NATIONAL BANK v. SAME.

(Filed June 18, 1904—Not to be reported.)

T. L. Edelen, W. J. Lisle, John McChord and Thompson & Spalding for appellants.

Wm. W. Spalding & Henry L. Stone for appellees.

Appeal from Marion Circuit Court.

Judge Barker delivered the following response to petition for rehearing:

These cases were considered together, as they (with slight differences) involved the same questions. The court erred in attributing to the Citizens National Bank the payment of a franchise tax, when it was the Marion National Bank which made the payment. We now make the correction by withdrawing all that was said in this matter, so far as the Citizens National Bank is concerned, and extending it to the Marion National Bank.

The act of 1900 did not give the Commonwealth a new cause of action, but a new remedy for the collection of taxes on national bank stock. The stock was always assessible in the hands of its owner. The new law merely made the bank the agent for the stockholders to pay the tax on stock, which payment it recoups from the stockholders out of the dividends due them. This being true, the statute of limitation is a bar to all recovery beyond five years next before the institution of these proceedings. The remuneration of the auditor's agent is to be based on the amount actually covered into the treasury by his efforts, which, of course, means the net result of this proceeding. We do not think the county levies for the years involved were void.

Petition for rehearing and other modification, except as herein indicated, overruled.

DOTY'S ADM'R v. DOTY'S GUARDIAN.

(Filed May 11, 1904.)

1. Contract by mother with father of her illegitimate child—In 1882 Boyle Doty, a well-to do bachelor, 35 years of age, induced Annie James, an orphan girl, to go to his home and live with him as his mistress and housekeeper. In 1889 a child was born to them, who was given the name of David Irvine Doty, whom he recognized as his child. In 1889 there being some talk of an indictment against them for living together, she took the child to Missouri, but returned in a few weeks and took the boy back to Doty's house, where they lived until he died, in September, 1901. After his death, the mother of the boy qualified as his guardian and brought this suit against Doty's administrator, alleging that when his mother returned from Missouri with him, Boyle Doty agreed with her that if she would not take the boy back to Missouri, but would bring him to his house to live, and never take him away, so that he could keep him continually with him, and raise and educate him, he would give him 250 acres of land within a certain boundary, worth $15,000, and $2,500 to educate him and build a dwelling on the land for the boy. She accepted this proposition and carried it out, and Doty laid off the land and built a house on it and put him in possession of the house and land, which was still held by him. Held—That the contract being based on the evident desire of the father of the boy to raise and educate him, and make some provision for him in the future, was a good and enforcible contract, and while it can not be specifically enforced by reason of being in parol so as to compel the conveyance of the land, the chancellor was authorized to adjudge the plaintiff the sum of $2,500 for his education and $6,720 for the value of the land.

2. Competency of the guardian as a witness—The mother of the child, although its legal guardian, not being presumably liable for the costs of the suit, did not have such an interest therein as to disqualify her as a witness to the contract with the decedent for the boy.

3. Immorality of the contract—The contract not being based upon any agreement for her to continue illicit relation with decedent; but being solely to enable him to keep the boy at his home and rear and educate him, was not an immoral one, although the mother continued to live at the home of decedent with the boy.

J. A. Sullivan, C. F. Burnam and W. S. Moberly for appellants.

J. Tevis Cobb, Smith & Bush, C. H. Breck, R. L. Greene and W. B. Smith for appellees.

Appeal from Madison Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

About the year 1878, Boyle Doty, a well to do bachelor, something like thirty five years of age, living on his farm in Madison county, became intimate with Annie James, a girl about sixteen years of age, living with her grandmother in the slashes two or three miles from Doty's residence, her father and mother being dead. In the year 1882 her grandmother having died, she went to his house and lived with him as his mistress. In 1889 1889 a son was born to them, the appellee, David Irvine Doty. They continued, after the birth of the child, living together as before, until the year 1898, when there was some talk about the grand jury indicting them, and she took the boy and went to Missouri, staying there for some weeks. On her return from Missouri she took the boy with her to Doty's house, and she there lived with him as before, until his death on September 6, 1901. He left a considerable estate, a large part of which he had accumulated while Annie James lived with him and managed and controlled his household, doing all those things that a farmer's wife would usually do under similar circumstances. After his death, the child, David Irvine Doty, by his mother as guardian, brought this suit against the administrators and heirs at law of Boyle Doty, charging the facts stated, and alleging that when his mother returned from Missouri with him, Boyle Doty agreed with her that if she would not take the child back to Missouri, and would bring him to his house to live and never take him away from him so that he could have him constantly with him and raise and educate him, he would give the child 250 acres of land within a certain boundary, worth $15,000, and would also give him $2,500 in money to educate him and build a dwelling house upon the land for the child; that she accepted the proposition and carried it out; that Boyle Doty laid off the land to the child and set it apart as the tract of land which he had given to the infant, and in accordance with the contract, built a dwelling house upon it and put the child in possession of the house and land which was still held by him. He prayed that the title to the land he conveyed to him, or if this could not be done, for judgment for the value of the land and the $2,500, the amount agreed to be given for his education. The allegations of the petition were denied by the defendants, and on final hearing the court entered a judgment in favor of the child for $2,500, with interest from May 2, 1902, also for $6,720 for the value of the land, with interest from December 1, 1903. From this judgment the defendants have appealed, and the plaintiff has taken a cross appeal.

The first question to be determined relates to the competency of Annie James, the mother and guardian of the child, to testify to the contract between her and the deceased on which the action is based. It is insisted for appellants that she is testifying for herself as to a transaction with one who is dead, and is, therefore, incompetent under section 606 of the Civil Code, for the reason that she is liable for the costs of the action and is entitled to compensation for her services as guardian. It is also insisted that she is the real actor in the suit and is, therefore, testifying for herself. In support of this view we are referred to Smith v. Beswick, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 276; Miller v. Cabell, 81 Ky., 178, and Hobbs v. Russell, 79 Ky., 61.

It was held in Stowers v. Hollis, 83 Ky., 544, that the mother of a bastard is a competent witness for the child to prove a contract by the father with her for the support of the child, although he is dead when she testifies. But in that case the mother was not the guardian of the child or party to the action. The exact question presented here was, therefore, not raised in that case. Subsection 2, section 37, of the Civil Code, reads as follows: "A guardian, curator, committee, or next friend who brings or prosecutes an action for a person who is under disability, is liable for the costs which accrue during his conduct of the action, unless he be allowed to sue in forma pauperis, by an order of the court, or by an order of the judge thereof during vacation."

Under this provision it was held that a guardian was personally liable for costs accruing during the prosecution of an action conducted by him. (Snyder v. Fidelity Trust and Safety Vault Co., 14 Ky. Law Rep., 615.) But by the 9th section of the act regulating costs, approved May 27, 1892, which is now section 892, Kentucky Statutes, it is provided as follows: "A personal representative, guardian, assignee, curator, committee, or trustee in an action shall, if unsuccessful, be adjudged to pay costs as other litigants. The judgment for costs in such case shall only be against the assets which have, or may, come to his hands."

This act being subsequent to the Code, repeals its provisions in so far as they are in conflict therewith, and under it any judgment rendered herein against the guardian for costs, must be only against the assets which have, or may, come to her hands. She is not, therefore, personally liable for costs.

In Smith v. Beswick's Adm'r, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 276, it was held that an attorney who was to receive a sum equal to one-half the recovery, and was to get nothing if he failed to recover, could not testify for the plaintiff as to a transaction between him and the decedent The attorney was equally interested with his client in the result of the case, and every rule of law which closed the mouth of the client would apply equally to the attorney. By section 2036, Kentucky Statutes, it is provided: "The guardian, besides all necessary disbursements and repairs, shall be allowed by the court a reasonable compensation for his services."

Every witness summoned by the plaintiff would, to the extent of his witness claim, be interested in the result if the guardian would be interested because of her right to compensation for her services. She is entitled by law to a reasonable compensation for her services, but is given no right to any part of the fund recovered. Her trust may be terminated before any part of it comes to her hands.

In New York Life Insurance Co. v. Johnson's Adm'r, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1867, it was held that a policy holder in a mutual company, who thus participates in the profits of the company, may testify for the company as to a transaction with a decedent on the ground that the disqualifying interest to exclude the witness must be direct and certain, and that an uncertain or remote interest will not disqualify. In Elsenlord v. Clum, 12 L. R. A., 336, the New York Court of Appeals held the mother competent in an action by the son to establish her marriage with his father, although if this fact was established, she would be entitled to dower in the land sued for, the court ruling that the judgment in favor of the son would not be evidence in her favor in an action for dower. In 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, section 389, in summing up those who are competent, though remotely interested, this is given, "A creditor for his debtor," and in section 390 the rule is stated as follows: "The true test of the interest of a witness is that he will either gain or lose by the direct legal operation and effect of the judgment, or that the record will be legal evidence for or against him in some other action. It must be a present, certain and vested interest, and not an interest uncertain, remote or contingent."

We, therefore, conclude that her right to a reasonable compensation for her services was insufficient to disqualify the witness, for she was entitled to the allowance for her services whether the case was won or lost; her interest was not directly in the result of the action, although the ward's estate might be able to pay her if the suit was won, and unable to pay if it was lost. This indirect interest in the recovery went to her credibility and not to her competency. Were the rule otherwise, no person holding a claim could testify for the debtor as to the acts of one who, was dead when the testimony was given. It remains to determine whether the witness was incompetent to testify because she was, as guardian, a party to the action as relator. In Miller v. Cabell, 81 Ky., 178, it was held that the guardian of an infant is an indispensable party to an appeal from a judgment obtained in a proceeding instituted in the name of the infant by him as guardian, and in that case the court said that "where the guardian of an infant sues for him, he is the real actor, and the court has no power to displace him, unless his interest is in some manner hostile to the infant, or he is prosecuting the action in bad faith, and without regard to the interest of the infant."

In Hobbs v. Russell, 79 Ky., 61, it was held that an executor, who was also one of the devisees, when sued as executor, could not testify for himself as to a transaction between him and a decedent. This case was followed in Witt v. Thomas, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 847, where the administrator was also the sole heir at law. But in Swinebroad v. Bright, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 742, where the executor was sued by one of the devisees, and it was simply a question as to which of the devisees was entitled to the fund, it was held that the executor and his surety could testify as to a declaration of the decedent, on the ground that he had no interest in the fund, as he had to pay over the fund in any event to one devisee or the other, and that the statute was aimed to widen not to narrow the competency of witnesses. So in Michigan it is held that an executor who has no personal interest in the controversy which is simply between the estates of two deceased persons may testify for his estate, although a party to the action. (Penny v. Croul, 13 L. R. A., 83; Devol v. Dye, 123 Ind., 321.)

On the other hand, it is well settled that a person, though not a party to the action, can not testify as to transactions with a decedent if he is interested in the result; thus the distributees of an estate are not competent witnesses for the administrator. (Manion v. Lambert, 73 Ky., 295.) Nor are the beneficiaries of a fund competent for the trustee (Hopkins v. Faber, 86 Ky., 223), nor persons otherwise interested in fact. (Hinkson v. Wigglesworth, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1161; Whitlow v. Whitlow, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 1179.) It will thus be seen that it is interest in fact in the controversy that disqualifies a witness, and not the mere fact that he is or is not a party to the action. (Swinebroad v. Bright, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 743.)

The plaintiff in the case before us is David Irvine Doty. The recovery is his. The guardian may be removed by the county court at any time. Her only power is to protect the rights of the infant while she is guardian. If she were to resign as guardian, on learning that her testimony was necessary to protect his interests, and another were appointed in her stead, she could, after she was removed and when another had been substituted in her place as guardian, testify for the infant in the action. (Stowers v. Hollis, 83 Ky., 544.) The infant is under fourteen years old. He has no voice in the selection of his guardian and no control over the appointment. The action of the county court in appointing a guardian for him or the failure of the guardian to preserve his interests by resigning, should not be allowed to destroy the infant's rights. Infants are the wards of the chancellor and no construction of the statute should be adopted which would be prejudicial to their rights, unless required by its language. If the mouth of the infant's most, important witness can be closed by that person's being appointed his guardian, then the rights of infants may be often sacrificed by the statute that was designed for their protection. The language of the statute is, "No person shall testify for himself," etc. The witness here is testifying for the infant and not for herself in the ordinary sense in which these words are commonly used. The meritorious cause of action is in the infant, and in him alone. He can not testify for himself as to the transaction with the decedent, and, as his mouth is closed by the law when the decedent's mouth is closed by death, he and the decedent are placed upon equal footing. The administrator or executor holds the legal title to the personal estate of the decedent. The devisees or distributees take the title from him and where he, in his fiducial capacity, has a transaction with another who afterwards dies, the principal of mutuality which underlies the statute, forbids that he should testify as to what occurred between him and the person who is dead. (Alexander v. Alford, 89 Ky., 105.) But the title to the ward's estate is in the ward; a guardian can not sue in his own name except on a contract made with him as guardian. He has no legal interest in his ward's estate. When he sues in his own name as guardian, on a contract made with him in that capacity, he can not testify for himself as to a transaction with one who is dead; for there he is personally liable for the negligent loss of the ward's estate and for the costs, or for any misconduct as guardian; and in such case he can not, by resigning and having another substituted in his stead as guardian, make himself competent; for by subsection 9 of section 606 of the Code, the assignment of a claim by one who is incompetent to testify, shall not make him competent to testify for the assignee. The transaction here sued on was not had by Annie James as guardian. The cause of action is in the child. She is in no event liable for anything. The court might for cause displace her in the action as guardian and appoint a next friend to conduct it for the infant. If she had resigned as guardian and another had been appointed, or if, to protect the rights of the infant, the court had substituted a competent next friend to conduct the action for the infant in her stead, the cause of action being in the infant, her successor would not have derived his powers from her, and she would not have been incompetent to testify under the provision of the statute referred to relating to assignments of claims. In view of the palpable policy of the statute to open the doors and let witnesses testify, leaving their credibility for the tribunals before whom the evidence is given, and in view of the helpless condition of infants and the policy of the law to protect their interests and throw around them safeguards to prevent their suffering from cunning or ignorance, we conclude that the construction of the statute contended for, would be contrary to its spirit and purpose; unduly imperiling the rights of infants, and that the court properly overruled the exceptions to the testimony of Annie James, leaving the matters relied on to go to the credibility of the witness.

The case of Mason v. McCormick, 75 N. C., 263, relied on for appellants, was decided under a statute materially different from ours. There the statute provided that no party should testify, and in addition, that was the case of a next friend suing for an infant, and as such personally liable for the costs of the action. The only possible interest the witness here has, is in her commissions as guardian, and objection on a similar ground could be made to every witness who has a debt or claim of any sort against the ward's estate. This is too uncertain an interest to disqualify a witness.

It is insisted also for appellant that the evidence, as a whole, fails to sustain the claim of appellee; but we must give some weight to the finding of the chancellor. The evidence is conflicting. If we look at the evidence produced by the appellants alone the case seems entirely without merit; and if we take alone that for the appellee, it seems to be clearly made out. The testimony of Annie James establishes the contract as set out in the petition. Her deposition shows her to be a woman of good common sense, and there is a sincerity about her testimony that is impressive, especially in her explanation of things relied on to contradict her. She is sustained by a large number of witnesses who show, beyond question, that the intestate recognized and treated the appellee as his son, declaring his purpose to give him the property, and a number of the witnesses repeat declarations of the intestate that bear on their face inherent evidence of their truth; that he laid off the piece of land for the boy seems pretty clear, and that he built the house for him and not for himself we think is evident from the proof; for he did not entertain the intention of moving to the house or living in it himself, and was fretted, when on his return home, he found his things had been moved up to the new house. Besides all this, his brothers who lived near him, had little to do with him on account of the life he led, and he seems not to have been on intimate terms with any of his relatives, or to have entertained a warm affection for any of them. On the contrary, there was more or less estrangement. He would naturally feel an interest in his only son, and would feel more obligation to provide for him because of his unfortunate position, as well as his helpless infancy. To believe that he did not entertain this purpose would be to reject the testimony of a large number of witnesses and deny to the intestate that goodness of heart and innate sense of justice which the proof in the record shows he possessed. He was evidently attached to the child, and the proof by a number of witnesses shows that he contemplated educating him and giving him a position in the world. In his last sickness he sent for his friend, Stone Walker, to write his will, and when he found that Mr. Walker was away, he asked his friend, Dr. Harris, to write his will; but the doctor declined, saying he should get a lawyer, and when Mr. Walker returned he was too sick to make a will. While it does not appear what he wished to put in the will, the fact that he desired to make a will is at least some evidence confirmatory of the testimony of the number of witnesses testifying to the provision he intended to make for the boy. The child was the natural object of his bounty, for he recognized him and treated him as fully as his son as if he had been born in wedlock. He had been born and reared in his house, and naturally the instinctive yearnings of a father's heart must have gone out for his helpless child, who at the time of the contract was only about nine years old. In view of all the facts, we think the chancellor properly held that the contract, as alleged, was made.

contemplated the continuance of the illicit relation which theretofore existed between the intestate and Annie James, the mother of the child. The rule is, that a contract made in consideration of future illicit intercourse is void, and that it is also void if made in contemplation of a state of concubinage, or if the illicit relationship was understood by the parties to form a part of the contract. (Lytle v. Newell, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 188; McDonald v. Fleming. 51 Ky., 205.)

There are facts in the record tending to sustain this view of the contract, but it is also capable of other construction. If this were a suit by the mother for her services we have no question the principle should be applied, but it is not a suit for her services. It is a suit by the child. The evidence leaves no doubt that when the mother left Missouri she left with the purpose of returning to Doty's house and resuming her old place there. He met her at Richmond and took her and the child home in his buggy. She needed no inducement to return home. She had come from Missouri for that purpose. Her letters, introduced by appellant, show this beyond question. The object of the contract was not to get her to return or to resume her old place at his house. This was all settled. The purpose which the intestate had in view was keeping the boy. The law gave the mother the right to control the child. He wanted this right, and to induce her to agree that the child should not be taken from him any more, and should remain at his house and under his control, he agreed to make a certain provision for the child. Future illicit relations between him and the mother formed no part of the consideration of the contract. The consideration was that the mother should not put the child elsewhere, as she had a right to do, so that he might be brought up without the constant sense of his unfortunate origin. To compensate for this, Doty agreed to make a provision for the boy sufficient to educate him and make him independent. If we credit the testimony of the mother such was the contract. It was natural that the father would want the child, and that he did want him is certainly shown by his subsequent conduct no less than by his declarations. It was also natural that he would feel himself that if he kept and raised that boy there in that house where, as he got older he would be made every day to feel the shame of his birth, the father should in some way adequately provide for him. The law does not presume illegality and in behalf of the infant under all the facts that construction of the contract must be adopted which will make it stand rather than that which will destroy it.

On the cross appeal it is insisted for the infant that the chancellor should have adjudged him the land, and that the recovery is too small. Title to land can not be acquired by a parol contract and part performance will not take the case out of the statute under the rule in force in this State. (Grant v. Craigmiles, 4 Bibb., 205; Hadyen v. McIlvain, 4 Bibb., 58; Holzclaw v. Blackerby, 9 Bush, 40.) The contract is not otherwise within the statute of frauds and while appellee can not be adjudged the land, the value of the thing promised may be estimated and compensation for the breach of the contract may be adjudged, the intestate having received the consideration upon which his promise rested. (Benge v. Hiatt's Adm'r, 82 Ky., 666; Stowers v. Hollis, 83 Ky., 544; Mercer v. Mercer, 87 Ky., 80, and cases cited.) It is said there is a mistake in copying the record and that this is shown by the transcript. The depositions were taken in shorthand and it is said the stenographer made a mistake in copying from his notes, and that this mistake is shown by other parts of the record. We do not see that there is enough in the record to warrant us in concluding that a larger judgment should have been entered in favor of appellee, and on the whole case the judgment appealed from is affirmed on the original and on the cross appeal.

GRAHAM v. MAGANN, FAWKE LUMBER CO.

(Filed May 11, 1904.)

Manufacturing establishments—Lien of employes for wages—A sawmill engaged in manufacturing lumber is a manufacturing establishment in the meaning of sections 2487 and 2488, Kentucky Statutes, which provide that the employes of such companies shall have a prior lien on all the property owned by said company for six months' wages due such employe. The appellant being an employe of the appellee company has a prior lien on all its property for his wages, superior to any mortgage or other lien created thereon subsequent to the enactment of the aforesaid statutes such wages having been earned within six months before suit.

L. A. West for appellant.

Riddell & Riddell for appellee.

Appeal from Estill Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The Magann, Fawke Lumber Co., owned a sawmill plant near Irvine, Ky., and were engaged in the business of manufacturing lumber. On the 20th of April, 1900, they mortgaged their entire plant to George P. Magann to secure the payment to him of a note for $40,000 for borrowed money. George P. Magann transferred this debt to the Bank of Montreal, Canada. The bank, on the 14th of March, 1902, filed its petition in the Estill Circuit Court for an enforcement of their lien and a sale of the property. A judgment was rendered decreeing a foreclosure in accordance with the prayer of the petition. At the sale made thereunder by the master commissioner of the Estill Circuit Court, the bank became the purchaser of all the mortgaged property at the price of $37,800. The bank subsequently transferred the benefit of their bid to Angus Kirkland, the president of the bank, and the sale was confirmed. In the meantime appellant, David Graham, who had been in the employ of the sawmill company at a salary of $75 per month up to the 23d of April, 1902, filed a lien in the county clerk's office of Estill county for $225, as required by section 2494 of the Kentucky Statutes, and, on the 10th day of June, 1902, instituted this suit against the lumber company, the bank, and other creditors, asking that his lien be adjudged superior to that of the bank; and that it should be paid out of the proceeds arising from the sale of the company's property. The defendants answered, denying the alleged indebtedness, and also that he was entitled to the priority asserted.

Section 2487 of the Kentucky Statutes provides that when the property or effects of any manufacturing establishment shall in any wise come to be distributed among creditors, whether by operation of law or by the act of the company, owner or operator, the employes of such company, owner or operator, in such business, shall have a lien upon so much of such property and effects as may have been involved in such business and all the accessories connected therewith, including the interest of such company, owner or operator in the real estate used in carrying on such business. And section 2488 provides: "The said lien shall be prior to the lien of any mortgage or other incumbrance thereafter created, and shall be for the whole amount due such employes as such, and for wages coming due to the employes within six months before the property of effects shall in any wise come to be distributed among the creditors, as provided in section 2487. The lien of such employes shall be superior to the lien of any mortgage or other incumbrance theretofore or thereafter created."

In Bogard v. Tyler, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1452, it was decided that a sawmill at which lumber is sawed for sale on the markets is a manufacturing establishment in the meaning of this statute. And appellant has proven that he was an employe thereof, and that the claim asserted by him was for wages coming due within six months before the judgment and sale of the sawmill plant at the instance of the bank. The chancellor reduced appellant's claim to $125, in view of the fact that he had been too unwell during a part of the time for which the lien was claimed to render full services to the company, and we do not feel disposed to disturb his findings on this question of fact, but the chancellor erred in not giving appellant a superior lien over the mortgage creditors to secure the payment of the amount found due to him. While the decisions of the courts of the country are not entirely harmonious on the question, we think the weight of the authorities uphold the validity of statutes securing to employes of manufacturing establishments liens for wages superior to prior mortgage liens, when such liens are created subsequent to the enactment of the statutes. No constitutional provision is infringed by the statute; and as manufacturing plants are only valuable as going concerns, and can not be operated without material and employes, it is, therefore, the policy of the law to secure to such employes a prior lien for their wages for a limited period (Wimberly v. Mayberry, 14 L. R. A., 305.)

For reasons indicated so much of the judgment appealed from as denies to appellant a prior lien for the $125 adjudged to him is reversed and the cause remanded, with direction to adjudge this sum payable to him out of the proceeds of the sawmill property.

NORMAN, &c. v. CENTRAL KENTUCKY ASYLUM.

(Filed May 11, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Percy N. Booth and S. B. Kirby for appellants.

Holt & Alexander for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division.

Judge Hobson delivered the following response to petition for rehearing:

We can not apply in this case the rule that where an amended petition is filed perfecting the cause of action set out in the original petition, the running of the statute of limitation stops at the filing of the original petition; for by an order entered by consent in this case all the pleadings anterior to the amended petition were withdrawn and stricken from the file. The original petition, is, therefore, no part of the record.

The summons on the amended petition was served on J. C. Norman, the appellant. A guardian ad litem was appointed for her, who filed answer and for her prosecuted the appeal to this court. We, therefore, conclude that on the return of the case to the circuit court no further process will be necessary. Our attention is called to the fact that the record, including the depositions taken in the case of Pettit v. Norman, pending at the same time in the Jefferson Circuit Court, was by consent read on the trial of this case and made part of the record. This record is not copied in the transcript before us, and it is insisted that we must presume it supported the judgment. But as the judgment must be reversed on the question of limitation, we can not apply that rule here and direct a judgment to be entered in favor of the plaintiff for the time not barred by limitation.

The petition is overruled.

GEORGETOWN TELEPHONE CO. v. McCULLOUGH'S ADM'R.

(Filed May 11, 1904.)

Action for causing death—Proximate cause—Liability of appellant—Appellant, at the time of the accident complained of, occupied two rooms in a building belonging to H., J. & Co., using the front room as an operating room and the other as a store room, where, among other things, was kept some dynamite. H., J. & Co. sent a carpenter to partition off a bath room next to the store room, who, upon discovering the dynamite, directed his assistant to remove it which he did, placing it in the common hallway, of which appellant had no knowledge. Mary McCullough was in the employ of appellant, in the operating room, and while standing in the door of the hallway, the dynamite in some unknown way exploded, injuring her so that she died the next day. Held—That the proximate cause of the accident being the act of the carpenter and assistant, who were not in the employ of appellant, the appellant is not liable in damages for the death of deceased, and on this evidence a peremptory instruction should have been given to find for appellant.

Victor F. Bradley for appellant.

Montgomery & Lee for appellee.

Appeal from Scott Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

The Georgetown Telephone Co. is a corporation operating a telephone line in Georgetown, Kentucky. It occupied, at the time of the accident involved herein, two rooms in a building owned by Herring, Jenkins & Co., on the south side of Main street. The front of these two rooms was used as an operating room, while the back room was used for storing the materials used by the corporation in its business. The decedent, Mary McCullough, was one of the operators employed by the corporation, and her place of business was in the front room. The two rooms opened into a hall common to all the tenants of the owners of the building.

On the 7th day of January, 1903, the owners of the building, Herring, Jenkins & Co., employed a carpenter, one Cleary, to partition off a bath room next to the store room of appellant, and in order to do this, it was deemed necessary to move some shelves and their contents in the wareroom of appellant. In preparing to do this, Cleary found upon one of the shelves a box half full of dynamite; there being, probably, six or seven pounds of this explosive. Fearing that it might explode, he requested a young man by the name of Loots, who occasionally worked for appellant, but who was not then in its employ, to remove the dynamite from the shelves; this, Loots refused to do; whereupon Cleary ordered one Goddard, who was in his own employ as assistant, to remove it. Goddard did so, taking the box from the shelf where it had been, and carrying it out into the common hallway, where he placed it in a corner near the front door of appellant's operating room. Here, from some unknown cause, it was exploded. Just immediately before the explosion appellee's decedent was standing on the inside of the door of the operating room, leading into the hallway, with her hand upon the door knob; when the explosion took place, the concussion blew in the door with such force as to throw her across the room, mashing and breaking her arm, from which injury she afterwards died. Appellee having qualified as the administrator of her estate, instituted this action to recover damages for her death, alleging that it was caused by the negligence of appellant, in failing to furnish a safe place for her to work. The answer controverted all of the material allegations of the petition, and thus completed the issues. The trial resulted in a verdict for appellee in the sum of $4,983.33.

The first question that meets us on this appeal is, whether or not appellant was entitled to a peremptory instruction upon the evidence establishing substantially the foregoing facts. Assuming, for the purposes of this case, that it was negligence in appellant to keep the dynamite in question in the back part of its store room, does it, therefore, follow that it is responsible for the accident by which the decedent was injured? It is neither alleged, nor proved, that Cleary was in the employ of appellant; or that he went into its wareroom by its knowledge or consent, or that it knew, or approved, in any way, of the removal of the dynamite from the shelf in the wareroom to the corner in the hall. The only person, other than Cleary and his assistant, who seems to have known of the removal of the dynamite was young Loots, who occasionally worked for appellant as assistant to one of its employes, but who, on the day in question, was not in its employ. And it does not appear that he even knew where the dynamite was placed when it was removed from the shelf; that the dynamite, when placed in the public hall, was in a very much more exposed and dangerous place than when on the shelf of appellant's wareroom, is too obvious to require demonstration. But that it was shortly after being placed there ignited by, perhaps, some one throwing into the box a lighted match, or the stump of a cigar or cigarette, shows this to be true, if evidence on this point is needed. It does not follow that, because one is negligent and an accident occurs, therefore the author of the negligence is liable in damages. The negligence must be the proximate cause of the injury, in order to establish liability. Shearman and Redfield, in their work on Negligence (5th edition, section 25), say: "The fact that the defendant has been guilty of negligence, followed by an accident, does not make him liable for the resulting injury, unless that was occasioned by the negligence. The connection of cause and effect must be established.

And the defendant's breach of duty, not merely his act, must be the cause of the plaintiff's damage. The defendant's negligence may put a temptation in the way of another person to commit a wrongful act, by which the plaintiff is injured; and yet the defendant's negligence may be in no sense a cause of the injury."

In section 23 it is said: "The proximate cause of an event must be understood to be that which, in a natural and continual sequence, unbroken by any new, independent cause, produces that event, and without which that event would not have occurred. Proximity in point of time or space, however, is no part of the definition. That is of no importance, except as it may afford evidence for or against proximity of causation; that is, the proximate cause which is nearest in the order of responsible causation."

In section 32, the authors say: "The connection between the defendant's negligence and the plaintiff's injury may be broken by an intervening cause. In order to excuse the defendant, however, this intervening cause must be either a superseding or a responsible cause. It is a superseding cause whether intelligent or not, if it so entirely superseded the operation of the defendant's negligence that it alone, without his negligence contributing thereto in the slightest degree, produces the injury. It is a responsible one, if it is the culpable act of a human being who is legally responsible for such act. The defendant's negligence is not deemed the proximate cause of the injury, when the connection is thus actually broken by a responsible, intervening cause."

The case of Bosworth v. Brand, 1 Dana, 377, was an action in which Brand obtained a verdict and judgment against Bosworth, for the value of a slave killed on Bosworth's farm, at a negro frolic or dance. It seems that Bosworth permitted some fifty negroes to assemble and dance at an outhouse: "That a patrolling party surrounded the house about midnight, for the purpose of apprehending the negroes and breaking up the frolic; that the negroes refused to surrender when called upon so to do, and endeavored to make their escape; that one of the patrol, without any necessity for so doing, wantonly fired a pistol, loaded with balls and buckshot into a dark room, crowded with negroes, and thereby killed the slave of Brand."

It was unlawful for Bosworth to permit the negroes to assemble in the manner in which they did, and the court said: "That this act renders the conduct of Bosworth illegal in permitting the assemblage of the negroes, and that it renders him liable to the penalty therein named, to be recovered in the manner therein prescribed, there is no doubt. But that he is liable for every accident or injury happening to the slaves of others whilst so assembled, or in going to or coming from his farm, is an inference by no means so obviously deducible therefrom. * * * It is true in general, that a man is entitled to reparation for every damage he sustains from the unlawful action or omission of another. But the damages must be the direct and immediate, or at least, proximate and natural consequence, of the act or omission complained of. It will not do to carry it to every consequence, however remote, which can be traced to the particular action or omission, and much less to such things as are not a natural consequence, and may have arisen from other and extraneous causes. Thus it is said, Buller's Nisi Prius, 25: 'That if one whip my horse, whereby he runs away with me, and runs over a man, he may have an action against such person, for the whipping was an act of folly, and he ought to be answerable for the consequences. A fortiori, I might maintain an action, if I received any hurt, because the consequence is more natural.' He also suggests the propriety of proving, in such cases, that the injury was such as would probably follow from the act done. 'So, also,' he says 'if a man lay logs of wood across a highway, whereby my horse stumbles and flings me, I may bring an action; for whenever a man sustains a particular injury by a nuisance, he may maintain an action; but then the injury must be direct, and not consequential, as by being delayed in a journey of importance.' For which he cites Carthew, 194, 451. Pothier, in his treatise on obligations, page 97, said: 'If a man sells me a cow, which he knows to be infected with a contagious distemper, and conceals it from me, he is responsible for the damage I suffer, not only in that particular cow, but also for my other cattle to which the distemper is communicated.' But, he says, if the loss of his cattle prevented him from raising a crop, which prevented him from paying his debts, and his creditors in consequence seized his property and sell it much below the value, that these consequences, being too remote, the fraudulent vendor is responsible for none of them. Suppose the slave of one goes to the farm of another, and is not driven away in the time prescribed by the above cited act; that in consequence he is overtaken on his return home, by a hurricane, and killed by the falling of timber, or is accidentally shot, or even whilst remaining after the prescribed time, he is accidentally killed, could the owner of the slave recover his value from the owner of the farm? Or, to take a case under another clause of the statute, that slave enters a tippling house, and purchases a dram, and whilst in the act of drinking it, he is accidentally or designedly shot, by some one from without the house, would the seller of the dram be responsible for the value of the slave? It seems to us, that all these propositions must be answered in the negative, and that the contrary opinion has no plausible foundation in either law or justice."

In the case of Insurance Co. v. Tweed, 7 Wallace, 44, the rule as to proximate cause is thus stated by Mr. Justice Miller: "One of the most valued criteria furnished us by these authorities, is to ascertain whether any new cause has intervened between the fact accomplished and the alleged cause. If a new force or power has intervened, of itself sufficient to stand as the cause of the misfortune, the other must be considered as too remote."

In the case of McGahan v. Indianapolis Natural Gas Co., 49 Am. St. Rep., 199, the gas company had negligently permitted one of its pipes to become defective, whereby McGahan's house became filled with it; whereupon he employed a plumber to examine the house for the cause of the leakage. The plumber went into the room with a lighted lamp, thus causing an explosion. It was held that the negligence of the plumber, and not that of the gas company, was the proximate cause of the injury, and in the note to this case, it is said: "When the independent act of a responsible person intervenes between the defendant's negligence and the injury sustained, such act breaks the causal connection between the negligence and the damage, and he who is guilty of the original negligence is not chargeable, but redress must be sought from him who directly caused the injury, unless the intervening act is such as might reasonably be anticipated as the natural or probable result of the original cause." (Reed v. Evansville, &c., Railroad Co., 53 Am. St. Rep., 391.)

Applying the principle enunciated in the foregoing authorities, we have no hesitancy in reaching the conclusion that the act of Cleary and Goddard in removing the dynamite from its comparatively safe position on the shelf in the appellant's wareroom, to the exposed position in the public hall, was the proximate cause of the explosion which resulted in the injury complained of. Suppose Goddard, under the instructions of Cleary, had taken the dynamite out on the public street and placed it at the door of an adjoining building, and it had there been ignited and exploded, just as it was in the hall by appellant's door, would it be contended, then, that appellant was responsible for any damage arising from this wrong? We think not. As said before, neither Cleary nor Goddard were in the employ of appellant, nor were they, so far as this record discloses, acting with its approval; so far as the evidence shows, they were trespassers in the wareroom where the dynamite was, and wrongdoers in removing it at all. According to the evidence, as shown in this record, what defense could Cleary and Goddard have offered had they been sued for their wrongful act in removing the dynamite to the hall? Certainly, between the original negligence, if such it be, of appellant, in permitting the dynamite to remain on the shelf in its wareroom, and the injury of the decedent, they intervened as responsible causal agents, and their wrongful act was the direct and porximate cause of the injury inflicted.

The court should have sustained appellant's motion for a peremptory instruction; wherefore, the judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

GREGORY v. ILLINOIS CENTRAL R. R. CO.

(Filed May 11, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Damages—Action for—An action by a father for damages for the loss of his son's services by reason of his having been killed by appellee, can not be maintained at common law, and the action of the lower court in sustaining a demurrer to the petition was proper. The common law allows no remedy by way of a civil action for injury causing the death of a human being. Such injury must necessarily precede death, and the law did not allow any cause of action for an injury to the person who survived him.

Hendrick & Miller for appellant.

Reed & Oliver, Pirtle & Trabue and J. M. Dickinson for appellee.

Appeal from Marshall Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

Appellant's son, Joseph W. Gregory, an infant sixteen years of age, was run over and instantly killed by an engine and train of cars operated by appellee's employes, while he was attempting to cross its tracks at a public crossing in Gilbertsville, Marshall county, Kentucky. This action was instituted by the father to recover of appellee damages in the sum of $2,000, for the loss of his son's services by reason of the killing, from the time of his death until he reached the age of twenty-one years.

It is conceded that this action is not based upon any statute authorizing it, but upon the common-law right of the father to his infant son's services, and the remedy given for their deprivation. The petition contains the usual allegations of negligence in such actions. A general demurrer was sustained to the petition, and appellant declining to amend, it was dismissed; from which judgment this appeal is prosecuted. The ruling of the trial judge, in sustaining the demurrer, was correct.

"The common law allowed of no remedy, by way of a civil action, for an injury causing the death of a human being. Such injury must necessarily precede death; and the law did not allow any cause of action for an injury to the person to survive him. The husband or master of the deceased was not allowed to sue, because the only damage recognized by the law was the loss of service during the lifetime of the servant, and the death of the servant therefore, worked no injury to the master, of which the law could take notice. And, if the act causing death amounted to a felony, the general rule of the common law, forbidding any civil suit upon a felony, would alone have sufficed to exclude a claim for damages. Whatever may be said of these arguments, the conclusions thus reached formed a settled doctrine of the common law. No one, whether as executor, master, parent, husband, wife, or child, or in any other right or capacity, could maintain an action for damages on account of the death of a human being." (Shearman and Redfield on Negligence, 5th edition, section 124; Eden v. Lexington & Frankfort R. R. Co., 14 B. Mon. 165; Covington Street R'y Co. v. Packer, 72 Ky., 455; Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co. v. McElwain, 98 Ky., 700, Harris v. Kentucky Timber and Lumber Co., 19 Ky. Law Rep., 1731.)

The maxim actio personalis moritur cum persona, was the uniform rule of the common law and prevails in Kentucky to-day, except where it has been modified by the express language of the Constitution and Statutes.

The case, of Craig's Adm'r v. Lee, 14 B. Mon., 96; Gray v. Combs, 7 J. J. Marsh, 478, and Smith v. Hancock, 4 Bibb, 222, cited by appellant as establishing a contrary doctrine to the maxim, all involved actions for the value of slaves killed or injured by negligence or malice. While it is true, that the master was entitled to the services of the slaves, the latter was a mere chattel of the former; and the right of the master to recover for injury to, or death of his slave, was based upon the same principle of his right to recover for the injury to, or destruction of his horse or other species of property. These cases have no bearing upon the principle involved in the case at bar. Wherefore, the judgment dismissing the petition is affirmed.

HORD, &c. v. SARTIN, &c.

(Filed May 11, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Forcible entry—Defect in warrant—Practice—In a warrant for forcible entry after a traverse has been taken, it was error in the trial court to refuse to permit the warrant to be amended so as to correct an omission of the court below.

A. E. Cole and F. P. O'Donnell for appellants.

W. D. Cochran for appellees.

Appeal from Mason Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

This was a proceeding against the appellees for the forcible entry by them upon certain land situated in Mason county, Kentucky. A trial in the country resulted in a verdict of guilty, which was traversed by appellees, and appealed to the circuit court. After the case reached the circuit court, appellees moved to quash the warrant, because of its failure to allege that the land involved in the proceeding, was in the peaceable possession of the appellants at the time of the forcible entry complained of. It was conceded that the omission of this allegation was fatal to the validity of the warrant; and thereupon appellants offered to file an amended warrant signed by the justice before whom the case had been tried in the country, correcting the omission, and they also tendered and offered to file an amendment of their own, which would have corrected the original warrant. These amendments the court refused to allow, and sustained a motion to quash the warrant; of which appellants are now complaining.

The question presented for adjudication on this appeal is, whether or not the circuit court may arbitrarily refuse to permit an amendment of a writ of forcible entry, which merely corrects it, and perfects the cause of action originally attempted to be stated therein, after traverse and appeal. In the case of Bailey v. Kelly, 18 Ky. Law Rep., 718, this court approved an amendment similar to the one in question here, permitted by the justice prior to the trial of the writ before him; and it was said in the opinion: "It would be, we think, exceedingly technical to say that this warrant could not be amended to make it conform to the form laid down and required by the Code of Practice, as it was offered before trial or issue joined, as in all probability it was a mere oversight in the officer who drew up the warrant. We are satisfied that the county judge, who permitted the warrant to be amended, did not err by permitting the amendment and trial."

In the case of Parker v. Ozment, 8 Ky. Law Rep., 525, the Superior Court approved the amendment of the warrant of forcible detainer after traverse to the circuit court, in order to make it show the county where the land was situated.

In the case of Forsythe v. Huey, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 148, it was held that the circuit court did not err in permitting an amendment of the warrant after traverse; and in Hoffman v. Mann, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 255, there was involved the identical question under consideration, and it was held that the amendment of the warrant after traverse was proper. The opinion so elaborately discusses the principles, and reviews the authorities bearing upon it, as to render any further extension of this opinion unnecessary. And while, as a general rule, this court will not interfere with the discretion conferred upon the trial court by section 134 of the Code, in regard to amendments, we are constrained to the conclusion that, in this case, the court must have labored under the impression that the warrant, as a proposition of law, could not be amended after traverse.

Upon the authority of the cases cited the judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

BURNSIDE v. MEALER, &c.

(Filed May 11, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Mortgages—The fact that in a mortgage purporting to convey the entire tract of land and all interest in it, that the words "homestead and dower being relinquished by E. J. Mealer," subtracts nothing from the effect of the mortgage. These words mean only that she relinquished homestead and dower in addition to acknowledging the instrument as her act and deed.

2. Limitation of actions—An action to recover usury must be commenced in one year after it is paid.

3. In an action upon a note against a personal representative, the fact that the technical defense that the debt had not been demanded, properly verified in one year after the qualification of the personal representative, is no evidence of fraud, as demand may be waived.

Wm. Herndon for appellant.

S. B. Dishman, P. D. Black, Jas. D. Black and B. B. Golden for appellee.

Appeal from Knox Circuit Court.

On December 31, 1894, William Burnside recovered judgment against E. J. Mealer for something over $300.

Execution was issued on the judgment and returned no property found on May 26, 1896. On April 4, 1901, he instituted this action on the return of no property found, against her, John T. Hays and William Gilbert. They answered, alleging that they did not owe her anything. He then amended his petition and alleged that on March 20, 1891, John Mealer, the husband of E. J. Mealer, borrowed of William Gilbert $1,500 for which he gave his note in twelve months with his wife as his security, and to secure the note he and his wife, E. J. Mealer, mortgaged to Gilbert a tract of land owned by them jointly; that in the certificate of acknowledgment Mrs. Mealer only relinquished her dower and homestead; that John Mealer paid $150 on the debt and afterwards died, but no demand was made of the debt properly verified within one year after the qualification of his personal representative; that on February 13, 1896, Gilbert filed suit and recovered judgment foreclosing his mortgage; that the property was sold for the sum of $2,200, one-half of which was the property of E. J. Mealer; that the sale was made on June 27, 1898, and was confirmed at the July term, 1898; that judgment should have been rendered in favor of Gilbert for the sum of $1,350, and he should only have been adjudged a lien on the husband's half of the land; that E. J. Mealer filed an answer in that suit, but afterwards withdrew it and allowed the judgment to be taken fraudulently with intent to perfer Gilbert to her other creditors. The court sustained a demurrer to this pleading because the time for attacking the transaction as a fraudulent preference to prefer one creditor to another had passed before the action was brought.

Burnside then filed an amended petition charging that the judgment was a fraud gotten up by Gilbert and E. J. Mealer for the fraudulent purpose of defeating her creditors in the collection of their debts; that they each acted in collusion for the purpose of covering up in the hands of Gilbert the money and property of E. J. Mealer. The court overruled a demurrer to this pleading and Gilbert filed an answer denying its allegations and pleading the former judgment in bar of the petition in so far as it set out facts going to show that he had recovered more than was coming to him in the former case. On final hearing the court dismissed the action and Burnside appeals.

The proof wholly fails to show fraud or collusion between Gilbert and Mrs. Mealer It tends to show there was some usury embraced in the judgment, but an action to recover usury must be begun in one year after it is paid. This action was not brought in time for that purpose. The fact that when Gilbert, for her accommodation, had indulged her on the debt, she did not set up in the suit the technical defense that he had not demanded his debt properly verified in one year after the personal representative qualified, is no evidence of fraud, as the demand may be waived. The statute was only aimed for the protection of the estates of deceased persons from interest or claims not demanded of the personal representative, and where he knows of the debt, he may waive the demand. This waiver may be express or may be implied. The mortgage executed by Mealer and wife purports to convey the entire tract, including all interests they had in it. The clerk's certificate shows they signed and acknowledged the instrument as their act and deed. The fact that he adds to the certificate the words "Homestead and dower being relinquished by E. J. Mealer," subtracts nothing from the effect of the mortgage which passed the entire title and which they acknowledged and delivered as their act and deed. These words mean only that she relinquished homestead and dower in addition to acknowledging the instrument as her act and deed. The certificate considered in Sutton v. Pollard, 13 Ky. Law Rep., 85, was of wholly different tenor. The only thing the wife there did, according to the certificate, was that she relinquished her dower. The presumption that she consented, when examined separate and apart from her husband, to the conveyance of the property as set out in the mortgage, was there overthrown by the certificate. But here the certificate is in due form and the words quoted must be understood as added to show that it was not only a joint conveyance of the property, but that she released also her dower and homestead.

Judgment affirmed.

VOL. 26. JULY 15, 1904. No. 2.

COURT OF APPEALS OF KENTUCKY.

CITY OF LEXINGTON v. WILSON, &c.

(Filed May 11, 1904.)

1. Taxation—City ordinance—Tax lawfully imposed—Inadequate remedy—How collected—By proper ordinance, enacted pursuant to its charter, the city of Lexington imposed a license or occupation tax upon the proprietors of livery stables, but no provision was made for its collection in a summary way or by suit. An action was instituted to recover the amount due as in case of debt. On demurrer the court dismissed the petition. Held—Where an adequate remedy is provided for the collection of a tax, lawfully imposed, the authority to resort to any other remedy is denied; but where the legislature has enacted a law imposing a tax, or authorized an authority to impose such tax, and it has been done, but no adequate remedy is provided for its collection, the right to do so is implied, and an action therefor can be maintained.

2. Payment of fine—The payment of a fine imposed for a failure to take out the license, does not discharge the claim for the license tax.

3. Cases overruled—To the extent that other cases are in conflict with this opinion, they are overruled.

Allen & Duncan, Z. Gibbons and A. O. Ambrose for appellant.

J. D. & G. R. Hunt for appellees.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The appellees are the proprietors of a feed, livery and sale stable. By proper ordinances enacted pursuant to the charter of cities of the second class, a license or occupation tax was imposed upon the proprietors of livery stables, which is graduated by the number and character of vehicles used for hire in the conduct of business. The ordinances were adopted for the purpose of raising a revenue, but no provision was made for collecting it by a summary way or by suit. This action was instituted to recover amounts due from appellees, as in case of debt. On demurrer the court dismissed the petition, hence the question here for determination is, can such an action be maintained.

Before entering into a discussion of the questions, it is well to say that the court is confronted with the claim that its opinions on the question are in conflict, not only as to conclusions, but as to reasons given in support of them. A careful examination of the opinions leads the court to concede that the claim in some degree is true. It is of the greatest importance that the opinions of this court should be in harmony one with another, not only that persons who have controversies may know their legal rights, so that they can be settled without resort to courts, but that the administration of justice may be had, in so far as it is possible, under settled rules of law. It is especially important that this should be so in the matter of the imposition of public burdens and the methods of their enforcement. In view of the conflict in the opinions of the court on the question under consideration, a brief review of them is necessary, so that the court may the more clearly state its conclusions and the rule that is to be observed hereafter.

By an act of the legislature, the Portland Dry Dock and Insurance Co. was required to pay to the city of Louisville 50 cents on each $100 of its capital stock, and as the capital stock was $100,000, the tax amounted to $500 annually. By a subsequent act the board of trustees of the town of Portland were empowered to collect and receive $200 of the annual tax to be laid upon the Portland Dry Dock and Insurance Co. and the city of Louisville $300 of it. The trustees of Portland brought suit against the Portland Dry Dock and Insurance Co. for their part of the tax, and the question was made that the action could not be maintained. This court, in Portland Dry Dock and Insurance Co. v. Turstees of Portland, 12 B. M., 81, held the action could be maintained, although a more summary remedy was provided by law for the collection of the tax.

In Johnson v. Louisville, 11 Bush, 538, the court had under consideration the question as to whether a suit for a tax could be maintained when the charter of the city of Louisville had provided a full and adequate remedy for the collection of the tax, and while the court held that the judgment was not void which had been rendered for the tax, it also held that as there was a full and adequate remedy provided by law for its collection, it was exclusive. In conclusion, the court said: "We are well satisfied that upon principle such suits can not be maintained, and that sound public policy demands that the courts should not sustain them, except in those cases where the prescribed mode of enforcing payment would be ineffectual."

It was claimed that the property of the Louisville Water Co. should pay taxes. The company denied its liability therefor. The sheriff was proceeding to enforce payment, and the water company enjoined the collection of the taxes. In passing upon the question in Louisville Water Co. v. Hamilton, 81 Ky., 523, the court decided that the water company was liable for the taxes, but that as it was performing a public service, its property could not be seized and sold by the sheriff for the taxes. It was also held that as the court had been applied to for "some sort" of relief by the water company, it should have taken cognizance of the case, and required it to pay the money into court, etc.

In Greer v. City of Covington, 83 Ky., 410, the court sustained the right to maintain an action to recover taxes, because the statute provided for such an action in addition to the right of the tax collector to seize and sell property for them. It also decided that such an act was not in violation of the Constitution.

In Baldwin v. Hewitt, Auditor, 88 Ky., 680, the court held that a suit for taxes could not be maintained without express legislative authority, upon the theory that the collection of taxes was not an inherent power of the judiciary; that to allow such an action would destroy the theory of government as to the distribution of powers; and further because the legislature had given the right to sue railroad companies for taxes there was implied "a legislative opinion that in its absence no such suit could be maintained."

In the case of the Louisville Water Co. v. Commonwealth, 89 Ky., 248, the Commonwealth sought to recover taxes, and the court held that the action could not be maintained, because there was no express statute authorizing it.

In Clark, Sheriff v. Louisville Water Co., 90 Ky., 524, it appeared that the sheriff had seized and was going to sell the property of the water company for taxes, and it enjoined the sheriff from doing so. The court held it was liable therefor, and adjudged that as it had come into court asking equitable relief, the court should take charge of its property and compel it to pay the tax.

In the City of Covington v. District of Highlands of Campbell County, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 433, the appellee instituted an action against the city of Covington to recover the tax due it, and the court sustained the action, although there was no express authority for it.

A careful examination of the cases to which reference has been made, shows that the court in the cases of the Portland Dry Dock Insurance Co. v. Trustees of Portland, and the City of Covington v. District of Highlands of Campbell County, held that actions to recover taxes, although there was no express legislation authorizing it, could be maintained. The case of Johnson v. Louisville recognized that such an action could be maintained, if the remedy provided by law for their collection was not full and adequate. In Louisville Water Co. v. Hamilton, the court certainly recognized that an action could be maintained to recover without any express statute authorizing it, or it would not have held that as the water company had sought relief in the court against their collection, the court should have enforced their payment. The fact that the water company sought relief against the collection of taxes did not confer upon the court the jurisdiction to enforce their collection. Such a proceeding might authorize the court to hold that it would exercise a jurisdiction which it had to determine liabilities for taxes and enforce them, but it could not confer a jurisdiction not existing under the law. If the court had intended to so hold, it would have assumed a most untenable and illogical position. It held that the sheriff had no authority to seize and sell the property of the water company and that the injunction was properly obtained. If it had proceeded to hold that no action could be maintained for the taxes, because there was no statute expressly authorizing it, it would have followed that the court should not have enforced the payment of taxes through the instrumentality of a receiver Certainly the court could not consistently hold that an action could not be maintained by the authority to which the tax was due, then in an action rightfully brought by the taxpayer to prevent the sale of his property for the tax, hold that the taxing authority might enforce the collection of the tax.

If the law does not authorize the taxing authority to maintain a direct action to recover taxes, it certainly does not do so in an action brought by the tax payer. If the reasoning of the court is correct in Baldwin v. Hewitt, Auditor, and Louisville Water Co. v. Commonwealth, that an action can not be maintained in the absence of express authority, because it would be destructive of our theory of government as to the distribution of power, the same reasoning should prevent the court from enforcing the collection of taxes in an action by the taxing authority or in one by the taxpayer. If the reasoning be sound, it would be a usurpation of authority and the exercise of a jurisdiction which did not exist the same in the one as in the other case. It would be wholly immaterial who began the proceeding or as to the form of action, for the objection does not stick in the bark, it denies the authority of the courts at law or in equity to enforce the payment of taxes in the absence of express authority. Clark, Sheriff v. Louisville Water Co. followed Louisville Water Co. v. Hamilton. Thus it will be seen that there are two cases expressly holding that the action may be maintained, and one which concedes that it can be done, and two which logically lead to the same conclusion. On the other hand, the cases of Baldwin v. Hewitt, Auditor, Louisville Water Co. v. Commonwealth, and the dictum in Greer v. City of Covington, are to the effect that such action can not be maintained. There is another line of cases bearing upon the question to which reference will hereafter be made, but we do not think they are in point or in conflict with any of the cases discussed. In Baldwin v. Hewitt, Auditor, and Louisville Water Co. v. Commonwealth, the court gave as one of the reasons for holding that the action could not be maintained, was the act authorizing suits against railroads for taxes implied "a legislative opinion that in its absence no such suit could be maintained." After further consideration, we are of the opinion that instead of it creating impliedly a "legislative opinion" that such actions could not be maintained without express legislative authority, it manifests a legislative judgment that it was not wise to seize and sell railroad property for taxes by summary process owing to the nature of the property and the public service it performed, but that it should be done by a proceeding in court. The legislature intended that the remedy by suit should be exclusive, as the summary remedy is intended to be in some other instances. Another reason which the court gave for its conclusion is, to wit, that to allow such actions would be destructive of our theory of government as to the distribution of its powers, is not a satisfactory one. Taxation is a political matter. The legislative department must alone determine the necessity for the imposition of a tax and fix the rate, prescribe the method of assessment and regulate the manner in which payment shall be enforced. With these things the judicial and executive branches have nothing to do. The legislature may provide that the collection of taxes may be by collecting officers by a summary proceeding or by the judiciary. We have not found that the courts of the country have held that when without express legislative authority a court takes jurisdiction and gives a judgment for tax due by a citizen, it has been guilty of exceeding the limit of judicial function or has invaded the province of the executive department of government. From the very necessity of the case it requires the power of the executive department and the strong arm of the courts to effectually enforce the collection of taxes imposed by legislative authority for the support of the government. The question which has perplexed the courts in suits for taxes, is not whether the assumption of jurisdiction was a usurpation of the function of other departments, but to ascertain the legislative will with reference thereto. Some courts hold that unless there is an express legislative authority for the suit, they will not sustain it. Others hold that where a tax is imposed and no remedy is provided for its collection, there is an implied authority for the courts to exercise jurisdiction in the matter. So it is not a question of destroying "our theory of government in the distribution of its powers," but of legislative intent, for the executive department of government has no more authority to collect taxes without legislative authority than has the judiciary, hence if one is given the authority to collect taxes to the exclusion of the other, it can not be said there is a usurpation of authority in the execution of the legislative will. If express and exclusive authority was conferred upon the executive department or the judiciary to collect a tax, and the unauthorized one should proceed to do so, then there would be a disregard of the legislative will and reprehensible effort to usurp authority which would tend to the destruction of our theory of government that one department should not invade the constitutional or legal limits of another department of government. Should the court take jurisdiction of an action for taxes as in debt when there is no act of the legislature in terms conferring it? To put the question in a different form, can an intention to confer such jurisdiction on the courts be inferred. We answer in the affirmative. In doing so it must be conceded that the legislature has the authority to confer such jurisdic ion and the decisions of this court uphold such legislation. The court also recognizes the rule of this court to be that when the legislature has prescribed a full and adequate remedy for the collection of taxes, the authority to resort to any other remedy for their collection is denied. When the legislature has enacted a law imposing a tax or authorized an authority to impose one, and it has been done, a liability has been created on the taxpayer which he must discharge. If no summary method is provided to enforce its payment, then unless the court can do so, a tax has been imposed and a liability created by law, and the State, county or municipality is without means of enforcing its satisfaction. To so hold is attributing to the legislature incompetency or gross neglect in the enactment of laws. When the legislature enacts a law, imposing a tax, the presumption is that it intended that it should be collected. If it does not provide another method of collection, the presumption should be indulged it knew that the courts were open to enforce liabilities created by contract or by law, and that the remedy by suit afforded by the common law would be ample.

In Dillon on Municipal Corporations, 4th edition, section 818, it is said: "If the charter gives the power to impose taxes, but is silent respecting the method for their recovery, the corporation may enforce them or provide by ordinance for their enforcement by due course of judicial proceedings. In such a case the authority to collect by suit is clearly implied, being necessary in order to make the power to tax available."

Cooley on Taxation, 3d edition, page 836, says: "Sometimes the implication of an intent to give a remedy by suit may be so strong as to be conclusive; as where the statute provides for a tax, but is silent as to the method of collection."

Where no adequate remedy is provided for the collection of a tax, the right to do so is implied. There is an ordinance of the city of Lexington which imposes a penalty for failing to take out a license. The payment of the fine does not discharge the claim for the license tax. If it can be said to be a remedy for the collection of the tax, it is inadequate. The case of McLean County Precinct v. Deposit Bank of Owensboro, 81 Ky., 254, is not opposed to the conclusion we have reached. The law which the court was called upon to construe, conferred jurisdiction upon the county judge to appoint a tax collector and held that, as the legislature had control over the matter and chose to confer the authority upon the county judge to make the appointment, the judiciary should not interfere. The case of Grand Rapids School Furniture Co. v. Trustees School District No. 29, Pike County, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 1610, is to the same effect. Our conclusion is, that the action can be maintained. To the extent cases are in conflict with this opinion, they are overruled.

(Filed May 11, 1904.)

Deed held in escrow—Conditions—Delivery by husband without wife's consent—Joint interest of wife—The appellant, R. S. D., owned a one-eighth interest in the land in controversy by inheritance, and acquired a three-eighth interest by deed from her husband, made August 14, 1889. In September, 1890, in consideration of a large sum of money B. S. D., J. C. D. and appellant, who is the wife of J. C. D., acknowledged a deed to appellee for the land in controversy, which was delivered to S. J. M. in escrow, with a writing which recited that when appellee presented J. C. D.'s receipt for the first payment of the purchase money, $25,000, the deed was to be recorded. Instead of presenting a receipt for said sum, J. C. D., in writing, consented that the deed should be recorded by means of the payment to him of $5,500, as administrator of B. S. D., whereupon the deed was recorded. Subsequently appellee paid to J. C. D. $3,000. No part of the $5,500 nor of the $3,000 was paid to the appellant, R. S. D., and she never consented that such payments should be made to her husband or that the deed should be recorded. The court decreed that the contract of sale should be rescinded and that appellee was entitled to a lien upon the three-eighth interest owned by J. C. D. and the one-eighth interest owned by appellant R. S. D. in said land. Held—That the deed made by J. C. D. to appellant in August, 1889, not having been on record when the sale was made to appellee in September, 1890, and that appellee's agents were not aware of the existence of said deed at the time of its purchase, the three-eighth interest of J. C. D. therein was properly held liable to a lien in favor of appellee for the amount due appellee on rescission. But as to the appellant, R. S. D., she never having consented to part with her title except upon condition that the cash payment was made of which appellee was aware, no contract of sale of her one-eighth interest was ever consummated, nor could the wrongful act of her husband in consenting to have the deed recorded, divest her of her title or encumber it.

with a lien for money which she never received nor authorized any one else to receive, and the deed to appellee should be set aside as to her one-eighth interest in said land.

White & Ray for appellants.

F. H. Sullivan, J. M. Nichols & Son and J. Smith Hays for appellees.

Appeal from Ballard Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

This is the fourth time this case has been here; however each appeal presented a different question for review. On a former appeal it was decided that of the land conveyed by J. C. Dupoyster and Ben S. Dupoyster to the appellee, Fort Jefferson Improvement Co., one-half belonged to J. B. Dupoyster and Delva D. Edwards; three-eighths to J. C. Dupoyster and one-eighth to Rebecca S. Dupoyster; but the latter was not before the court in the proceeding wherein the court adjudged a lien on one-half of the land on the rescission of the contract between J. C. and Ben S. Dupoyster and the appellee. The various proceedings had, are made to appear in the opinions of the court on former appeals (Fort Jefferson Improvement Co., &c. v. Dupoyster, &c., 21 Ky. Law Rep., 515. Fort Jefferson Improvement Co., &c. v. Dupoyster, &c., 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1193, and Dupoyster, &c. v. Fort Jefferson Improvement Co., 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1782), hence much detail of fact will be omitted here.

The appellant claims that she not only owns the one-eighth by inheritance, but that she had acquired her husband's three-eighths interest in the land by virtue of a deed dated August 14, 1889, which he executed to her. The facts are the appellee procured a rescission of the contract of sale and claimed a lien upon J. C. Dupoyster's three-eighths interest in the land and the one-eighth interest which the appellant owned by inheritance, for the purchase money which had been paid to J. C. Dupoyster as an individual and as administrator of the estate of Ben S. Dupoyster. It appears that on September 17, 1890, in consideration of a large sum of money, Ben S. Dupoyster, J. C. Dupoyster and the appellant acknowledged a deed to appellee for a large tract of land, which deed was delivered to S. J. Moore in escrow. In a writing which accompanied the deed, it was recited that when appellee presented J. C. Dupoyster's receipt for the first payment on the land, it being $25,000, the deed was to be recorded. Instead of presenting a receipt for that amount, J. C. Dupoyster, in writing, consented that the deed should be recorded by means of the payment to him of $5,500 as administrator of Ben S. Dupoyster, whereupon the deed was recorded. Subsequently, the appellee paid J. C. Dupoyster sums aggregating about $3,000. The record shows that the $5,500 was paid out on the debts due by Ben S. Dupoyster's estate, and that the appellant, who is the wife of J. C. Dupoyster, never received any part of the purchase money paid to J. C. Dupoyster individually, or as administrator, and that she never consented that such payments should be made to her husband, or that the deed might be recorded. The court decreed at the instance of the appellee, that the contract of sale should be rescinded, and that it was entitled to a lien upon one-half of the land, being J. C. Dupoyster's three-eighths and the appellant's one-eighth interest in the land. From this judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

We will first consider the question as to J. C. Dupoyster's three-eighths interest. The deed which he executed to the appellant August 14, 1889, was not recorded until twelve years after the sale to the appellee; therefore, was not on record when the sale was made. We have reached the conclusion that the appellee's agents were not aware of the existence of the deed at the time of the sale to it, and that three-eighths of the land should be treated as the property of J. C. Dupoyster for the purpose of an equitable adjustment on the rescission of the contract between the appellee and J. C. Dupoyster. It, therefore, follows that the court properly adjudged a lien on that three-eighths interest in the land for the amount found to be due the appellee.

As to Rebecca S. Dupoyster's one-eighth interest, we reach a different conclusion. She never consented to part with her title to it, except on the condition that the cash payment was made. She only consented that the deed should be delivered and recorded when this was done. Of this act the appellee was fully aware. From the terms of the writing placing the deed in escrow, the appellee is not only charged with notice that the deed was only to be delivered upon that condition, but it actually agreed with the appellant that it was only to receive the deed on that condition. It knew the limitation that was placed upon the authority of J. C. Dupoyster to receive the money and the authority of Moore to have the deed recorded. It was not misled in this regard. So far as the appellant was concerned, no contract of sale of her one-eighth interest in the land was ever consummated. Her husband had no authority in law or otherwise, to sell her interest in the land, nor could his wrongful act in consenting that the deed should be recorded, be treated as a consent by her to the delivery of the deed, nor should it operate to divest her of title to her interest in the land, or to encumber it with a lien for money which she never received or consented that any one else should receive. If the husband's wrongful act can have either of these effects, it would be allowing him to consummate a sale of her land and encumber it, in opposition to her wishes. If A., B. and C. owned a track of land and they made a deed therefor and placed it in escrow with an agreement that it was to be delivered and recorded upon the payment to A. of a specified sum, and A., in violation of that agreement accepted a less sum and consented that the deed should be recorded, it would not be binding on B. and C., because it was delivered and recorded in violation of an agreement made with the grantee. B. and C. only agreed to a consummation of the sale upon a certain condition which never happened. The grantee in such a deed could not claim that he acquired B. and C.'s title to the land under the deed, because he obtained it in violation of the agreement. It follows that there was no contract of sale consummated between the appellee and Mrs. Dupoyster, hence it is a misnomer to say that a contract has been rescinded, so far as she is concerned. It would be most inequitable to burden her interest with a lien for money which J. C. Dupoyster received for himself individually and as administrator of Ben S. Dupoyster. It is urged that where a married woman sells her land by executory contract or otherwise, and the contract can not be enforced, the court will adjudge a lien upon her land for the amount which she has received by virtue of the contract. We concede this to be true, but the principle does not appy here, because the contract of sale as to her interest in the land was never consummated, hence there could be no rescission of the contract so far as she is concerned. The deed to the appellee should be set aside so far as it purports to convey her one-eighth.

The rule that the payment to one joint payee is a payment to all, is invoked to support the appellee's claim to a lien on appellants' interest in the land. In no proper sense was the appellant ever a payee, nor could she have been, except on the consummation of the sale in accordance with the terms of the writing evidencing the contract placing the deed in escrow. It was not within the power of the appellee and J. C. Dupoyster to make a contract of sale of her land to which she never gave her consent, and claim that thereby she became a joint payee with her husband and thus give him the right to collect her money. She never ratified or agreed to ratify the transaction, except upon the condition that the appellee pay all the purchase money, which it refused to do, because it could not obtain the interest of J. B. Dupoyster and Mrs. Edwards, which the appellant never owned or represented that she owned. For the apellant it has been urged that a married woman can not deliver a deed in escrow so as to thereby divest her of title to her land, but we have not deemed it necessary to enter into a discussion on this question, as is apparent from the conclusion we have reached.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the court below to adjudge to the appellant her one-eighth interest in the land free from the appellees' claim, and for further proceedings consistent with this opinion. And the judgment is affirmed on the appeal of J. C. Dupoyster, J. B. Dupoyster and Mrs. Edwards.

GASKIN, &c. v. CITY OF GEORGETOWN.

(Filed May 12, 1904.)

Cities—Reducing boundary—Trial — Continuance—Absent witnesses—On an application of the board of council of the city of Georgetown to change the boundary of said city so as to exclude about eighty legal voters and residents therefrom, which change was resisted by a number of citizens residing in said territory, it appearing on the day of trial that twenty-four of the witnesses residing in said territory for whom the sheriff had subpœnas, were absent and were returned "not found," and whose testimony was material for the defendants, it was error in the lower court to try the case without giving the defendants an opportunity to have said witnesses, most of whom were interested parties, present at the trial.

L. F. Sinclair and L. L. Bristow for appellants.

J. B. Finnell for appellee.

Appeal from Scott Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

The city of Georgetown, August 1, 1902, by its board of council, passed an ordinance proposing to strike certain territory therein described, from the corporate limits of that city, after which a petition was filed in the Scott Circuit Court by the city through its mayor and board of council, in accordance with section 3488, Kentucky Statutes, alleging a compliance with the provisions of that section, and praying the court to strike the described territory from the corporate boundary of the city.

At the October term, 1902, of the circuit court, the appellant, Z. R. Gaskin, and about eighty other persons, citizens and legal voters of the territory proposed to be stricken off, filed an answer to the petition of appellees, which traversed the allegations thereof, and interposed by affirmative averments certain objections to the striking from the city of Georgetown of the territory described in the ordinance and petition: That is to say, it is averred in the answer that to strike the proposed territory from the city would result in injury to the city, and to the property and legal rights of the inhabitants residing in the territory sought to be stricken off, in that it would deprive them of police, fire and water protection, prevent their children from attending the graded school for colored children in the city, and finally that not only a majority, but every citizen, resident and voter of the territory sought to be stricken off, was opposed to the change. The answer was signed by nearly all the voters and taxpayers of the territory sought to be stricken off. The reply filed by appellees not only traversed the affirmative allegations of the answer, but in addition alleged that the persons signing the answer did not reside in the territory sought to be stricken off, and that a majority of the voters and residents of the territory in question were not opposed to the change.

On October 23, 1902, the court assigned the case for trial on the following day, and on that day, presumably upon the calling of the case for trial, appellants moved for a continuance until the succeeding term, filing in support of the motion the affidavit of appellants Z. R. Gaskin and Thomas H. Carter. The court, however, overruled the motion, refused the continuance, and proceeded to try the cause. The trial resulted in a judgment granting the prayer of the petition, and the striking of the territory described therein from the boundary of the city of Georgetown. One of the grounds urged by appellants for a reversal of the judgment is, the alleged error of the lower court in refusing the continuance. Trial courts are allowed a broad discretion in the matter of granting or refusing continuances, which should be exercised in any given case according to the facts and circumstances thereof. But when there is an abuse of such discretion, operating to the prejudice of the substantial rights of the party applying for the continuance, it constitutes error, which may be corrected upon appeal by a court of revisory power.

It appears from the affidavit for continuance, which is in the usual technical form, that twenty-four of appellant's important witnesses were absent, when the case was called for trial in the court below. It further appears from the statements of the affidavit, that the absent witnesses would, if present, have testified that they were resident voters, property owners and taxpayers of the territory sought to be stricken from the corporate boundary of Georgetown; that they and all the inhabitants of the territory sought to be stricken off, were and are opposed to the proposed change, and that they had not been served with the subpœnas issued and placed in the hands of the sheriff the day before, though their names appear therein. In order that the materiality of this testimony may be understood, it will be well to bear in mind that two of the issues made by the pleadings were, first, was the proposed alteration of the boundary of the city of Georgetown opposed by a majority of the resident voters of the territory proposed to be stricken off; second, were the persons resisting the striking off the proposed territory resident voters of such territory?

Section 3483, Kentucky Statutes, as amended by Act March 22, 1902, provides the mode whereby the boundary of a city or town may be added to or reduced. When such action is desired, it must, according to the provisions of the statute supra, begin with the enactment by the board of council of an ordinance accurately defining the boundary to be added or stricken off. The ordinance must be published for not less than three weeks in a newspapers or if there be no newspaper in the city or county, by advertisement by handbills, to be posted for at least fifteen days at four or more public place, in the city, and as many at public places within the territory to be annexed or stricken off. Within thirty days after the adoption, publication and advertisement of such ordinance, and twenty days before the next succeeding term, a petition shall be filed in the circuit court of the county within which the city may be situated, in the name and on behalf of the city, showing compliance with the statute as to the enactment of the ordinance, its publication or advertisement, the object and purpose thereof, together with an accurate description, by metes and bounds, of the territory proposed to be annexed or stricken from the city, and praying for a judgment to annex or strike from the city the territory described, as the object may be. The statute further provides that notice of the filing of the petition shall be given in the same manner as provided for notice of the passage of the ordinance. If no defense be made at the first term of the court after the filing of the petition and notice of same, and the court shall make no order granting further time for making defense, the court shall render a judgment annexing or striking off the proposed territory, as the object of the proceedings may be. "But at the first term of the circuit court, or within the time fixed by the court by its order, any one or more of the resident voters of the territory proposed to be annexed or stricken off, may file a defense in said proceeding, setting forth the reason why such territory, or any part thereof should not be annexed to the city, or why the limits of the city should not be reduced. The case shall be tried by the court without the intervention of a jury. If the court, upon hearing, be satisfied that less than a majority of the resident voters of the territory sought to be annexed or stricken off, have remonstrated against the proposed extension or reduction, and that the proposed extension or reduction of the limits of the city, as the case may be, will be for the interest of the city, and will cause no material injury to the owners of real estate in the limits of the proposed extension or reduction, it shall so find, and the proposed extension or reduction shall be decreed or adjudged. But if the court shall find that a majority or more, of the resident voters of the territory to be affected, or the owner or owners of said property, if there be no resident voters, remonstrated against such change, and that such change will cause material injury to the owners of real estate in the limits of the proposed extension or reduction, it shall so find, and said extension or reduction shall be denied." * * *

We take it to be the meaning of the statute supra, that though the trial court is required to consult the wishes of the resident voters or property owners of the territory sought to be added or stricken off, the will of the majority, the one way or the other, is not absolute, but should be permitted to control, unless the conditions mentioned in the statutes, that would prevent its doing so, are found by the court to exist. In any event, it was not only proper, but necessary, for the chancellor to ascertain whether a majority of the resident voters of the territory proposed to be stricken from the boundary of the city of Georgetown, favored or opposed the change, and whether such of the persons as were resisting the changes were not resident voters of the territory proposed to be stricken off, for these were questions that vitally entered into, and should have had great weight in, the determination of the main question involved.

There can, therefore, be no doubt of the materiality of the testimony of the absent witnesses set forth in the affidavit. The fact that the absent witnessses were residents and voters of the territory sought to be stricken off, could doubtless have been proved by appellants, or others present at the trial, but the facts as to whether they favored or opposed the striking off the proposed territory, and whether they did or not sign the answer filed in the case, could have been proved only by themselves. The case is one in which numbers count. The record does not contain a bill of evidence heard on the trial in the court below, but it appears from a signed statement of the judge of that court which may be found in the record, that comparatively few of the many witnesses summoned or of the persons interested in the case, testified. Certainly not a sufficient number of them to enable the court to ascertain whether a majority of the resident voters in the territory proposed to be stricken off, were or not opposed to the change of boundary.

If the fact that a majority of the voters residing in the territory proposed to be stricken off, were opposed to the striking off, could have been ascertained in no other way than by introducing as witnesses all the voters in the territory, appellants had the right to introduce them upon the trial if their attendance could reasonably be procured, and were entitled to reasonable time and opportunity to have them summoned. The question of diligence in any given case must depend upon the facts and circumstances thereof. Appellants and those associated with them in resisting the proposed change of boundary, were not made parties to the action by appellees, but upon their own motion, and by filing answer during the appearance term. The framers of the statute evidently had in mind the difficulties likely to arise in the carrying out of its provisions. So, in view of the large number of persons to be affected by changes of municipal boundaries, to give them opportunity to make known their approval or objections to such changes, and at the same time prevent undue haste upon the part of the courts in passing upon the civil and property rights to be affected by the statute, it authorizes the court in which an action such as this is pending, in the event the resident voters of the territory proposed to be annexed or stricken off, have not time, or reasonable opportunity, to file a defense during the first term succeeding the bringing of the action, to fix by its order a later time subsequent to such term, within which to allow the defense to be filed. It would be but fair to presume that the answer was filed as soon as it could be prepared, after appellants learned of the pendency of the action.

It is true that section 9 of the Practice Act provides that "unless otherwise directed by the parties, the clerk shall issue subpœnas for witnesses to the first day of the term, and they shall attend at such days as the case in which they are subpœnaed shall be set for trial, and until the same is disposed of by trial or continuance: Provided, however, The court may, by rule entered upon its order book, direct the clerk to set actions at law for convenient days during the term as provided above, and to issue subpœnas to said days, instead of to the first day, as provided above." (Acts 1902, page 273.)

It will not, however, be contended that the foregoing rule of practice has any application to persons made parties to the action after the commencement of and during the appearance term. It appears from the record that on October 23, 1902, this case was assigned for trial on the following day, October 24th. It further appears that on the 23d of October, and immediately after the assignment of the case for trial, appellants caused subpœnas to be issued for eighty-five witnesses, including those for whose absence the continuance was asked, which subpœnas were at once placed in the hands of the sheriff for service, but for want of time he was unable to obtain service upon the twenty-four witnesses named in the affidavit, consequently, by reason thereof, and of the court's refusal to grant the continuance, appellants were deprived of the benefit of their testimony.

It was the duty of these absent witnesses as parties to this action to attend court and be present at the trial, and appellants, for that reason, had the right to assume that they would do so, yet they did not in fact rely upon such assumption, but caused subpœnas to issue for them when the case was assigned for trial as already indicated. The fact that the absent witnesses were parties to the action, or that they did not take sufficient interest in the case to attend court and testify without being subpœnaed, should not have been allowed to prejudice the rights of appellants, to whom their testimony was as important as if they had not been parties. It is, however, insisted for appellees that if the witnesses named in the affidavit all lived in the territory proposed to be stricken off, they could or ought to have been found by the officer to whom the subpœnas were given for service, and the fact that they were not found is urged as proof that they did not live in the territory indicated. There being nothing in the record to contradict the statements contained in the affidavit that they did reside in such territory, that statement for the purpose of determining whether the continuance should have been granted must be accepted as true. Besides, considering the shortness of the time afforded him for serving the subpœnas, it is not strange that the sheriff should have failed to find twenty-four out of eighty-five witnesses named therein. Their temporary absence from home, whether to avoid the subpœna or on legitimate business, would, under the circumstances, have prevented its service upon them.

The case of City of Lebanon v. Creel, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 865, relied on by appellants, was decided under the former statute, some of the provisions of which were materially different from those of the present or amended statute, for which reason we do not regard that decision as applicable here

Being of the opinion that there was no want of diligence upon the part of appellants in this case, therefore, because of the error of the lower court in refusing to grant them the continuance asked, the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with directions to grant them a new trial and for further proceedings consistent with the opinion herein.

Whole court sitting.

HAGER, AUDITOR v. FRANKLIN.

(Filed May 5, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Commonwealth's attorneys—Per centum of fines and forfeitures—When payable—The declaration of the general assembly that 50 per centum of the fines and forfeitures shall not be received by the Commonwealth's attorneys until collected and paid into the treasury, was equivalent to saying that it should be paid to him when the fines and forfeitures are collected and paid into the treasury.

2. Inchoate interest—When a judgment is rendered for a fine or forfeiture, it may be said that the Commonwealth's attorney has an inchoate interest in it, which ripens into a demand upon the treasury when it is collected and paid into it.

3. When applied—The mere fact that the judgment is rendered one year and is not collected and paid into the treasury until the next year, does not prevent the Commonwealth's attorney from receiving his per centum of it and applying it to his salary for the year in which it is collected.

4. Resignation or death—The fact that the Commonwealth's attorney might resign or die before the expiration of his term, is a contingency that can not be considered, as it is not the province of the executive officers or courts to legislate, nor to disregard laws enacted by the law-making department of the government.

5. Conclusion—The conclusion the court has reached is, that the Commonwealth's attorney is entitled to his per centum of the fines and forfeitures when collected and paid into the treasury, until his salary, including his $500 allowance, shall reach the maximum sum of $4,000 annually.

N. B. Hays and Loraine Mix for appellant.

T. L. Edelen for appellee.

Appeal from Franklin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The appellee, Robert B. Franklin, was the Commonwealth's attorney of the fourteenth judicial district for the term preceeding the first Monday in January, 1904. At the last November election he was re-elected and qualified on the first Monday in January, 1904. For the year of 1903 he was paid 4,000 out of the treasury, made up of the $500 fixed by the statute and his per cent. of fines recovered and paid into the State treasury. At the June term, 1903, of the Bourbon Circuit Court a judgment was rendered imposing a fine of $1,500 on the Peacock Distillery Co. At the December term of the same year of the same court a judgment was rendered against the Bluegrass Traction Co., imposing a fine of $500. An appeal from the first-named judgment was prosecuted to the Court of Appeals and there affirmed; and the judgment was paid into the treasury March 29, 1904. The judgment against the Bluegrass Traction Co. was paid into the State treasury in January, 1904.

The appellee, Franklin, has been paid in monthly installments the parts of the $500 salary fixed by the statute. He now claims he is entitled to 50 per cent. of the fines assessed against the Peacock Distillery Co. and the Bluegrass Traction Co. If this per cent. is paid him, he will have received about one half of the $4,000, which he is entitled to receive as compensation as Commonwealth's attorney for the present year, his right to which depends upon the interpretation of section 98 of the Constitution and sections 124 and 125, Kentucky Statutes, they read as follows:

Section 98 of the Constitution: "The compensation of the Commonwealth's attorney shall be by salary and such percentage of fines and forfeitures as may be fixed by law; and such salary shall be uniform in so far as the same shall be paid out of the State treasury, and not to exceed the sum of $500 per annum; but any county may make additional compensation, to be paid by said county. Should any percentage of fines and forfeitures be allowed by law, it shall not be paid except upon such proportion of the fines and forfeitures as have been collected and paid into the State treasury, and not until so collected and paid."

Section 124, Kentucky Statutes: "The Commonwealth's attorney shall receive from the State treasury 50 per centum of all judgments for fines and forfeitures rendered in favor of the Commonwealth in the several courts of his district, and this shall be in lieu of all taxed fees and perquisites; but he shall not be paid or receive any part of said per centum from the treasury except upon such proportion of the fines and forfeitures as have been collected and paid into the State treasury, and not until so collected and paid, unless that portion belonging to the Commonwealth shall be remitted by the governor."

Section 125, Kentucky Statutes: "No Commonwealth's attorney shall be paid, or receive as compensation for his services as such officer, for any one year, from the State treasury, more than $4,000; and should the salary and per centum of fines and forfeitures allowed under this act to such officer in any district, for any year, exceed said sum of $4,000, said excess shall not be paid to such officers, but the fiscal court or the board of commissioners, in counties where, for county governmental purposes, a city is, by law, separated from the remainder of the county of any county, may allow the Commonwealth's attorney for that county such compensation as they see proper, to be paid as other claims against the county are paid."

The lower court adjudged that the appellee was entitled to the 50 per centum of the fines. It is urged for reversal: First, that as the judgments were rendered in 1903 and the appellee having received $4,000 as salary for that year, he is not entitled to 50 per cent. of the fines paid into the treasury by virtue of the judgment; second, that the per centum of fines, the same as the salary fixed by law, should be paid monthly out of the treasury. It will be observed that under section 98 of the Constitution salaries of Commonwealth's attorneys should be fixed by law, and that it shall be uniform in so far as it is paid out of the treasury, and that it shall not exceed the sum of $500 per annum. It was also contemplated that in addition to the sum so limited to be paid out of the treasury, the general assembly should provide, by law, that they are to have a percentage of the fines and forfeitures collected and paid into the treasury. Section 124, Kentucky Statutes, provides that they shall receive from the State treasury 50 per cent. of all fines and forfeitures, but that the treasurer shall not pay that per centum

"except upon such proportion of the fines and forfeitures as have been collected and paid into the State treasury * * * unless that portion belonging to the Commonwealth shall be remitted by the governor."

Section 125, Kentucky Statutes, limits his salary to $4,000, payable out of the State treasury. The declaration of the general assembly that the 50 per centum should not be received by the Commonwealth's attorney until collected and paid into the treasury, was equivalent to saying that it should be paid to him when the fines and forfeitures were collected and paid into the treasury. The legislature could not have made its meaning clearer had it expressly provided that the 50 per centum of the fines and forfeitures should be paid to the Commonwealth's attorney when collected and paid into the treasury. When a judgment is rendered for a fine or forfeiture, it may be said that the Commonwealth's attorney has an inchoate interest in it, but that interest does not ripen into a demand upon the treasury until it is collected and paid into it. The mere fact that a judgment is rendered one year and is not collected until the next year and paid into the treasury, does not prevent the Commonwealth's attorney from receiving his per centum of it and applying it to his salary for the year in which it is collected, because the statute provides that when collected and paid into the treasury, he shall receive his per centum of it. It is urged that a Commonwealth's attorney might thus be enabled to collect his entire year's salary in the first months of the year and might then resign or die.

This may be true. That suggestion is fully answered by a statement that it is not the province of executive officers and courts to legislate, nor to disregard laws enacted by the law-making department of government. The Constitutional Convention saw proper to restrict the power of the general assembly so as not to allow Commonwealth's attorneys reasonable compensation, except upon the contingency that they could recover judgments for fines and forfeitures and have them paid into the State treasury. When the legislature has expressly provided that when the contingency arises which enables Commonwealth's attorneys to collect part of his salary, the courts ought not to hold that it has not arisen, simply because a Commonwealth's attorney might die or prove unfaithful to his trust.

It is urged that if the Commonwealth's attorney should be paid his per centum of fines and forfeitures monthly. If the legislature had recognized that the practical operation of the statute fixing the salary of the Commonwealth's attorney would give him his per centum of the fines and forfeitures monthly, it would have so declared. It must have known that this could not be done, because, at the close of many months in the year probably there would be nothing to the credit of the Commonwealth's attorney for fines and forfeitures, besides it is impossible to tell what the Commonwealth's attorney's per centum of fines and forfeitures will be during the year; therefore, it is not possible to pay his per centum in monthly installments. The conclusion the court has reached is, that the Commonwealth's attorney is entitled to his per centum of the fines and forfeitures when collected and paid into the treasury. This conclusion is in harmony with the spirit of the statute, for the amount of the Commonwealth's attorney's salary depends upon a contingency. If an event happens in the early part of the year which brings a sum to make up his salary he should have it, because it is.

possible that the contingency might not happen which would give him anything in addition to the $500, and if it did happen it might not be until the last of the year. Chinn v. Shackelford, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 1813, is in harmony with our conclusion in this case. We do not think the cases cited by the attorney general support the opposing view.

The judgment is affirmed.

WOOLRIDGE, &c. v. WOOLRIDGE.

(Filed May 13, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Guardian and ward—Construction of statute—Where a guardian failed to obtain authority from the county court as provided by section 2041, Kentucky Statutes, to institute an action for the sale of his ward's real estate, but after the institution of the suit and before taking proof or the rendition of the decree, he filed a petition in the county court to obtain such authority, which was granted, and this authority empowered the chancellor to decree the sale of the land, the sale will be upheld.

James Bradley for appellant.

Victor F. Bradley for appellee.

Appeal from Scott Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

The appellee, James R. Woolridge, who is the father and statutory guardian of the infant appellants, Marion and Annie Washington Woolridge, resides in the State of Tennessee. His wards reside with him in that State, and his appointment and qualification as guardian was in the county of their residence in the same State.

Appellant, as guardian of his wards, brought suit in the Scott Circuit Court of this State, to obtain a decree for the sale of a small, unimproved and unproductive tract of land of twenty-five acres, owned by his wards lying in Scott county. The infants were made defendants, summons was served upon their guardians ad litem, a warning order entered against them, and an attorney appointed to defend. Proof was taken by depositions to show, and it did show, that the land was indivisible, unimproved and unproductive, that an offer of $86 per acre, which appellee had received for the land, was its full value, and that its sale at that price, and a reinvestment of the proceeds would be more beneficial to the infant owners than to retain the land. Upon this evidence, after the customary reports from the guardian ad litem, attorney for the nonresident defendants, and the execution by the guardian of the bond required by section 493, Civil Code, a decree was duly rendered by the chancellor, directing the sale of the land at public auction by the commissioner, who was ordered to accept no bid below $86 per acre, and to pay the proceeds of the land when collected, to appellee as guardian of appellants.

It appears, however, that appellee before instituting the action failed to obtain of the county court of Scott county authority to do so, as required by section 2041, Kentucky Statutes. But after the institution of the suit, and before the taking of proof or the rendition of the decree therein, he filed a petition in the county court of Scott county to obtain such authority, which was granted him by judgment of that court, the judgment not only confering authority upon him as guardian, to bring the suit, but also to receive the proceeds of the land, and take same to the State of Tennessee for reinvestment, or other proper use of the infants. The guardian ad litem of the infants, complaining of the judgment of the circuit court, prosecutes this appeal which presents but one question for our consideration, viz.: Did the authority to maintain this action and receive the proceeds of the sale of the land, which, was conferred upon appellee, as guardian, by the county court after the institution of the action, empower the chancellor to decree the sale of the land? We think the question should be answered in the affirmative.

Section 2041 of the statute, supra, provides: "Where there is no guardian of a nonresident minor in this Commonwealth, his guardian appointed and qualified according to the law of the place where the minor resides, may collect, receive and remove to such place of residence, any personal estate of the monor being in this Commonwealth. Upon application by a petition in a summary way, the county court of the county having jurisdiction to appoint a guardian may authorize such foreign guardian to sue for, recover, and so remove any personal estate of such minor, or otherwise to act, as a guardian appointed in this Commonwealth."

The better practice would be for the foreign guardian to obtain of the county court the authority that may be conferred under the statute quoted, before bringing such an action as the one at bar, but we find nothing in the statute that would prevent the county court from conferring the necessary authority after suit is brought, provided it be done, as in this case, before judgment is rendered under which the guardian may come into the possession of the money or property of the infant sought to be affected by the action. The main purpose of the statute is to prevent the foreign guardian from collecting, receiving, or removing the personal estate of the ward, without authority from the county court having jurisdiction to allow it to be done. The authority for the purpose contemplated may be granted by the county court in a summary way, as was done in this case, and the amended petition showing the guardian's authority in this case, was filed before any steps were taken in the circuit court, by which the guardian could have recovered or received the money of his wards.

The case of Watts v. Wilson, 93 Ky., 495, and Parish, By, &c. v. Hatchett, 15 Ky. Law Rep., 847, are not in conflict with the views herein expressed. In those cases the guardian never received authority from the county court to institute, or maintain the actions, either before or after they were brought; consequently the proceedings in each case were properly held to be invalid.

Wherefore, the judgment is affirmed.

TANDY v. RILEY.

1. Malicious prosecution—Where a defendant in an action for malicious prosecution laid all of the facts upon which he bases his prosecution before a competent attorney, and fairly obtained his advice that such prosecution was legal, and he acted in good faith upon it, it is a complete defense to the action against him.

2. Joinder of actions—In an action for malicious prosecution and slander the court properly compelled plaintiff to elect which of the two actions he would prosecute, because, while the two charges are injuries to character, they amount to more than injuries to character, and the two actions can not be joined.

H. G. Botts for appellant.

Cammack & Perry for appellee.

Appeal from Owen Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

The parties to this action are first cousins, have lived in the same vicinity from their infancy, and were good friends until the month of February, 1901, when the subject of this controversy arose.

Early one morning in the month of February, 1901, before it was light, the appellant went to his kitchen and opened the side door, when a bundle of switches, which had been set against the door, fell into the room. Attached to this bundle was a note addressed to appellee, as follows: "If you and Sam Tandy don't stop so much d—d telephone talk, you will get h—l whipped out of you with these switches." After it was light, appellee and another followed the tracks of persons who had placed the switches at his door, on to or near the premises of appellant. One of the persons wore a small sharp-pointed shoe, and the other appeared as if he had on a felt boot, i. e., a sock with no shoe to it, but with an overshoe on the outside. Appellee knew that appellant had two men working for him that wore the footwear described. Appellant owned, or was interested in a telephone line which made connection with a line to Carrolton, Ky. Appellee was, at the time, endeavoring to construct another line to connect with a line to Carrolton, and he was impressed with the belief that this was the telephone matter referred to in the note left with the switches. Appellee consulted with the county judge and related the circumstances to him, who advised him to submit the facts to the Commonwealth's attorney, which he did, and the attorney informed him that a felony had been committed, and requested him to go before the grand jury, which was then in session, and relate to that body the facts. Appellee did so, and also gave to the grand jury the names of the two men who worked for appellant, viz., Arch Long and Gabe May. Long was summoned and testified before the grand jury that he and Gabe May placed the switches at the door of appellee and Sam Tandy; that Gabe May wrote both of the notes, one of which was read to appellant and the other to appellant's wife; that appellant advised the placing of the switches at his brother, Sam Tandy's door, to avert suspicion. Upon this evidence, the grand jury returned an indictment against May, Long and the appellant for a felony, for the violation of section 1241a of the Kentucky Statutes. May and Long escaped, and appellant had his trial and was acquitted.

Appellant then brought this action against appellee, alleging that he falsely, willfully, maliciously and without probable cause, obtained this indictment against him, and caused his arrest, and aided in the prosecution thereof, to his damage in the sum of $10,000. In another paragraph of the petition he sued for slander, setting forth the objectionable and defamatory language, and asked damages to the extent of $10,000. On motion of appellee the court compelled appellant to elect which cause he would prosecute; the one for malicious prosecution, or the one for slander, and he elected to prosecute for malicious prosecution.

Appellee answered, denying the malice, false arrest and the want of probable cause, and also pleaded as a defense that he, in good faith, related truthfully all the facts connected with the transaction, to worthy and eminent counsel and sought their advice in the matter, and was advised by this counsel that a felony had been committed, and was advised by the Commonwealth's attorney for that district to go before the grand jury and relate the facts to that body for its investigation, which he did. The appellant did not reply to this affirmative matter and defense, nor was it controverted of record. On the trial evidence was heard, and at its conclusion the court, at the instance of appellee, peremptorily instructed the jury to find for appellee. The jury returned a verdict as directed, and the court dismissed appellant's petition, and overruled his motion for a new trial, and he has appealed. His first complaint is that the court erred in forcing him to elect which paragraph of his petition he would prosecute, and contends that the two causes of action were properly joined under section 83, subsection 5, of the Civil Code. It is true that, in a sense, malicious prosecutions, like slander, are injuries to character. But malicious prosecutions and false arrest amount to more than injury to character; it is an injury to the person. But this is not an open question. This court in the case of Dragoo v. Levi, 2 Duv., 520, has passed upon this exact question, holding that these actions could not be joined.

He also complains that the court erred to his prejudice in giving to the jury the peremptory instruction. In the case of Masker v. McCourt, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 1897, this court decided that if a defendant in an action for malicious prosecution, laid all the facts upon which he based his prosecution before a competent attorney, and fairly obtained his advice that such prosecution was legal, and he acted in good faith upon it, it was a complete defense to the action. (Ahrens & Ott Mfg. Co. v. Hoehr, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 299; Lancaster v. Langston, 18 Ky. Law Rep., 299.)

Appellee's pleading in this case alleges that he obtained the advice of counsel in the way and manner thus stated, and this was not controverted by appellant, and as the pleadings stood, appellee was entitled to the peremptory instruction. Even if we are mistaken in this, appellee's proof sustained his pleading on this point, and it was not contradicted, and he was entitled to the instruction on the evidence. Appellant's acquittal on the indictment was not evidence, or sufficient evidence, of the want of probable cause on the part of appellee.

Wherefore, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

TOWN OF BARDWELL v. HARLIN, &c.

(Filed May 12, 1904.)

Municipal corporations—Sixth class towns—Tax rate—Constitution—Bardwell, a town of the sixth class, having by a two-thirds vote created a bonded debt for waterworks in 1901, and having a regular tax levy of 50 cents on the $100 worth of taxable property in said town for current expenses, can not make an additional levy of 50 cents on the $100 worth of property therein to pay interest on its bonded debt aforesaid, same being in conflict with section 157 of the Constitution, providing that for other than school purposes, the tax rate of towns of less population than 10,000 shall not exceed 75 cents on the $100 worth of property.

J. W. Nichols for appellant.

Shelbourne & Kane for appellee.

Appeal from Carlisle Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

At the November election, 1901, two-thirds of the qualified electors of Bardwell, a town of the sixth class, voted to incur a bonded indebtedness of $9,000 to enable the town authorities to erect a waterworks for the benefit of the citizens of the town. In pursuance to this vote eighteen bonds of the town for $500 each, due in twenty years, were issued and sold by the trustees of the town, realizing therefor $9,660 in cash, which was paid into the town treasury. Prior to the creation of this indebtedness, the trustees of the town had regularly levied a tax of 50 cents on each $100 of taxable property within the limits of the town to pay the current expenses thereof. After the issual and sale of the bonds in January, 1903, the trustees of the town in addition to the usual levy to meet current expenses, by proper ordinance levied a special tax of 50 cents on the $100 of taxable property in the town, to pay the interest on these bonds and to create a sinking fund for the payment of the principal thereof at maturity. Whereupon appellees, residents and taxpayers of the town, brought this action against the town and its collecting officer, to enjoin the collection under the ordinance of so much of said levy as was in excess of 75 cents on the $100 of taxable property within the town, on the ground that to this extent the tax was ultra vires. The defendants in their answer, plead the various ordinances authorizing them to incur the debt to build waterworks, and allege that the special tax of 50 cents was necessary to meet the interest on the bonds as it matured, and to pay off the bonds themselves at their maturity, and claim that in so doing they were within their legal and constitutional power. A general demurrer was filed to this answer by the plaintiffs, which was sustained by the trial court, and defendants declining to plead further, judgment was rendered enjoining and restraining the town authorities from collecting taxes under the levy, in excess of 75 cents on each $100 of taxable property within the town, and the defendants have appealed.

The decision of the questions presented by the appeal involves the construction of sections 157, 158 and 159 of the Constitution. Appellants contended that the limitation contained in section 157 of the Constitution of a tax rate of 75 cents on the $100 for towns and cities having less than 10,000 inhabitants, only applies to the rate of taxation which may be levied by the municipal authorities for the ordinary current expenses of the town, and does not apply to an indebtedness which has been created by a vote of the electors; that as to indebtedness of this character, section 159 of the Constitution expressly confers the authority and makes it the duty of the municipal authorities to levy such additional tax as may, in their judgment, be necessary to provide the means for the extinguishment of a debt so contracted by a vote of the people. The sections referred to were plainly intended to limit the tax rate and indebtedness of municipalities of every class, by fixing a maximum tax rate and per centum of indebtedness upon the assessed valuation of property therein, beyond which they could never go except, first, for school purposes; second, for the purpose of paying the interest and providing a sinking fund for the extinction of indebtedness contracted before the adoption of the Constitution; and, third, where the public health or safety of the municipality should so require.

Section 157 expressly provides that for other than school purposes the tax of all cities and towns having less than 10,000 inhabitants, shall not exceed 75 cents on the $100, unless it be necessary to enable such city to pay the interest on and provide a sinking fund for the extinction of indebtedness contracted before the adoption of the Constitution. Section 158 provides that towns of the class to which Bardwell belongs shall not be authorized or permitted to incur indebtedness to an amount including existing indebtedness exceeding in the aggregate 3 per centum on the value of the taxable property therein, to be estimated by the assessment next before the last assessment, unless, before the adoption of the Constitution, such municipality had incurred an indebtedness in excess of such limitation. And to still further emphasize the purpose of the contention it was expressly provided by section 159, that when any city, town, taxing district or other municipality was authorized to contract an indebtedness, it should be required at the same time to provide for the collection of an annual tax sufficient to pay the interest thereon, and to create a sinking fund for the payment of the principal thereof within not more than forty years from the time of contracting the same. An examination of the debates which followed the report of the committee on municipalities in the constitutional convention, shows that this was the construction placed upon the section at that time.

The chairman of the committee in explaining the provisions of the report, used these words: "The second, third and fourth clauses relate to and control the power and methods of taxation. Property holders must have some rights even against a majority. Unlimited taxation may mean confiscation, and the citizen has a right to know that there is a limit beyond which no taxation can ever go."

The construction contended for by appellant would have the effect of entirely abrogating the limitation contained in these constitutional provisions for the protection of taxpayers. These sections were construed in Whaley v. Commonwealth, 110 Ky. 154, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 92; O'Bryan v. City of Owensboro, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 469-645; Sparks v. Robertson, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 2336; and in each of these cases the construction indicated herein was adopted. In our opinion appellant has no power to levy or collect a tax in excess of 75 cents on the $100 upon the value of the taxable property of the town.

Judgment affirmed.

CLEVELAND, CINCINNATI, CHICAGO & ST. LOUIS RY. CO. v. DRUIEN.

(Filed May 12, 1904.)

1. Contracts to be partly performed in each of two States—A contract which is to be partly performed in each of two States or countries, is presumed to be governed by the law in force in the State or country in which it is made.

2. Carriers—Liability for damage by fire not caused by its negligence—By the laws of the State of Illinois a stipulation in a contract by a common carrier, limiting its liability for loss from fire not caused by its negligence, is valid and enforcible, and, therefore, where in a contract made by appellant in the State of Illinois with appellee for the shipment of a carload of horses from Peoria, Ill., to Louisville, Ky., in which the liability of the carrier was limited to such loss only as was caused by its own negligence, there can be no recovery for damages occurring to appellee's horses by fire in said shipment, which was not caused by the carrier's negligence.

Humphrey, Burnett & Humphrey and John T. Dye for appellant.

Fairleigh, Straus & Fairleigh and G. S. & J. A. Fulton for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the oourt by Judge O'Rear.

The appellant, Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis Ry. Co., is an Ohio and Indiana corporation, operating a line of railroad connecting Peoria, in the State of Illinois, with Louisville, in the State of Kentucky. The latter city is one of the termini of its railroad.

On the 20th day of July, 1899, the appellee delivered to the appellant at Peoria, Ill., sixteen horses, being one car load, to be transported by the appellant over its line of railroad from Peoria to Louisville, there to be delivered by the appellant to its connecting line for transportation to Bardstown in Nelson county, Ky. The shipment was a through one from Peoria, Ill., to Bardstown, Ky. The railroad company at the time it received the horses, made and delivered to the appellee a through bill of lading, providing for the delivery to its connecting line at Louisville, which contained stipulations limiting its liability for loss or damage to the property while in transit. On appellant's line of railroad, at a point in the State of Illinois, the car in which appellee's horses were, caught fire while the train was running, whereby three of the horses were killed, and two others so severely injured as to practically destroy their value. This suit was brought on the contract of carriage to recover of appellant the damages sustained by appellee for the loss and injuries named. The petition charged the loss and damages in this language: "Plaintiff avers that while said horses were in transit and being transported by defendant under its said agreement, and by the negligence of the defendant, three of said horses were killed or so injured that they died therefrom within less than seven days, and two others severely injured so as to greatly impair their value. All of which injuries were received and incurred on defendant's line of railway in the State of Illinois, while in defendant's custody and under its control, and on said — day of July, 1899; all to the damage of the plaintiff in the sum of $1,375."

The answer denied the charge of negligence. By the second paragraph of the answer the railway company pleaded that the horses were delivered to it in Illinois; that the bill of lading evidencing the contract between the parties, was there signed by the railway company and the plaintiff, through his agent; that this bill of lading provided that the railway company should not be responsible for any injury occasioned to the horses by fire, not the result of the negligence of the railway company; that the only injury received by the horses was from an accidental fire which was not the fault of the railway company; that this stipulation in the bill of lading was valid by the law of the State of Illinois; that the contract of shipment was made in Illinois; that the carriage began in that State, and that the fire occurred in that State.

Other defenses were tendered in additional paragraphs of the answer, but a demurrer was sustained to them. In view of the conclusion at which we have arrived, we do not deem it necessary to notice further the defenses held bad on demurrer. The demurrer was overruled as to the first two paragraphs. The effect of the ruling of the court was to hold:

1st. That the stipulation limiting the liability of the carrier for loss or damage resulting from fire not caused by its negligence, is a valid stipulation, enforcible against the plaintiff in this action.

2d. That, therefore, the denial of negligence is a sufficient plea.

Upon the issue whether the fire was the result of appellants' negligence the jury found a verdict for the railroad company. Upon motion for a new trial made by the plaintiff the court retracted its ruling, and held that the stipulation contained in the bill of lading limiting the liability of the carrier, is not an enforcible one in this action. The new trial was consequently granted. At the second trial, precisely the same evidence was introduced as upon the first. The court peremptorily directed the jury to find the plaintiff's damages, about which there was really little or no dispute. This ruling of the trial court presents the real question for decision here, which is: was the stipulation in the bill of lading valid as a defense to this action?

It is claimed by appellant, and conceded by appellee, that the contract is to be regarded as an Illinois contract, and, therefore, to be construed and given effect according to the laws of the State of Illinois. But appellee makes this concession with the proviso that the terms of the contract do not contravene any general public policy of the State of Kentucky.

The rule for the construction of contracts made in one country to be performed wholly or in part in another, as applied by the courts of America and England, is a common law rule. It is the result of the efforts of the court to enforce the agreement of the parties to the undertaking. Foremost in such an inquiry, where the instrument itself is silent or ambiguous upon a given point, is to find the intention of the parties, to the end of giving it effect. It is presumed where the contract is made in one country to be performed wholly in another, that the laws of the latter were in the minds of the contracting parties, and that the terms of the contract were made with respect thereto. But where the agreement was to be performed partly in the country where made, and partly elsewhere, the general rule seems to be that the laws of the country where the contract was made were in the contemplation of the parties, as to its legal meaning and effect, and it will be construed and enforced accordingly. (2 Parsons on Contracts, 570; Bishop on Contracts, sections 1891-2-3; the text and authorities in 5 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 2d edition, 302, also sustain the foregoing statement.)

But there are necessary exceptions to this rule. As where the contract, though valid where made, is immoral, and the like. (Bishop on Contracts, section 1882.) This presumed intention of the parties, being based upon probability, can not be entertained, at least ought not to be, when to do so would be to convict them of an intention to violate a statute, whether there is a penalty attached to it or not. It may be doubted whether, in the general run of such transactions, the parties really have in mind the laws of either of the States. The fiction is a necessary convenience contrived by the courts to supply those latencies that seem to take for granted that the law, which is very often the outgrowth or the beginning of a custom, and, therefore, generally known and observed, was to be resorted to in the interpretation of the terms of the agreement, being, as is sometimes said, read into the agreement. Otherwise the contract would be meaningless, or so obscure as to its meaning as to be unenforcible, which, of course, could not have been mutually intended. But the rule is not a hard and fast one. Appellee urges that one of its exceptions is where, though it were the real intention of the parties that the contract should be interpreted by the laws of the country where made and where it was to be partly performed, its terms are in violation of the public policy of the country where it is sought to be enforced, the courts of the latter will not enforce such objectionable terms; that to do so would be to make the agreement of the parties paramount to the laws of the forum, and to compel the courts to violate the laws of their State, which they are sworn to uphold, in order to carry into effect an agreement between individuals. This point is made clear it is argued by applying to the attempted enforcement of this contract section 196 of the Constitution of this State, which reads as follows: "Transportation of freight and passengers by railroad, steamboat or other common carrier, shall be so regulated, by general law, as to prevent unjust discrimination. No common carrier shall be permitted to contract for relief from its common law liability."

At the common law, which obtains in Illinois as well as in this State, a common carrier is liable for loss of freight in its charge, occurring by fire whether or not caused by its own negligence, its liability being that of an insurer. (Lawson Contract of Carriers, 244; Rorer on Railroads, 1238; Adams Express Co. v. Guthrie, 9 Bush, 78; Adams Express Co. v. Nock, 2 Duv., 562.) But at comomn law it could limit its liability for loss occurring by fire not caused by its negligence. (Anchor Line v. Dates, 68 Ill., 369; Adams Express Co. v. Haynes, 42 Ill., 89; Anchor Line v. Knowles, 66 Ill., 150; Merchants Despatch Co. v. Theilbar, 86 Ill., 71; Merchants Despatch Co. v. Leysor, 89 Ill., 43; Black v. Wabash Ry., 111 Ill., 351; Brown v. Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co., 36 Ill. App., 140; First National Bank of Hupeston v. Lake Erie R. R., 65 Ill. App., 21; Illinois Central R. R. Co. v. Frankenberg, 54 Ill., 88; Lawson on Contract of Carriers, 244.)

Under section 196 of the Constitution such contracts can no longer be made in this State.

Appellee contends that the provision of the Constitution is the most emphatic indication possible of the public policy of this State on that subject; that no contract to carry freight in this State can limit the common law liability of the carrier with respect thereto, wherever made. He goes further. He insists that a contract by a common carrier to carry freight anywhere, even if made and to be executed entirely out of this State, if liability is sought to be enforced under it in this State, can not be enforced here; that the public policy of this State forbids its enforcement, if to do so, would be to limit its common law liability.

The cases of The Kensington, 183 U S., 263, and Liverpool Steam Co. v. Phœnix Insurance Co., 129 U. S., 397, and Chicago, &c., R. R. Co. v. Gardner, 51 Neb., 70, are cited and relied on as sustaining appellee's position.

An earnest desire to contribute to the uniformity of the law, as well as great respect for the eminent courts whose decisions are invoked, have lead us to a careful examination of the opinions, and of what we understand to be the principle controlling them.

In the case of The Kensington, 183 U. S., 263, the facts were these: The Kensington, a steamer transporting passengers from Antwerp to New York, issued to a passenger at Antwerp a ticket for New York, which had printed on it stipulations relieving the steamship company from certain acts of negligence on the part of its servants. A libel was filed by the passenger in a Federal court to recover damages for the loss of baggage belonging to the passenger. The contract against liability was relied on to defeat a recovery, and the laws of Belgium were invoked to support the validity of the contract because it was made in Belgium, where the limitations of liability of the carrier even as against its own negligence was valid. Mr. Justice White, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "Testing the exemptions found in the ticket, by the rule of public policy, it is apparent that they were void, since they unequivocally sought to relieve the carrier from the initial duty of furnishing a seaworthy vessel, for all neglect in loading or stowing, and, indeed, for any and every fault of commission or omission on the part of the carrier or his servants * * * As the ticket was finally countersigned in Belgium, and one of the conditions printed on its face provides that 'all questions arising hereunder are to be settled according to the Belgium law, with reference to which this contract is made,' it is insisted that such law should be applied, as proof was offered showing that the law of Belgium authorized the conditions. The contention amounts to this: Where a contract is made in a foreign country, to be executed at least in part in the United States, the law of the foreign country, either by its own force, or in virtue of the agreement of the contracting parties, must be enforced by the courts of the United States, even although to do so requires the violation of the public policy of the United States. To state the proposition is, we think, to answer it. It is true, as a general rule, that the lex loci governs, and it is also true that the intention of the parties to a contract will be sought out and enforced. But both these elementary principles are subordinate to and qualified by the doctrine that neither by comity nor by the will of contracting parties, can the public policy of a country be set at naught. (Story, Conflict of Laws, sections 38, 244.) * * * In the very nature of things, the premises, upon which this decision must rest, is controlling here, unless it be said that a contract, made in a foreign country, to be executed in part in the United States, is more potential to overthrow the public policy, enforced in the courts of the United States, than would be a similar contract, validly made, in one of the States of the Union. Nor is the suggestion that, because there is no statute expressly prohibiting such contracts, and because it is assumed no offense against morality is committed in making them, therefore, they should be enforced despite the settled rule of public policy to the contrary. The existence of the rule of public policy, not the ultimate causes upon which it may depend, is the criterion."

We have quoted thus freely from the opinion of the learned justice, not only because it is the strongest statement of the general principle on which appellee relies to which our attention has been directed, but also because we are in accord with it. The other Supreme Court case, Liverpool Steam Co. v. Phœnix Insurance Co., is like the case of The Genesee. In each of these cases it is to be noticed that the contracts were to be partly performed in the United States, and almost wholly within their jurisdiction. In each of them the injury sustained, the breach of the contracts, was within the maritime jurisdiction of the United States Courts, to wit, upon the high seas. The gist of these decisions is that where parties contract, to be partly performed in the United States, and where the breach occurs and the liability attaches within their jurisdiction, their courts in construing the contract, will apply to it their own laws. Neither of the cases go so far as to say, nor do we understand that they intimate, that if the breach of a valid contract made in a foreign country, had occurred there, and, therefore, the liability of the carrier had been initiated and consummated there, that the provisions of the contract would not have been a good defense to a suit brought upon it in the courts of the United States, although such provisions were against the public policy of the United States. The Nebraska case does not show where the loss occurred. It does not appear in its statements to be necessarily opposed to these views.

The public policy of this State is necessarily confined to the regulation of its own affairs and transactions occurring within its sovereignty. No State can be said to have a public policy as to the administration of justice, or as to the service of quasi public agencies, or as to contracts made with respect thereto, transpiring wholly abroad. The public policy of a State can no more have extra-territorial effect than can a statute of the State. If the State of Illinois permits the making of contracts by common carriers limiting their liability for loss of freight not by their own negligence, that is a policy of that sovereignty which can not possibly concern the State of Kentucky. Such contract made there, and to be performed there, being valid there, is the lawful agreement of the parties to it. Their minds have met, and the consideration for it has been based upon that condition and state of law. If one of the parties sues in this State to enforce a liability under such contract, it in no wise involves the public policy of this State for our courts to determine what the rights of the parties were before they came into court, and to adjudge that liability according to their contract, there being noting immoral in it. But whether or not it would be enforced here by granting affirmative relief, if its terms presented a complete defense to the suit of the other party upon it, that defense ought to be allowed. We know that there are freight railroads that traverse both the States of Illinois and Kentucky. A shipment of freight contracted, begun and ended in the State of Illinois is the making and execution of an Illinois contract. If sued there upon it, the carrier could plead its terms as a defense to certain liability under it. Why should the courts of this State, if the complainant should sue the carrier here, it having agents here upon whom process might be served, annul a provision of the contract that was legal where made, where it was to be executed, and where it was executed? Instead of enforcing a valid contract of parties, that would be to make a contract for them, which neither had ever contemplated, and which possibly one of them at least might have refused to enter into.

When a contract of shipment is made to be partly performed in another State where made and partly in this State, the agreement of the parties, if valid where made, ought to bind them as to all rights and defenses accruing under the contract in that State, although the provision could not be binding if made here. But as to that part of the contract that is to be performed in Kentucky, it will be read in the light of the laws and Constitution of this State, and be construed and applied accordingly. It will be conclusively presumed that the parties so intended, and that, therefore, the provision limiting the carrier's common law liability was not intended to apply to that part of the shipment that was to be performed here, for the court will not presume that the parties intended either a vain or illegal thing. That contracts to be performed partly in two States will be construed according to the laws of each of the States relating to the portions to be performed there respectively, is sustained in Bishop on Contracts, section 1394.

If shipper and carrier by entering into the contract beyond this State, could incorporate binding provisions in it limiting the duties and liabilities of carriers in this State notwithstanding the prohibition of the Constitution, it would be to put the bargains of individuals above the organic law, and to substitute them for that public policy exercised by the State for the best welfare of the whole people of an organized society. This they ought not, and will not, be permitted to do.

The test then comes, when and where did the liability under the contract before us occur? It is admitted, and it is clear, that it is an Illinois contract that is valid in that State; and that it was to be partly performed in that State. While being so performed it was broken there. Appellee contends that the contract bound the carrier to deliver the horses at the agreed destination which was in Kentucky, and that the failure to deliver was the breach of the contract, which occurred in this State. But the contract was not only to deliver, it was also to safely carry. It was broken in Illinois when the horses were killed. A cause of action upon the contract instantly arose. A suit could have been maintained there that moment for its breach. The agreement, the duty of the carrier, its failure if it did fail, and its contract immunity from that cause of loss, all arose under, and are to be controlled by, the laws of Illinois. Up to that time there was not an incident of the parties' agreement or rights relating thereto, that had come under the laws of Kentucky, or that the public policy of this State could possibly effect. This suit is to enforce those rights and liabilities as of the time and place of their occurrence, not to change them.

It is, therefore, directed that the judgment appealed from be reversed and that the cause be returned to the circuit court, with directions to enter judgment upon the first verdict.

CONNOR v. HOME AND SAVINGS FUND CO. BUILDING ASSOCIATION.

1. Decretal sale—Confirmation—Failure to make deed—Subsequent adjudications—Valid title—A lot purchased at decretal sale, made more than twenty-five years ago, which sale was confirmed by the court and a deed ordered to be made to the purchaser, but was not made, and which sale has, in two subsequent adjudications in which all persons in interest were parties, been recognized and confirmed and a deed made thereunder, passed a valid title to the purchaser.

2. Authority of guardian to borrow money to pay off lien on ward's property—The circuit court has no authority to authorize a guardian to borrow money with which to pay off a lien on property in which the wards have a remainder interest.

3. Life tenant—Subrogation—Liens paid by him on property in which she has a life interest—A life tenant in property on which there is a mortgage lien, by paying said mortgage, is entitled to be subrogated to the lien of the mortgagee to the extent of the principal of the debt which he paid.

E. L. McDonald for appellant.

John L. Jackman for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

This is an appeal from an order of court overruling exceptions to the commissioner's report and confirming the report of a sale of a house and lot in the city of Louisville, Ky.

The appellant presents only two exceptions upon which he asks for a reversal. The first is that he can not acquire a good title to the property on the ground that the legal title thereto is still outstanding in one J. M. Bryant or his trustee, because no deed was made to the purchaser under a judicial sale made more than twenty-five years since, in a suit instituted by Bryant's trustee to settle his estate. The agreed facts are that in the year 1876, Henry D. Pope, as trustee of J. M. Bryant, filed an action in the Louisville Chancery Court against J. M. Bryant and his creditors, to settle his estate and to enforce a mortgage lien on various lots in Bryant's subdivision. The lots were sold by order of court, and H. D. Pope became the purchaser. One of the lots being the one in controversy. The sale was confirmed May 26, 1876. On April 27, 1877, nearly a year thereafter, an order was entered suggesting the death of H. D. Pope and directing the deed to be made to his widow and children, according to their respective interests. No deed was made pursuant to this order. Prior to this order the administrator of H. D. Pope instituted an action in the same court, making his widow and children and creditors defendants, and upon the answer, counterclaim and cross petition of George B. Eastin, trustee of Minor S. Pope, it was adjudged that Eastin, as such trustee, is entitled to half of these lots purchased by H. D. Pope, and commissioners were appointed to make a division. The report of the commissioners was confirmed April 16, 1881, the lot now in question being one of the lots allotted to Eastin, trustee of Minor S. Pope. Afterward, Eastin filed the amended and supplemental answer and cross petition, to which J. M. Bryant and W. O. Dodd, his assignee in bankruptcy, were also made defendants, in which he alleged the fact that no deed had been made in the former action to the property purchased by H. D. Pope, and on the 13th day of June, 1881, the court in that action, made an order divesting Bryant and Dodd of all interest in this property; also divesting the widow and children of H. D. Pope of all interest therein, and confirmed the title in Eastin, as trustee of Minor S. Pope. Subsequently Eastin, as trustee, brought an action in the same court against Thomas P. Jacobs, administrator of Minor S. Pope, and his heirs and creditors, for the purpose of settling the accounts of the trustee and the estate of the decedent, in which all the facts were set forth contained in the supplemental answer and cross petition, and the judgment thereon referred to. In this last action a judgment was entered July 10, 1890, ordering a sale of all the property allotted to Eastin, trustee, and at the sale thereof W. E. Young became the purchaser of the lot now in question, which sale was confirmed November 3, 1890, and a deed was made to him. He afterwards conveyed this lot to Mrs. Irvine, the mother of the infant defendants herein.

We are of the opinion under the facts of this case that Bryant, Dodd and the widow of H. D. Pope and his children were, by the action of the court, divested of all title and interest they had in this property. The case of Gill v. Hewitt, 7 Bush, 10, is not like this case. In that case there were no steps taken by suppemental proceedings or otherwise to perfect the title.

In the case of Jones v. Bigstaff, 95 Ky., 395, it was held that where the report of division had been confirmed but no deeds were made, the parties having gone into possession of their portions, the division was regarded as effective as if the grant had been expressly made.

Appellant's second exception is in substance that the court, under the facts of this case, had no jurisdiction to render a judgment ordering a sale of the property of the infant defendants. The facts are briefly these: On January 30, 1891, Hugh J. Irvine, defendant in the court below, purchased the lot of land now in question, and had it conveyed to his wife as her general estate. On September 21, 1891, Irvine and wife mortgaged the property to William Herman for $650 borrowed money, which was used in erecting a residence on the property. Mrs. Irvine died intestate in 1893, survived by her husband and two infant children, also defendants in the court below. In 1897, Herman's mortgage having fallen due, he threatened to enforce his mortgage lien. Irvine nor his children had any means to pay the debt and applied to appellee for a mortgage loan on the property for $850 with which to pay off the Herman mortgage, together with street claims and back taxes which had accumulated against the property. The appellee declined to make the loan unless he got leave of the court to join in the mortgage as the statutory guardian of his infant children. On February 9, 1897, Irvine, in his own right, and as such guardian of the infants, filed his petition in the Jefferson Circuit Court setting out all the facts, and a judgment was entered granting the prayer. Whereupon the mortgage was executed, and the money was received from the appellee and used in paying off the Herman mortgage, street claims and back taxes as provided in the judgment.

Irvine, the guardian, who was also the life tenant, made the payment that was stipulated in the mortgage until the debt was reduced to $665, and then having failed to continue the payments, this action was instituted in the court below by the appellee in March, 1902, to enforce its lien. The chancellor decided that the mortgage was void as to the infants, but held that the mortgagee was entitled to be subrogated to the extent of $650, the amount of the Herman mortgage without interest, upon the principle that it was the duty of the life tenant to keep down the interest. Also to the extent of $32, one half the cost of the street improvements, dividing this equally between the life tenant and the remainderman, as a permanent improvement to the property, and to this extent a judgment was rendered enforcing appellee's lien. Under the authority of the case of Posey, Receiver v. Dugan, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 1104, the court was correct in adjudging this mortgage void. The court had no power to authorize the guardian to mortgage his ward's realty; the jurisdiction of the court in such matters are not inherent, but statutory.

In the Dugan case, supra, the chancellor gave leave to the guardian to encumber the infant's real estate for the purpose of erecting costly improvements thereon, while in the present case the chancellor gave leave to the guardian to mortgage the property of the infants to keep it from being sold under an old mortgage executed by the ancestor. It was simply the substitution of the new mortgage for the old. The loan in this case was granted at the request of the guardian and sanctioned by the chancellor in order to keep the property from being sold, all acting in good faith.

In the case of Flanary v. Utley, 9 Ky. Law Rep., 585, the court said: "Subrogation is but an equitable assignment. In our opinion the existence of a contract is not necessary to the right. It may arise from the circumstances of the case. It is an invention of equity founded upon natural justice, and is to be exercised for the protection of the innocent."

In the case of Donahue v. Daniels, 58 Md., 595, money was loaned to a guardian for the purpose of removing incumbrances on the ward's property, in the way of taxes and ground rent; it was held that although the life tenant was bound to keep these charges down during his tenancy, and failing to do so, they constituted liens for which the property could be sold, yet the guardian removing those incumbrances against his ward's property, would have a just and legitimate claim against them, and would be entitled to the benefit of the lien which he paid off; and that when he borrowed money for that purpose, and it was so applied, the lender was entitled to be subrogated to the guardian's rights in respect to the wards and their property.

The case of State National Bank v. Viceroy, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 894, was an action brought to enforce a mortgage to which the wife pleaded coverture. The court, after quoting the case of Treadway v. Pharis, 13 Ky. Law Rep., 789, and Kelly v. Ball, 14 Ky. Law Rep., 132, said: "The case before us is as strong as either of these, for the money was furnished on the agreement that it should be secured by a mortgage; the note was executed by the wife, and the mortgage was executed by her and her husband for the purpose of securing this money by a lien on the land. The money having been furnished on the expectation that it should be secured by a mortgage on the land, if for any reason the mortgage was defective, the creditor must be subrogated to the existing lien on the land which his money was used to discharge."

In our opinion the lower court was right in overruling the appellant's exceptions to the report of sale, as he obtained a good title.

Wherefore, the judgment is affirmed.

TOWN OF LONDON, &c. v. HOPE, &c.

(Filed May 13, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Banks and banking—Taxation—Construction of statutes—The object of the act of March 21, 1900, relating to the taxing of national banks, provided for a mode of assessment of the shares of such stock and the payment of taxes thereon, and in an action seeking to enjoin the collection of taxes upon shares of stock in a national bank where the petition contains no allegation that such stock was not listed for taxation at the place of residence of the owner for the year for which such taxes are sought to be collected, it was error not to sustain a demurrer to it.

2. Same—While neither the bank, nor its president nor its cashier, is the owner of shares of stock sought to be taxed, the bank is the agent of the shareholder and notice to it is notice to his agent, within the meaning of section 4241, Kentucky Statutes.

3. Same—Section 3 of the act of March 21, 1900, containing the express provision that "when any shares of stock have not been listed for taxation for state, county and municipal purposes, under levy or levies, for any year or years since 1892, it shall be the duty of the president and cashier to list same for taxation, under levy or levies for the years omitted" the legislative intent to assess shares of stock retrospectively could not have been plainer than by the employment of such language, and the act is not invalid for the reason that it seeks to tax retrospectively shares of national bank stock for the years they have escaped taxation.

Cook & Jones for appellants.

Charles R. Brock, J. A. Craft and J. W. Alcorn for appellees.

Appeal from Laurel Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

The appellees are citizens of Laurel county, Kentucky, residing without the corporate limits of the town of London, the county seat. The First National Bank of London is a national bank organized in this State under the banking laws of the United States, having its place of business in the town of London; its capital stock is $50,000, divided into shares of $100 each.

The appellees are now, and were on the 15th day of September, 1899, the owners of certain shares in this bank. The municipality of London, by proper proceedings, was seeking to subject all of the shares of the bank to municipal taxation for the fiscal year succeeding the 15th day of September, 1899; whereupon the appellees, considering that their shares of bank stock were not subject to municipal taxation for the period mentioned, instituted this action in the Laurel Circuit Court, and obtained an injunction restraining the municipality and its officers from proceeding to enforce the collection of the taxes on the shares belonging to them. Appellant filed a general demurrer to this petition, which being overruled, it declined to plead further, and thereupon the court perpetuated the injunction; from which judgment the town has appealed.

It is conceded by appellant that the allegations of the petition are sufficient to raise the question of the legality of the ordinance, and the proceedings looking to the collection of the taxes in question against the shares of appellee. The right to impose the tax herein involved, is based upon the act of the general assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, approved March 21, 1900, entitled "An act relating to the taxation of the shares of stock of national banks;" so much of which as relates to the issue in this case is as follows: "Whereas, the Supreme Court of the United States has lately decided that article 8, chapter 108 of the acts 1891, 1892, 1893 is void and of no effect, in so far as the same provides for the taxation of the franchise of national banks, in consequence of which decision there is not now and has not been since adoption of said article in 1892, any adequate mode of taxing national banks, while State banks are now, and have been ever since 1892, taxable for all purposes, State and local, therefore,

"Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky:

"§ 1. That the shares of stock in each national bank of this State shall be subject to taxation for all State purposes, and shall be subject to taxation for the purposes of each county, city, town and taxing district in which the bank is located.

"§ 2. For the purposes of the taxation provided for by the next preceding section, it shall be the duty of the president and the cashier of the bank to list the said shares of stock with the assessing officers authorized to assess real estate for taxation, and the bank shall be and remain liable to the State, county, city, town and district for the taxes upon said shares of stock.

"§ 3. When any of said shares of stock have not been listed for taxation for any of said purposes under levy or levies of any year or years since the adoption of the revenue law of 1892, it shall be the duty of the president and cashier to list the same for taxation under said levy or levies." * * *

The proceedings complained of by appellees were set on foot by the authorities of London, after March 21, 1900, and were, therefore, in their nature retrospective. Prior to the enactment of the statute cited, there was no law specifically authorizing the taxation of the stock by the town of London; and, as we understand the contention of appellees, they claim, first, that the statute does not authorize a retrospective assessment and collection of the taxes for municipal purposes, and, second, if it does, to that extent it is illegal. We do not think either of these positions are sound.

Section 3 of this statute contains the express provision that, when any shares of stock have not been listed for taxation for State, county or municipal purposes, under levy or levies, for any year or years since 1892, it shall be the duty of the president and cashier to list the same for taxation, under levy or levies for the years omitted. We do not see how the legislative intent to assess the shares of stock retrospectively, could have been made plainer than by the language employed in section 3 of this act. Nor is the provision of the act invalid for the reason that it thus seeks to retrospectively tax the shares of national banks for the years which they have escaped taxation.

Cooley, in his work on Taxation, 2d edition, page 291, says: "The basis of an apportionment of taxes may as lawfully be retrospective as the reverse; that is to say, it may as well have regard to benefits theretofore received as to those which may be received thereafter. It has, therefore, been very properly held that there is no constitutional or other legal objection to the levy of taxes to pay for municipal improvements which had been previously made. Nor in apportioning the tax as between individuals is there any valid objection to making it on consideration of a state of things that may now have come to an end; as where a tax is imposed on the extent of one's business for the preceding year, instead of upon an estimate of the business for the year to come. Where taxes are levied for a series of years upon the same valuation of property, they are necessarily retrospective, but not, therefore, incompetent, though one may be taxed upon property which he has long ceased to own when the tax is levied. But there is commonly a presumption that any new tax law was not intended to reach back and take for its standard of apportionment a state of things that may no longer be in existence. 'New burdens,' it is very justly said, 'ought always to be prospective' and it is reasonable to suppose the legislature has intended that they should be. Such a supposition is in harmony with the general rule of law which requires the courts to 'always construe statutes as prospective and not retrospective, unless constrained to the contrary course by the rigor of the phraseology.' This is the rule not only as a construction of the grant of power, but also as to all the incidents; though a remedial provision may well be presumed to have been intended to reach back for the purposes of justice."

This court, in the case of Langdon-Creasy Co. v. Trustees of Owenton Common School District, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 823, in speaking of the place of taxation for personal property, said: "The legislature has the unquestioned authority to fix the situs of property for the purpose of taxation." It was also so held in the case of Wren v. Boske, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1780. In the case of the Commonwealth v. Citizens National Bank, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 2100, the validity of the act in question, both in its current and retrospective phases, was upheld. On the subject in hand, it is said: "The act of March 21, 1900, did not, therefore, make that taxable which was not taxable before, but simply provided another mode for the assessment of the shares of stock and the payment of the taxes. It was the duty of the assessor to make the assessment. It was also the duty of the president and cashier of the bank to list the shares of stock with the assessor; but when the assessment was not made the property was simply omitted from the tax list, and the sheriff is authorized by section 4241, Kentucky Statutes, 1903, to institute the proceeding to have any omitted property assessed. A penalty may be properly imposed in the proceeding because the property was not listed with the assessor as required by law, and stood as any other property, for the assessment of which a proceeding under section 4241 may be instituted. While neither the bank, nor its president, nor its cashier, is the owners of the shares of stock, the bank is made by the act, the agent of the shareholder, and the notice to it is notice to his agent, within the meaning of section 4241. The president and cashier were properly made defendants because it is made their duty by the statute to list the stock. The bank is required to keep a list of its shareholders, and, therefore, knows who they are. Notice to the agent in an assessment of property is sufficient notice to his principal, whom he represents. Certainly the agent can not raise the question of the want of notice to his principal, or maintain that the proceeding is in violation of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States. Nor can it raise the question that peradventure some of the shares may have changed hands. These defenses can only be made by the shareholders, and do not properly arise in this case."

The general principle with reference to the taxation of national bank stock, both for current and past years, under the act in question, is so fully and elaborately discussed in the opinion cited, that it is unnecessary to notice further that phase of this case. The act clearly makes it the duty of the bank to list all of the shares of its stockholders not theretofore listed for taxation, and to pay the taxes imposed for the year or years in question, whether they be State, county or municipal. There is no conflict in this with the principle announced in Scobee v. Bean, 109 Ky., 526, wherein it was held that, prior to the act, national bank stock was to be listed for taxation at the domicil of the owner, as other personal property. The object of the act of 1900, so far as its retrospective feature is concerned, is only to give a situs for taxation at the domicil of the bank for those shares of stock not theretofore listed for taxation. Wherever they have been so listed, they are not subject to be again taxed for the same year. The petition contains no allegation that the shares involved in this action were listed by the owners at their domicil for the year 1899; if this omission was an oversight when the case returns, the appellees should be permitted to amend their pleading in order to make it conform to the facts.

Under the views we hold of the act of 1900, the demurrer to the petition should have been sustained; wherefore, the judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

AYER & LORD TIE CO., &c. v. DAVENPORT.

1. Sales of timber—Contracts—Instructions—Where a tie company holding a mortgage on certain timber in releasing its lien upon the payment of its debt endorsed the contract of sale by the mortgagee to another, the object in its endorsement being merely to release the lien on the timber, it can not be held liable with the seller who executed the contract to the buyer for a violation of its terms. The endorsement was prepared by an attorney who did not understand the conditions of it, and contained words that did not aptly express its purpose. In an action upon the contract, the tie company not being liable for the acts of the seller of the timber, its motion for a peremptory instruction, in an action against it for the damages of the seller in cutting timber in violation of the contract of sale, should have been sustained.

2. Same—The rule is that where things sold are to be identified by a subsequent measurement, the title does not pass by the contract; and this being true although the cutting of timber by the seller after its sale was a violation of the contract, the purchaser could have no claim against ties made from timber so sold in the hands of a purchaser of them.

Thos. W. Thomas and Sam C. Molloy for appellant Tie Co.

Nat H. Howard for appellant Taylor.

John M. Wilkins for appellee.

Appeal from Warren Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

In the fall of the year 1899, F. G. Taylor purchased of the heirs of Carroll Marcum the timber on a tract of land owned by them in Warren county for $2,400, and as he did not have the money he got the Ayer & Lord Tie Co. to advance it for him. To secure the tie company in advancing the money for him he had the Marcum heirs to make the deed for the property directly to it, the agreement being that it should be only a mortgage and give a lien on the property for the money. It was so regarded by the parties. About the same time the deed was made, the tie company entered into another contract with Taylor, by which it agreed to receive and pay for all the ties made by him on the land, to be not less than 17,000 nor more than 30,000, at the price of 25 cents each for first class ties and 10 cents each for second class. This contract recites an advance of $2,400 in cash paid, which was the money advanced for Taylor to pay the Marcums. The tie company also executed to Taylor a deed for the property subject to its lien. The deed to the tie company was caused by it to be recorded. Taylor failed to have the deed to him recorded. In this condition of the title in the spring of 1900 Taylor sold to C. G. Davenport certain timber on the tract, and the following contract was executed: "This contract made and entered into this 18th day of April, 1900, by and between F. G. Taylor, of Morgantown, Butler county, Kentucky, of the first part, and C. G. Davenport of Warren county, State of Kentucky, of the second part, Witnesseth: That the said F. G. Taylor for and in consideration of the sum of $2,069 cash in hand paid, has this day sold to the said C. G. Davenport, all the hereinafter described timber on the land known as the 'Marcum' land, near Riverside, in Warren county, Kentucky, being a part of the timber bought by F. G. Taylor from the Ayer & Lord Tie Co. (see contract recorded in Warren county court clerk's office), and being a part of the timber bought by said Ayer & Lord Tie Co. from Marcum, and as follows: All the poplar, walnut and ash timber on said land suitable for saw logs; all the chestnut oak, white oak, red oak and chestnut suitable for saw logs twenty-four inches and up across the stump, to be measured the smallest way, and one bark to be measured. Said stump to be not less than three feet high from the ground, except red oak, which shall be not less than thirty inches from the ground. Said Davenport is to have the same rights to cut and remove said timber from the land and such rights as to roads and landings as is given to F. G. Taylor by his contract above referred to and to have said timber removed from the land by September 1, 1902. It is understood that if F. G. Taylor's tie-makers, prior to April 18, 1900, had cut any of the timber described above, and over twenty-four inches across the stump, said Davenport is to have no claim on same, and if any timber twenty-four inches or above across the stump and suitable for saw logs has been cut by Taylor's tie-makers since April 18, 1900, said timber is to be left by Taylor and become the property of Davenport. It is also agreed by the parties that if one party, by accident or otherwise, should cut any timber belonging to the other, such party shall leave such timber for the other party. It is also understood that J. A. McDaniel has a contract from F. G. Taylor to peel tan bark on said land, and should he peel any timber that is suitable for saw logs and twenty-four inches and up at the stump, after April 18, 1900, said

Davenport is to have the timber so peeled and the pay for the bark peeled from such timber, and McDaniel is to pay Davenport therefor at the same rate paid Taylor as per his contract with Taylor. Nothing herein is intended to defeat the right of Taylor to the use of roads and landings, but they are to have equal right to the use of same.

"Witness our hands the day and date first above written.

"F. G. TAYLOR,
"C. G. DAVENPORT."

The following endorsement appears on said contract:

"The Ayer & Lord Tie Co., of Chicago, Ill., who purchased and owned the timber named in the within contract, and by special contract with said F. G. Taylor, authorized him to dispose of same, hereby ratify, approve and confirm the within contract, hereby releasing and acquitting to said Davenport all their right, title and interest in and to the timber embraced in said contract between F. G. Taylor and C. G. Davenport, the purchase price thereof, $2,069, having been paid to said company by said Davenport upon delivery to him of this contract. All changes and interlineations made before signing and delivery of the contract.

"AYER & LORD TIE CO.,
"By PHIL R. SMITH, Secy and Treas.

"Witness: W. H. VAUGHN."

On June 8, 1902, Davenport filed this action against Taylor and the Ayer & Lord Tie Co., alleging that in violation of the contract they had cut from the land and appropriated to their own use something over one hundred trees purchased by him under the contract and certain tan bark, in all of the value of something like $600. Taylor filed an answer stating that Davenport had cut from the land timber to which he was not entitled under the contract, and denying the cutting of the trees charged, except a few admitted in his answer. The Ayer & Lord Tie Co. filed an answer denying the allegations of the petition and pleading that it had cut no timber from the land; had only signed the endorsement on the contract to release its lien and that it had no other interest in the matter. The proof on the trial showed that Taylor and his hands had continued getting out ties after the contract was made, but it did not show that the Ayer & Lord Tie Co. had cut any timber from the land. The proof for Davenport tended to sustain the allegations of his petition as to the number of trees cut by Taylor and his hands, purchased by him under the contract, but the statements of the witnesses lack definiteness in that they do not appear to have measured the stumps or to have made a careful count. The proof for Taylor showed that Davenport and his men had cut more of the timber not sold to Davenport than Taylor and his men had cut of that sold to him, although both clearly cut some timber belonging to the other. The proof by Taylor showed a count of the stumps and seems to be more satisfactory than the proof by Davenport. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff against both of the defendants for $979.75, and they have appealed.

It is insisted for the tie company that the peremptory instruction asked by it should have been given. The proof is unquestioned that the tie company had nothing to do with the cutting of the timber. This was done by Taylor and his hands. The only ground for holding the tie company liable seems to be its execution of the endorsement on the contract. The endorsement was prepared by an attorney at Bowling Green who did not understand exactly the condition of the title, and it, therefore, contains some words not aptly expressing its purpose. It was signed by the tie company without much consideration, but the facts are clear. The tie company had only a lien on the timber for its advance of $2,400; it received the $2,069 paid by Davenport, and it released therefor its lien on the timber he bought. It did not thereby make itself responsible for the acts of Taylor, who afterwards went in on the land and cut timber which he had sold to Davenport. It is no more responsible for such acts of Taylor than it would be if the timber had been cut by a stranger to the contract, for it simply released its right in the timber. Davenport bought the timber of Taylor, and the contract itself shows that Taylor had bought from the tie company. There are no warranties or covenants in the endorsement. There is nothing in it obligagating the tie company as guarantor for Taylor. To impose on the tie company the obligation of a surety for Taylor would be to extend the writing beyond the fair import of its terms. There are words in it sufficient to evidence that Taylor was its agent in making the contract, and that it ratified his act, but the proof is clear that he was not its agent in fact and that he acted solely for himself. Besides, if the tie company had, by Taylor, as its agent, sold the timber to Davenport and made the contract with him, it would not be responsible for Taylor's acts if he had thereafter, on his account, and not as its agent, or within the apparent scope of his authority, gone on the land and cut the timber which had been sold to Davenport; for the principal is never bound by the acts of his agent beyond the apparent scope of his authority. Taylor was not an agent for the tie company to cut timber or get out ties. In fact he was not an agent for it for any purpose. He was simply a contractor getting out ties on his own account, and the tie company was no more responsible for what he did on the Marcum land than for what he did on any other land on which he cut ties. It is true Taylor hauled to the river and delivered to the tie company the ties he made, including those made from the timber which Davenport had bought, and the tie company paid him for them. But Davenport did not take title to any specific trees under his contract. What trees would come up to the dimensions required by the contract, was to be subsequently ascertained by actual test. To ascertain this, Davenport's men had some scry-boards made which they applied to the trees as they went through the woods cutting. The rule is that where the things sold are to be ascertained or identified by a subsequent measurement, the title does not pass by the contract. When this contract was made, therefore, the title to no particular trees vested in Davenport, and if Taylor cut a tree, though it was a violation of the contract, Davenport would have no claim upon the ties made from the tree in the hands of a purchaser. We, therefore, conclude that the tie company is not liable for damages for the acts of Taylor, and that its motion for a peremptory instruction should have been sustained.

By the terms of the contract Davenport bought only the trees of given dimensions, but notwithstanding this the court, by instruction 1, allowed the plaintiff to recover if the defendants "did in addition take and appropriate to their or his own use six or any number of red oak, or five or any number of chestnut logs which had been cut by plaintiff." There was evidence that the plaintiff cut a number of trees that were under size, and the fact that he had cut the logs did not give him any right to recover for them under the contract, unless the trees were of the dimensions required by the contract. Taylor admitted in his answer cutting five trees by mistake, of the value of $1.25 per tree. Instruction 5 was prejudicial to him in that it told the jury that he admitted taking five trees, without stating the whole of the admission. For the value fixed in the answer for the five trees taken tended to show they were small trees. Instruction 5 should have been omitted, also the last clause of instruction 1 as to the $10 for repairing roadway, and in lieu of it instruction 4 should have been incorporated in instuction 1, with the additional statement that the defendant also admitted in his answer that he had cut and carried away, by mistake, five trees of the value of $1.25 per tree purchased by plaintiff. In view of the evidence on the trial and all the facts, we conclude, considering the instructions, that a new trial should be granted. On another trial the court will instruct the jury further to off-set the claims of the plaintiff and the defendant, as determined by them, and find a verdict for the party entitled thereto, and that in so doing they should estimate any timber wrongfully cut by either party, at its fair market value as it stood on the ground and any logs or tan bark wrongfully taken, at their fair market value at the time of the taking.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for a new trial.

LEAHY v. LILLARD, &c.

(Filed May 18, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Contract to pay board—An agreement by a father, evidenced by a note, to pay his son for board will be upheld where it appeared that in order to care for his father, the son moved from Cincinnati to Covington, doing so until the father's death, giving him all needed attention, and where it further appeared that the father expressed his purpose to pay his son when he got his money on a judgment in his favor.

Robert C. Simmons for appellant.

John S. Rich for appellee.

Appeal from Kenton Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The question here for review is the right of the appellant, John F. Leahy, to be paid out of the estate of his father, Patrick W. Leahy, the sum evidenced by a note, which reads as follows:

"$1,024. Covington Ky., December 15, 1900.

"One day after date, I promise to pay my son, John F. Leahy, or order, the sum of $1,024, for value received.

"This amount I owe my son is for my board and keeping since January 14, 1896, at the rate of $4 per week, and is to be paid out of the money coming to me from the C., N. & C. Street Railroad Co.

(Signed) "P. W. LEAHY.

Witness:

"JOSEPH RAYWOOD,

"ROBERT BAILEY."

Appellees make two defenses to the note, first, that it was given for diet of the maker of the note without an agreement for compensation; second, that the maker did not have mental capacity enough to enter into the contract evidenced by the note.

In January, 1896, Patrick W. Leahy had received an injury and was suffering from such other physical ailments as to render him practically helpless in the matter of making a living or of taking proper care of himself. The appellant was living in Cincinnati and his father needed his care and attention, so he moved to Covington, with a view of taking care of him, and did so until his death in January, 1901. During all this time the son gave him all needed care and attention. The son was a mechanic and worked for the support of himself, family and father. A number of witnesses testified that the father expressed a desire to pay his son for his board and clothing, and said that if he got his money on his judgment against the street car company, he could do so. If the suit was upon a parol agreement and this was the only testimony offered, under the doctrine of the cases of Price v. Price's Ex'or, 101 Ky., and Reynold's Adm'r v. Reynolds, 93 Ky., 556, it would be insufficient to establish an agreement for compensation for diet. In denying the right to recover, the court in Price v. Price's Ex'or, said: "Such claims as a rule rest entirely in parol; are based largely on loose declarations and presented years after the services are rendered when the lips of the party principally interested are closed in death. They require the closest scrutiny to prevent an injustice being done."

In Reynolds Adm'r v. Reynolds the court was discussing a case where a daughter sought to recover for services rendered after reaching the age of twenty-one, while living in her father's family, and the testimony tended to show that her father on several occasions said to others that the daughter would be well paid, but the court said: "There is no evidence of any express contract to pay, or any facts that would constitute an equivalent to such an agreement." It was further said by the court: "Courts ought to be well satisfied before exacting payment for services rendered the intestate by his children, that a contract existed, or such facts and circumstances as would necessarily lead to such a conclusion." This case differs materially from the Price and Reynolds cases. It is expressly recited in the note that the promise was made for a debt he owed the son for board and keeping. He could not have owed him the debt unless he had contracted to pay for his board. This is a solemn admission in writing that he owed the son the amount which he promised to pay. If the note could not be the basis of the action, the admission in it as to his indebtedness to the son "would necessarily lead to * * * a conclusion" that the father had made a contract to compensate his son for board and keeping.

Independent of the foregoing conclusion, the note in suit is an evidence of a contract by the father to compensate the son for board, etc. While the evidence shows that the intestate was quite an old man, feeble in health, diminishing with advancing years, but after a careful reading of all of the evidence there is no escape from the conclusion that he had mind enough to enter into the contract in question. It was in accord with his often expressed desire to compensate his son for the sacrifices which he had made for him.

The judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

COMMONWEALTH v. BAVARIAN BREWING CO., &c.

(Filed May 13, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Indictment—Evidence—Upon a trial upon an indictment against appellees charging them with fixing the price of beer in pursuance of a conspiracy in violation of section 3915, Kentucky Statutes, there being no evidence that the increased price was the result of a conspiracy to increase it, the action of the lower court in giving a peremptory instruction to find for appellees, will not be disturbed.

2. Same—Where there was no avowal made as to what a witness would state, it is impossible for this court to say that the trial court erred in sustaining an objection to the questions.

3. Same—Where the transcript o' the evidence is not contained in the bill of exceptions, it can not be said that the trial court erred in overruling motion to file it.

N. B. Hays and Maurice L. Galvin for appellant.

George Washington and J. L. Elliston for appellee.

Appeal from Kenton Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

The appellees, who are twenty-four brewing firms and corporations, constituting what is known as the Brewers Protective Association, were indicted by the grand jury of Kenton county, charged with the offense of unlawfully conspiring together for the purpose of regulating and controlling the price of beer in Kenton county, by agreeing to refuse to sell beer at less than a certain price fixed and agreed upon by and between them; and that in pursuance of such conspiracy, they did fix the price of beer to be thereafter sold by them in Kenton county, and refused to sell it at a price less than that so unlawfully agreed upon, in contravention of section 3915 of the Kentucky Statutes. A plea of "not guilty" having been entered, a trial was had, which resulted in the courts' peremptorily instructing the jury, after all the evidence of the Commonwealth was in, to find the appellees not guilty. Of this ruling by the trial court, the Commonwealth is now complaining.

To prove the substantive facts of the conspiracy, the Commonwealth introduced Bernard Lemker and Charles P. Lang, who were chief officers of two of the defendants in the indictment; it also introduced two or more saloon keepers in Covington, and a printed circular purporting to be signed by all of the appellees. Without stating in detail the substance of the testimony of the Commonwealth, a careful reading of it warrants us in saiyng that it resulted in a total failure to establish the existence of the offense charged. The Commonwealth undertook to show by Lemker and Lang that the Brewers Protective Association, after March 27, 1898, agreed and conspired with each other to add to the regular price of each barrel of beer sold by them, the sum of $1, that being the amount of the government tax added for the purpose of defraying in part the expense of the Spanish-American war. The witnesses failed, utterly, to give the required evidence, and there was nothing for the trial court to do, after the close of the Commonwealth's evidence, but to give the peremptory instruction in favor of appellees.

The Commonwealth filed several grounds for a new trial, among which was the fact that it was surprised at the evidence of Lemker and Lang; the affidavit of the Commonwealth's attorney being filed to show that these witnesses in a former trial had testified to sufficient facts to establish the offense charged in the indictment, and that, prior to the second trial, they had told him that their evidence would be the same as that upon the former trial. The affidavit, however, does not show, or even hold out the hope, that upon another trial the Commonwealth will be able to produce additional evidence to that of the witnesses whose testimony was such a disappointment. The rule is well established, that in order to entitle a party to a new trial upon the ground under consideration, there must be some evidence that he can produce other testimony which will probably change the result; any other rule would multiply trials to no wise purpose. (Rankin v. Commonwealth, 82 Ky., 429; Ivers v. Avery & Sons, 6 Ky. Law Rep., 220; Smith v. Morrison 8 A. K. Mar., 81; Theobold v. Hare, 8 B. Mon., 43, and Tuttle v. Commonwealth, 18 Ky. Law Rep., 665.)

The Commonwealth also complains that the trial court refused to permit it to contradict or "refresh" the witnesses by reading to them their testimony on the former trial, and then asking them if that was not what they testified to, and if it was not true. The Commonwealth would undoubtedly have the right to contradict the witnesses, although put upon the stand by it, if they had testified to any prejudicial fact against its interest, but in this case, the witnesses merely failed to testify as the Commonwealth excepted them to, and if its contention in this matter can be maintained, then, it will result that under the guise of contradiction, the former testimony of the witnesses can be produced as substantive testimony in the case on trial. This is not permissible. (Champ v. Commonwealth, 2 Met., 17-25; Blackburn v. Commonwealth, 12 Bush, 181; Howe, &c. v. Skidmore, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 2048; Loving v. Commonwealth, 80 Ky., 507; Boner v. Commonwealth, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 411.)

To the complaint that the court refused to allow the witnesses to answer certain questions propounded to them, it is sufficient to say that in no instance was any avowal made as to what the witness was expected to, or would, say, if permitted to answer the question. The failure to avow the substance of the expected answer makes it impossible for us to say that the court erred in sustaining the objection to the questions. (Rogers v. Commonwealth, 28 Ky. Law Rep., 1114; Moser v. South Covington and Cincinnati Street Ry. Co., 25 Ky. Law Rep., 154.)

The transcript of the evidence produced on the former trial, and which was sought to be introduced as evidence by means of the testimony of the stenographer, is not contained in the bill of exceptions, and we have no means of knowing its purport, and can not, therefore, say that the trial court erred in overruling the motion to file it. There was no evidence to show that the printed circular emanated from the Brewers Protective Association, which seems to have held its meetings in Cincinnati, and not in Covington; or that the added dollar to the price of the beer to cover the war tax imposed by the government, was the result of an agreement so to do. Upon the whole case we are satisfied that the court did not err in sustaining the motion for a peremptory instruction.

Judgment affirmed.

DAY, &c. v. LONG, CHAIRMAN.

(Filed May 13, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Action on lost note—In this action to recover of appellants upon a lost note which it is alleged they executed and delivered to appellee, the evidence sustains the chancellor's finding that the note was executed, and his judgment will not be disturbed.

2. Same—In an action upon a note which was executed to bear in part the expense of an election contest in which appellant was a party, the defense that the note was without consideration as it was a voluntary contribution to a campaign fund, will not be maintained, because the parties might agree among themselves as to how the burden of the contest should be borne, and when appellant agreed to pay his part of the contest expenses, it can not be said that his note for that part of the expense was without consideration.

C. W. Miller, S. H. Patrick, J. J. C. Bach and Hazelrigg, Chenault & Hazelrigg for appellants.

Breckinridge & Shelby for appellee.

Appeal from Fayette Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Appellee Long instituted this suit against appellants, Walter R. and Floyd Day to recover on a note for $1,010, which he alleged they executed to him in December, 1899, and which was lost. W. R. Day filed an answer, in which he denied the execution of the writing sued on and pleaded that he signed a note containing a stipulation to the effect that it was not to be paid, unless the other minor State officers contributed their proportionate part to defray the expenses of the contest proceedings then pending, and the further stipulation that it was not to be paid unless the attorneys employed should succeed in retaining their offices.

Floyd Day filed an answer, in which he denied the execution of the note at all. The proof for the plaintiff showed these facts: W. R. Day was the Republican nominee for State Treasurer and G. W. Long was chairman of the campaign committee in the year 1899. All the nominees were assessed, by the committee, in porportion to the salaries of their offices for campaign expenses. Day's assessment was $560, which he failed to pay during the campaign. The Republican candidates received certificates of election and their opponents filed notice of contest. They were again assessed to raise a sum to pay attorneys and the cost of the contest. Day's assessment for this purpose was $420, making, with the prior assessment of $560, the sum of $980.

Long, as chairman, needed money, and Day did not have it. Long requested him to give a bank note, with security, on which money could be raised and thereupon the interest for six months, $30, was added to the principal, and a note due in six months was drawn up for $1,010, which W. R. Day signed and agreed to have his uncle Floyd Day, sign as his surety. After a while he brought the note back to Long signed also by Floyd Day; Long accepted the note and employed attorneys relying on the note to pay them. He placed the note in a drawer in his office, with other papers of his, as chairman of the campaign committee, and in some way it was lost. The evidence for the defendants was to the effect that Floyd Day did not sign the note, but only W. R. Day, and that he signed it with the condition

In it set out in his answer, also that he lost the office of treasurer and the conditions were not complied with. The court gave judgment for the plaintiff and the defendants appeal. On the question of fact involved the weight of the testimony seems to be with the plaintiff. Several witnesses who read the note testified that there were no conditions in it and that both the names were signed to it. When Floyd Day was first approached about the note he said that he had signed a note for W. R. Day, his nephew, but that he did not think it was that much. When payment was demanded of W. R. Day he said he wanted to explain matters. When told by another, of the loss of the note, and requested to have another note executed by himself and Floyd Day in the place of it, he said that was all right and should be done. Finally on being pressed to pay, he wrote that he would be at Stanford on a given day and would then come over to see the attorney, but this he failed to do. The circumstances surrounding the parties also sustain the plaintiff's version of the transaction, and we think the chancellor's conclusion of fact can not be disturbed under the evidence.

It is also insisted for the defendants that the note is without consideration as it was a voluntary contribution to the campaign fund. We can not see this. The attorneys had to be employed for the contest and as Day had not paid his campaign contribution, it was agreed that this should go into the fund to pay the attorneys. The parties might agree among themselves how the burden of the contest was to be borne and when Day agreed to pay a certain sum for his part of the costs and this was acted on by Long, it can not be said that there was any want of consideration for the note. The law presumes a consideration for a note. The evidence fails to overthrow the legal presumption; on the contrary it strongly sustains it.

Judgment affirmed.

LAUREL COUNTY COURT v. PENNINGTON.

(Filed May 18, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Epidemic diseases—Compensation to physicians—For necessary medical attention and services during the prevalence of epidemic diseases, physicians appointed as health officers, may be compensated by the authorities where they occur, but as to the persons receiving the benefits of such service who are able to pay therefor, the physician must look to them alone for compensation.

2. Burden of proof—Where it is sought, by a physician, to recover upon an account which is denied, the burden is on the plaintiff to establish the insolvency of the persons for whom he rendered the service and furnished medicine and other things charged for, and in such cases the items making up the claim should be set out in detail, giving the names of persons attended, treatment given, medicine furnished, and sanitary measures taken to prevent the spread of the disease.

Jas. Sparks and D. K. Rawlings for appellant.

W. R. Ramsey for appellee.

Appeal from Laurel Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

This is an appeal from a judgment of the Laurel Circuit Court, whereby appellee recovered of appellant $670.72, subject to a credit of $300, as of the date of the judgment.

It appears from the record that appellee, who is a practicing physician and member of the board of health for Laurel county, made out and presented to the fiscal court of that county for payment, a claim of about $1,281.33, for medical services rendered, and certain items of medicine, and merchandise furnished, during an outbreak of smallpox in and about the city of London. Only $300 of the amount claimed by appellee was allowed by the fiscal court. From that part of the judgment disallowing the remainder of his claim, appellee took an appeal to the circuit court, and the trial in that court resulted in his favor, as hereinbefore indicated. The credit of $300 allowed in the judgment, being the amount recovered by him in the fiscal court.

An inspection of appellee's account will show that each of the first five items states only in a general way, that it is for "services in small pox," without indicating how, or to whom rendered. The sixth item does not state to whom the telegram charged for was sent, or for what purpose. The seventh and eighth items only give the initials of the persons to whom the cash mentioned therein was furnished, but does not indicate for what purpose it was furnished. The remaining items are fairly explicit, except that they do not state that the James Taylor therein mentioned was afflicted with smallpox. The account as a whole is indefinite, and extremely unsatisfactory. The evidence furnished by the record is likewise unsatisfactory. While it supplies some of the omissions of the account by giving the names of certain families and persons, who were either attended or quarantined by appellee while afflicted with smallpox, it is not definite as to the kind of medical treatment given, as to medicines furnished, or as to the sanitary measures taken to prevent the further spread of the disease; and there was no evidence conducing to prove that the persons to whom he furnished medicines or medical treatment were insolvent, or unable to pay him therefor. Upon cross-examination, however, it was incidentally brought out by appellant that one or more of the families attended by appellee were amply able to pay him for his medicines and services, and that James Taylor, who was boarded and attended by appellee while afflicted with smallpox, was the owner of an unincumbered tract of land, and neither a married man or housekeeper.

There was no evidence tending to prove that there was a contract between appellee and the fiscal court, or that any action was taken by that court directing or requesting the appellee to perform the services mentioned in the account. For necessary medical attention and services rendered during the prevalence of epidemic diseases, physicians appointed as health officers for cities, towns and counties, as provided by section 2060, Kentucky Statutes, may be compensated by the councils, trustees, or county courts, of the cities, towns or counties, where such epidemics occur, but where the persons receiving the benefit of such services are able to pay therefor, it would seem that the physicians must look to them alone for compensation.

In Hudgens v. Carter County, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1982, the court said, in regard to Hudgen's claim, which was similar to that of appellee: * * *

"Also he can not recover against the county for his service and medicines rendered and furnished to persons who were able to pay the same. He can only recover for his services and medicines rendered and furnished to indigent persons, and for services and general supervision rendered by him, which was necessary or reasonably necessary to quarantine and keep the smallpox under control, and prevent the spread of the disease, and for attention to those quarantined."

We think in this, as in all other cases where it is sought to recover upon an account which is denied, the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff, and as appellee, plaintiff in the court below, failed to establish the insolvency of the persons for whom he rendered the medical services and furnished the medicines and other things charged for, the verdict to that extent was unsupported by the evidence. Furthermore, as it is not clear from the evidence how much of the services charged in items one to five inclusive of the account, were rendered in enforcing quarantine or other sanitary measures to prevent the spread of the smallpox, the verdict and judgment should have been set aside and a new trial ordered. We are of opinion that the evidence admitted by the trial court, for the purpose of showing the appointment of appellee as a member of the county board of health, was competent.

But for the reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with directions to the lower court to grant appellant a new trial, and for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

RUTHERFORD v. BATH COUNTY, &c.

Sufficiency of evidence—Verdict of jury—Where the testimony was sufficient to sustain a verdict the Court of Appeals has no power to control the judgment of a jury and say that it should have believed the testimony of one side and rejected that of another, and where in an action for services rendered in the treatment of a smallpox patient by the fiscal court of a county, after an allowance by that court of something like $1,100, the verdict of the jury in the court below for the defendant will not be disturbed.

R. Gudgell & Son for appellant.

Appeal from Bath Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The appellant, J. W. Rutherford, a practicing physician at Sharpsburg, Ky., was employed by the county judge and the county board of health to look after and treat certain indigent persons afflicted with smallpox in Bath county, and to prevent the spread of the disease. There was no contract fixing the amount of compensation therefor. He treated about seventy persons who were afflicted with the disease, and was engaged in the work for ninety-two days. He presented to the fiscal court of Bath county an itemized account for his services at the rate of $20 a day, aggregating $1,840. The fiscal court rejected all of this claim except $750, which was allowed, paid and credited thereon. The appellant thereupon appealed to the Bath Circuit Court, where a trial, under instructions which are not complained of, resulted in a verdict for the defendant. An appeal has been prosecuted to this court and a reversal asked upon the sole ground that the verdict of the jury was against the law and evidence, and the result of passion and prejudice against the plaintiff.

Upon the trial appellant introduced a number of reputable physicians who thought the charge of $20 a day reasonable, in view of the fact that appellant had been compelled, during this period of time to give his entire attention to his smallpox patients. Whilst on the other hand, the county judge and a member of the board of health, who had employed him, both testified that $750 was ample compensation for the services which had been rendered by appellant. They also introduced several persons who had been treated by appellant for smallpox, one of whom testified that appellant did not come into his house at all while he was sick, and only passed his house on one occasion. Another testified that appellant only came to see his family, five members of which had been afflicted with the smallpox, four times. The testimony for the defendant was sufficient, if credited by the jury, to sustain a verdict, and this court has no power to control the judgment of the jury and say that they should have believed the testimony for the appellant and rejected that for the appellee, or to set aside such a verdict because of a mere numerical superiority of witnesses on the side of appellant. (Alcorn v. Powell, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 1353.)

Judgment affirmed.

CAMPBELLSVILLE TELEPHONE CO. v. LEBANON, LOUISVILLE AND LEXINGTON TELEPHONE CO.

(Filed May 18, 1904.)

1. Telephone companies—Contract for joint service—Exchange of messages—Duration of contract—The Lebanon, Louisville and Lexington Telephone Co. and the Campbellsville Telephone Co. in April, 1896, made a written contract as follows: The L., L. and L. Co. was to build, equip and maintain a first-class telephone line from Lebanon, Ky., to Phillipsburg, Ky., to meet and attach to the line of the C. Co. at said place, and the C. Co. to build and maintain a first-class line from Campbellsville via Spurlington to Phillipsburg to meet and attach to the L., L. and L. line at that place, each party to keep its part of said line in good repair at its own expense, each company to have all the receipts for business which goes over only that part of the line belonging to it, and the receipts for all business which goes over all or any part of the line belonging to both companies shall be equally divided between them. Rates of toll to and from all points on these lines to be fixed by mutual agreement between the companies; all accounts to be settled monthly. Held—That no time having been fixed in the contract for the extent of its duration, the contract is not determinable at the will of either party to it, but must continue during the corporate existence of the two companies.

2. Limit of messages—Constitutional provision—Under said contract the parties to it are not limited to the exchange of such messages as emanated either at Lebanon or Campbellsville, but either party can require the other to transmit messages originating elsewhere. Section 199 of the Constitution providing "that telephone companies operating exchanges in different towns or cities, shall receive and transmit each other's messages without unreasonable delay or discrimination."

3. Injunction—Where either party to such an agreement fails or refuses to transmit messages from the other over the joint wires of the two contracting companies, the party in default may be compelled, by mandatory injunction to perform said service.

Helm, Bruce & Helm for appellant.

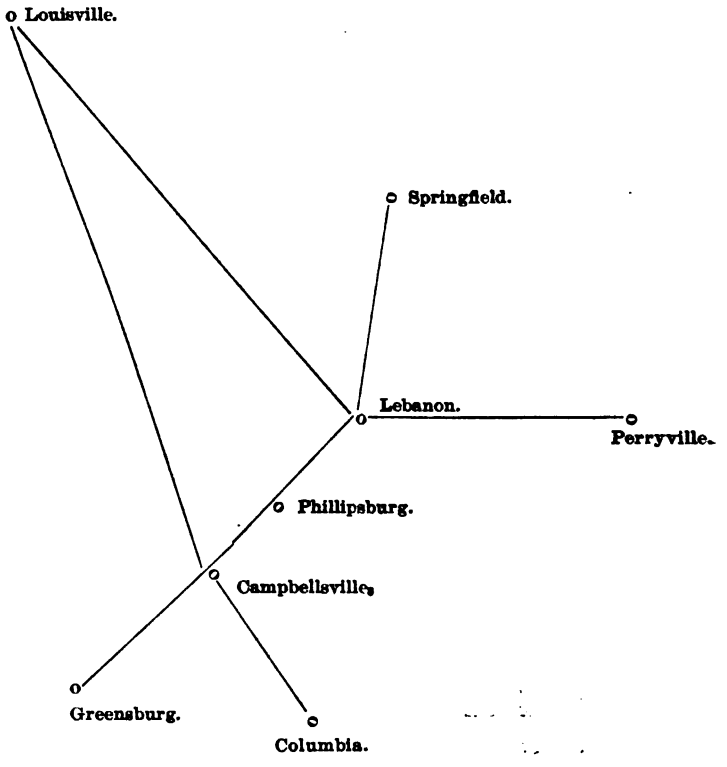
Fairleigh, Straus & Fairleigh and Humphrey, Burnett & Humphrey for appellee.

Appeal from Marion Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

This is an appeal from a judgment dismissing plaintiff's petition, which, after being amended, was still held to state no cause of action.

From the statements of the petition it appears that appellant, the Campbellsville Telephone Co., built an exchange at Campbellsville; that appellee, the Lebanon, Louisville and Lexington Telephone Co., built an exchange at Lebanon. These two companies agreed to unite their lines at Phillipsburg, which was a point about midway between Campbellsville and Lebanon, the Campbellsville Co. building the line from Campbellsville to Phillipsburg, and the Lebanon Co., by which name we will designate appellee, from Lebanon to Phillipsburg. This diagram fairly presents the geographical situation:



The agreement under which this connection was made, and was to be operated, was written, and is as follows:

"It is hereby mutually agreed by and between the Lebanon, Louisville and Lexington Telephone Co. (incorporated) of Lebanon, Ky., and the Campbellsville Telephone Co. (incorporated), of Campbellsville, Ky., as follows: The Lebanon, Louisville and Lexington Telephone Co. to build, equip and maintain a first class telephone line from Lebanon, Ky., to Phillipsburg, Ky., to meet and attach to the line of the Campbellsville Telephone Co. at said place; and the Campbellsville Telephone Co. to build, equip and maintain a first-class telephone line from Campbellsville, Ky., via Spurlington to Phillipsburg, Ky., to meet and attach to the said line of the Lebanon, Louisville and Lexington Telephone Co. at that place, each company to keep its part of said line in good repair at its own expense. Each company to have all the receipts for business which goes over only that part of the line belonging to it; and the receipts for all business which goes over all or any part of the line belonging to both companies shall be equally divided between them. Rates of toll to and from all points on these lines to be fixed by mutual agreement between the companies. Accounts between the companies to be settled monthly.

"Signed in duplicate this April 26, 1896."

There are two points in the foregoing contract that have given rise to this controversy. First, it failed to state for what length of time the connection and the agreement were to continue. Appellant contends that it was to endure at least during the corporate lives of the two companies. Appellee contends that it was determinable at the will of either of the parties. Second, did the contract include messages originating elsewhere than at Lebanon or Campbellsville or on the line between those points? Appellant affirms that it did. Appellee insists that it did not.

The trouble between the litigants came up in this way: They were each "independent" companies, that is, not using the Bell patents. Susbequently a licensee of the Bell patents, the Cumberland Telephone and Telegraph Co., acquired a controlling interest in the stock of the Lebanon company, and built a line from Louisville to Lebanon, there connecting with the Lebanon Exchange. Later an "independent" line was built from Louisville to Campbellsville by the Independent Long Distance Telephone and Telegraph Co. Until then the customers of the Campbellsville Exchange used the line in connection with the Cumberland company's line to talk to Louisville, and customers of the Cumberland company used the same line in talking to persons at Campbellsville and contiguous connected points through the Campbellsville exchange. This was all done under the contract quoted. But when the independent line was built to Campbellsville from Louisville, and the Campbellsville company effected arrangements with it for transmitting messages to and from Louisville, and when it was attempted to use the joint line of these litigants via Phillipsburg to transmit messages from Louisville to Lebanon by way of the Independent and the Campbellsville companies, appellee refused to make the connection at the Lebanon Exchange and excluded the messages. This suit was for a mandamus to compel the Lebanon company to receive the message over its wires, and to make the necessary connection therefor. The specific execution of the contract was thus sought by appellant.

If the contract and all rights under it are determinable at the will of either party, appellee argues that will end this suit, for, it is claimed, a court will not direct the specific execution of a contract that either party has the right to terminate the next moment. However, if the parties have not terminated the contract, as they have not in this instance, but are continuing it, and if one of them withholds a part to which the other is entitled, we perceive no good reason for refusing to compel him to bring up his end of the agreement, so long as it lasts. While the case might be rested here, we are not content to do so, but will decide the larger question which is also presented, and which has been ably argued and fully considered; that is, whether the contract is one determinable at the will of either of the parties.

The fact that no time is fixed in the contract for which it shall endure, is seized upon as affixing it to that class of contracts that run at the mutual will of the parties, and that may, therefore, be terminated when either of them elects to do so. The intention of the parties at the time of the making of the contract, to be gathered from its terms, and the surrounding circumstances, is the thing to be sought for and enforced if enforcible; that certain agreements are to continue only so long as the parties to them mutually will, is necessarily true. Such agreements may be lawful, and when so, and found to exist, are to be construed and enforced according to their true intent. But whether such was or was not the intention of the parties ought not to be settled alone by the presence or absence of a definitely stated term. If the intention be manifest otherwise, it is as controlling. In Smith v. Theobald, 86 Ky., 141, a contract for personal services of one as a hotel clerk, nothing being said in the writing as to the time it was to run, was construed not to be terminable at the will of the landlord. The court declared that the question of duration intended by the parties was one to be determined from the circumstances of each case. And this must be so. Otherwise the intention of the parties would be ignored, and there would be substituted instead an arbitrary rule of construction, frequently defeating the intention and doing great injustice. This contract evinces a purpose to make a telephone connection between two towns in which respectively the parties owned and operated telephone exchanges. To build the connecting line as contracted, necessarily required the outlay of a considerable sum, at least as proportioned to the income from it for a year or less. To say that the parties mutually intended that either of them might quit the arrangement the next day after the line was built, thereby practically destroying the value of the connecting line, would be preposterous. The contract provides for monthly settlements, which of itself indicates a protracted duration. The nature of the business was such that the more extended the service afforded its patrons, the more desirable it became to them, and the more profitable therefore, to the owners of the lines. They must have had in mind the continuance of those conditions which they were to bring about by this extraordinary outlay of expense, instead of abandoning them. In addition, all telephone companies operating exchanges in different towns or cities in this State, are required by the Constitution of this Commonwealth to receive and transmit messages between their users. What is meant by the phrase "shall receive and transmit each other's messages," is the controlling feature of the sentence. For appellee it is contended that the requirement is satisfied by one company's receiving the message as taken down and transcribed by an operator of the other company, and by forwarding or repeating it over the line as received, to the person addressed. Such is the manner, doubtless, of forwarding telegraphic dispatches which pass over two or more lines. The telephone is a comparatively modern invention; yet its utility is so universally recognized and employed. as to be almost an indespensable factor among the business world's agencies, not to mention its very general employment for social purposes. It has largely superseded the telegraph, as it is a distinct improvement in many features over that means of communication. It is of scarcely less importance to business men than the post. Its practical utility, indeed, its distinguishing valuable features over the telegraph, is the means it affords not merely for instantaneously transmitting a message, but for a conversation, face to face, as it were, between persons remotely situated. To hear the voice of the speaker, to give the counterpart of the conversation, and at once, impress its use with a value entirely different from that of the telegraph. In a sense it takes the place of the telegraph and the post. So that "sending a telephone message" means usually that the persons in communication be afforded the means of talking to each other. The nature and commercial use of this great modern invention have made it a quasi public agency. To call a thing a common carrier can not make it so. It is the nature of the business in which it is engaged that determines its character. It would not be an inapt description to say of telephone companies that they are common carriers of messages, as truly as telegraph companies are. Being in the service of the public, their control to a reasonable and necessary extent by the State government within whose jurisdiction they ply their business, is a proper and legitimate governmental affair. All corporations so engaged, and created in this State since 1856, take their charters subject to amendment or repeal, or by operation of general laws with which they may be incompatible. This provision of the Constitution, section 199, is as if written into the charter of the two companies. The section reads: "Any association or corporation, or the lessees or managers thereof, organized for the purpose, or any individual, shall have the right to construct and maintain lines of telegraph within this State, and to connect the same with other lines, and said companies shall receive and transmit each others' messages without unreasonable delay or discrimination, and all such companies are hereby declared to be common carriers and subject to legislative control. Telephone companies operating exchanges in different towns or cities, or other public stations, shall receive and transmit each other's messages without unreasonable delay or discrimination. The general assembly shall, by general laws of uniform operation, provide reasonable regulations to give full effect to this section. Nothing herein shall be construed to interfere with the rights of cities or towns to arrange and control their streets and alleys, or to designate the places at which, and the manner in which, the wires of such companies shall be erected or laid within the limits of such city or town."

When these two telephone companies did make such connection they complied with a duty imposed by the law of their existence. The section of the Constitution implies that such connection shall not only be made, and the service allowed, but that they shall be maintained and continued.

Appellee's argument at this point is, that section 199 is not self-executing; that until the legislature has provided a way of compelling its execution, it is nugatory so far as enforcible rights growing out of it are concerned. It is true that the legislature has not provided a method for compelling the physical connection required by the Constitution, and has not prescribed the terms upon which one corporation may coerce the use of another's property. It is even insisted that such arrangement is so impracticable as to be impossible. The fact that these parties have made an arrangement which is not unreasonable on its face, and so far as has been pointed out to us, is not unreasonable in its application, would seem to answer the argument of impracticability. But, however, that may be, these parties have done voluntarily all that was required of them by the Constitution, have made the necessary connection, and have entered into an arrangement by which each is to use and is to pay for using the others' property. We are asked, for such is the reach of the argument, to suffer one of them to annul this arrangement, although in doing so it violates the Constitution of the State to the direct injury of the other party to the contract. The Constitution is as binding as a law upon all citizens of the State, and all persons doing business within the State, as a statute could be. The absence of a penalty for its nonobservance can take nothing from the duty of such persons to observe the law. This connection, positively enjoined by the Constitution, having been established, must be continued. Not even the consent of both parties could legally sever it. The public are concerned in it, as much as the maintenance of a railroad depot where one has been kept for a certain number of years, or the maintenance of a turnpike-railroad crossing, although the railroad company and the turnpike company might agree to abandon the crossing.

We conclude that this contract was not determinable at the will of either of the parties to it; but that it must continue during the corporate existence of the two companies.

Appellee's next position is that the contract limited the parties to it to the exchange of such messages as emanated at either Lebanon or Campbellsville. There is nothing in the language of the contract to exclude from its operation messages originating elsewhere and being transmitted via the Campbellsville and Lebanon lines. The nature of the business in which the contracting parties were engaged was to handle telephone messages to and from their patrons. Of course, connecting and independent lines would have to have their part of the tolls. But that was not against the desirability of using them in connection with the local lines where tariff rates could be agreed upon; that such is the fact is not left to even reasonable conjecture, but it is admitted as the record now stands, that for nearly eight years the parties to the contract have so interpreted its meaning, and applied it practically to their operations under it. Messages originating elsewhere were received and passed over the joint line and through the other exchange exactly as if they had originated in Campbellsville or Lebanon. Such contemporaneous practical construction by the parties to an agreement is always accorded great weight by the courts in determining a dispute between those parties as to what the contract means. Book-keeping and accounting under this contract had evidently come to be either so burdensome, or the experience of former years had demonstrated that the tolls each way were so nearly the same, that the parties amended their original contract by another, covering the matter of accountings between them. The contract provides as follows:

"By mutual agreement of both parties, the contract heretofore made between the Lebanon, Louisville & Lexington Telephone Co. (incorporated) of Lebanon, Ky., and the Campbellsville Telephone Co. (incorporated), of Campbellsville, Ky., on the 28th of April, 1896, is hereby changed in the following particulars, to wit: The Lebanon, Louisville and Lexington Telephone Co. is to keep and retain as its own, all the receipts that it collects at its offices at Lebanon and Calvary for all messages that goes over all or any part of said line from Lebanon to Campbellsville; and the Campbellsville Telephone Co. is to keep and retain as its own, all the receipts that it collects at its offices in Campbellsville and Spurlington for all messages that goes over all or any part of said line from Campbellsville to Lebanon; and the division of profits between said companies are to be made in this way in lieu of monthly settlements and divisions of receipts as set out in the original contract, thus dispensing with book-keeping and monthly settlements. But each company is to account for and pay to the other company all moneys that it may pay out for the other company.

These two contracts were construed by the parties in their practical application to mean, that if a message originated in Louisville and sent via Lebanon destined for Campbellsville was transmitted through the Lebanon exchange and over the joint wire and through the Campbellsville exchange, the tolls were altogether the Lebanon company's and the company's who had transmitted it from Louisville to Lebanon. But if a message originated at Campbellsville, or other point, coming through the Campbellsville exchange, destined for Louisville, via the Lebanon exchange and its connecting Louisville company, then the Lebanon company got none of the tolls; but, to the extent the Lebanon company was compelled to pay to the Louisville line toll upon the message, Campbellsville reimbursed Lebanon for it. And so on. The converse of the proposition must be equally true. The terms of these contracts are matters subject to change by mutual agreement of the parties. But until changed, they are enforcible.

We, therefore, conclude that when a message originating in Louisville, or on the line of the Independent Long Distance Telephone & Telegraph Co., destined for Lebanon or vicinity connected with the Lebanon exchange, and to pass via the Campbellsville exchange, it was the right of appellant to have the message passed over the joint wires of the two contracting companies, and through the Lebanon exchange under the terms of the contracts. The mandatory injunction prayed for should have been granted.

Judgment reversed and remanded for proceedings consistent herewith.

WHITLEY, &c. v. WHITLEY'S ADM'R.

(Filed May 18, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Contract for support for life—Limitation—A contract by which a son agrees to support his mother for life is a continuing contract from year to year, and all of such claim was barred by limitation except for the five years next preceding the institution of the action.

2. Attachment—Just claim—A party to sustain an attachment, must have a just claim, and as the validity of the claim sued on is unsettled, the judgment sustaining the attachment is set aside to await the final determination of the validity of the appellee's claim.

3. Evidence—Competency—Where an heir to an estate is allowed to testify as to conversations by the appellant with the deceased, in an action against the estate, the appellant should be permitted to testify as to the same conversation.

J. J. Osborne for appellants.

M. C. Swinford and Swinford & Webster for appellee.

Appeal from Harrison Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

Appellee, as administrator of Harriet Whitley, institute this action January 2, 1900, against appellant for the sum of $1,100, alleged to be due the estate of Harriet Whitley for the alleged violation of a contract in failing to support Harriet Whitley from the date of the contract to her death. A trial was had and a verdict and judgment was rendered against appellant G. W. Whitley for $500. The court overruled his motion for a new trial, and he has appealed.

The facts as they appear are in substance as follows: One Joseph Whitley, husband of Harriet Whitley, died in about the year 1880, and left surviving him his widow, Harriet Whitley, and eight children, the appellants, G. W. Whitley, T. J. Whitley and Sallie Clark, being three of them. Joseph Whitley left a small amount of personal estate and about fifty or sixty acres of land in one body, all of which was in Robertson county, except from nine to eighteen acres, which was in Harrison county.

It appears from a deed of writing filed, that on the 24th of September, 1884, T. J. Whitley, the brother of appellant, conveyed to appellant three interests, one of which he owned by descent, and two by purchase, in the Harrison county land. The consideration for this conveyance being that appellant would release the Robertson county land from any liabilities or claims which he had against it by reason of having paid off an execution against his father's estate, for which the whole of the land, except the life estate of the widow, was liable, to the amount of $210. His widow, Harriet Whitley, appended to this writing, executed by T. J. Whitley, the following language: "Be it known that I, Harriet Whitley, the wife of Joseph Whitley, deceased, do hereby relinquish all my right of dower interest in and to that portion of land in Harrison county, Ky."

She joined T. J. Whitley and wife in the execution of this paper. It is not stated in the writing the consideration which moved Harriet Whitley to execute it. It is claimed by appellee, and the proof tends to show, that the consideration was that G. W. Whitley agreed with her that he would help to support her during the remainder of her life, and to help pay her burial expenses, and that he had failed to perform this contract, or any part of it. The proof also tends to show that T. J. Whitley was the other party who agreed to help to support her. It also appears that the Robertson county land was sold and conveyed, all parties in interest signing the deed; but the proof was very indefinite as to the amount it brought, or what became of the purchase price thereof. It is shown, however, that appellant did not receive any part of it.

T. J. Whitley cared for his mother until about the year 1890, and Sallie Clark, her daughter, cared for and supported her until the year 1899, when she died, at the age of ninety-seven years. The proof varies about the cost of supporting her from $60 to $125 per year. The appellant denies that he made any contract with reference to the support of his mother, and claims that the only consideration for the conveyance referred to was, that he released his claim against all the lands left by his father from the payment of the judgment for $210. He also pleaded the statute of limitation of five years as a bar to appellees' right of recovery thereon.

The court sustained a demurrer to his plea of the statute of limitation, but upon what grounds, we are unable to determine, unless upon the idea that the contract was a continuing one, and no right of action accrued thereon until the death of Harriet Whitley. Under our construction of this contract (if one was made,) it was a continuing contract from year to year so long as Harriet Whitley lived, and her right of action accrued yearly, or as least at the end of each year, for the value of appellant's portion of her support which he had failed to provide. And all of the claim sued on was barred by the statute of limitation except for the five years next preceding the institution of this action.

The statute of frauds section 470, Kentucky Statutes, does not apply to a contract like this for two reasons:

1st. Harriet Whitley parted with her property and completed the contract on her part.

2d. That it was a contract that might have been performed within a year from the making of it.

Harriet Whitley might have died within the year, and there was a possibility, in that event, of the completion of it within the time. (Berry v. Graddy, 1 Met., 553; Benge v. Hiatt's Adm'r, 82 Ky., 667; Jones v. Comer, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 774; Stowers v. Hollis, 88 Ky., 544; Dickey v. Dickinson, 105 Ky., 748; Myers v. Korb, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 168.)

Appellant complains that the lower court erred to his prejudice in failing to permit him to testify with reference to what was said by his mother and brother, T. J. Whitley, and himself at the time of the execution of the deed or writing referred to. The court erred in this, as appellee had introduced T. J. Whitley, a person interested in the estate, who testified with reference thereto. The case of Carpenter, &c. v. Rice's Adm'r, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 1705, was where Rice's administrator brought an action against Carpenter, and there was a contest about a certain credit which Carpenter claimed should have been for a greater amount than appeared to have been endorsed by the deceased upon the note. The administrator introduced a daughter and heir of the decedent, who testified with reference to the correctness of this credit. Carpenter, over the objection of the administrator, was introduced as a witness, and was properly permitted to testify as to this particular transaction.

Under section 606 of the Code, a person may testify for himself concerning a transaction with a decedent where one interested in the estate of the decedent has testified as to the same transaction. A party, to sustain an attachment, must have a just claim to found it upon. Under the evidence, as appears in the record, the court properly sustained the attachment, provided appellee's claim was just, but as the validity of the claim is unsettled, the judgment sustaining the attachment is set aside to await the final determination as to the validity of appellee's claim.

Wherefore, the judgment of the lower court is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

NICHOLS & SHEPARD CO. v. CALDWELL.

Sale of engine and machinery—Warranty—Breach—Notice—Promise to repair—Equitable adjustment—In a sale by appellant to appellee of an engine and threshing machine outfit at $1,892, appellee put in his old engine at $750 as part pay, and gave his notes, with a mortgage on the outfit for the balance of the price. In the sale appellant warranted the engine and machinery as sound and all right. Appellee, discovering in a few days that the engine was defective, notified appellant thereof, who sent a man to fix it, but who failed to remedy the defects. Upon further notice appellant continued to promise to repair, but failed to do so. Finding that he could not profitably run the machinery, after a thorough trial, appellee offered to return it, but appellant refused to accept it or to rescind the contract, and brought suit on the notes and to enforce the lien. Appellee filed answer, alleging the machine was worthless and again tendered it to appellant, and also filed a counterclaim for $750, the value of the old engine. Upon the trial the court gave appellee judgment for $650, and cancelled the notes sued on. Held—That as the evidence showed that the machinery was inherently bad and of little value, and was kept by appellee upon repeated assurances by appellant that it would be repaired and made to do good work, this court is not inclined to disturb the finding of the chancellor. But it appearing that appellee, during the time he run the machine, made a net balance of $250 above his expenses, including his own services, and the chancellor having fixed the value of the old engine at $650, in order that the contract may be rescinded on equitable terms, and as far as practicable place the parties in statu quo, it is ordered that the judgment be reversed, with directions to allow appellant a credit for $250 for the excess received by appellee in the threshing, over and above his expenses and his own services, and for $200 damages to the machinery during the time it was used by appellee, leaving a balance of $200, for which appellee should have judgment on his counterclaim, with interest from July 30, 1901; appellant to recover his costs in this court and appellee will recover costs in the circuit court.

J. H. Shelton, A. C. Hergman and White & Ray for appellant.

Robbins & Thomas for appellee.

Appeal from Hickman Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

In May, 1901, the Nichols & Shepard Co. sold to J. I. Caldwell, a 16-horse traction engine, a 52-inch grain separator with steel bagger and wind stacker. In payment he delivered to it an old engine, which it took at $750, and he executed to it his notes for $1,160.75. He failed to pay the notes, and this suit was filed by the Nichols & Shepard Co. to recover on the notes and enforce a lien given to secure them. Caldwell answered that at the time he bought the machine and executed the notes therefor, the plaintiff warranted all the machinery to be well made, of good materials, and with proper management capable of doing well the work for which the machines were respectively made; that the machinery did not come up to the warranty, and was worthless; that as soon as he found this out he offered to return the machinery to the plaintiff, but it refused to take it back, or to give back to him the notes or the property which it had received from him, or its value; that the machinery was of no value for the purpose for which it was made, and that but for the warranty he would not have bought it; that the $750 obtained from him on the machinery in the old engine was obtained without consideration; that within less than five days after first starting the machinery he gave to plaintiff at Battle Creek, Mich., through its local agent, and to its general managing agent at Nashville, Tenn., notice that the machinery failed to fill the warranty, but that the defect was of such a nature that he could not tell what it was or where it was, and that plaintiff had not remedied the defect, and was unabel to make the machinery work. He made his answer a counterclaim against the plaintiff and prayed judgment against it for the value of the old engine. The written contract under which the machinery was sold was filed as a part of the answer and referred to as containing the warranty relied on. The warranty contained in the writing is in these words:

"This machinery is purchased and sold subject to the following express warranty and agreement, and none other, to wit: That said machinery is well made, of good material and with proper management, capable of doing well the work for which the machines respectively are made, and sold conditioned that if within five days from its first use it shall fail to fill this warranty, written notice shall be immediately given by the purchaser to Nichols & Shepard Co., at Battle Creek, Mich., by registered letter (and written notice also to the local dealer through whom the same was received), stating particularly what parts and wherein it fails to fill the warranty. Reasonable time shall be allowed the company to get to the machine with its workmen and remedy the defect, if any there be (unless it be of such a nature that a remedy may be suggested by a letter,) the purchaser to render friendly assistance and co-operation in making the machinery a practical success. If a workman visits the machine for the company and does not leave it working satisfactorily, the purchaser shall give immediate notice to the company at Battle Creek, Mich., by registered letter as before (and also to the local dealer,) and state in writing specifically any failure or neglect complained of, and allow time for another workman to be sent to examine the machine and its workings; if, after giving the notices as above provided, any part of the machinery can not be made to fill the warranty, that part which fails shall be returned immediately by the undersigned to the place where it was received, with the option of the company, either to furnish another machine, or part, in place of the machine or part so returned, which shall perform the work, or return the money and notes which have been received by the company for the same, and thereby rescind the contract to that extent or the whole, as the case may be, and be released from any further liability herein. The failure of any separate machine, or any part thereof, shall not affect the contract or liability of the purchaser for any other separate machine, or for any part of such machines as are not defective. It is expressly agreed that said company shall be liable only for the return of cash and notes payable to its order actually received by it, and not for any machinery or other property taken hereon as part payment."

The plaintiff filed a demurrer to the answer, which was overruled to so much of the answer as set up a defense to the notes, but sustained so much of it as plead a counterclaim. The defendant then amended his counterclaim, pleading that the engine which he delivered to the plaintiff was of value $750, and was obtained from him without consideration. In another amended answer he pleaded that within five days of its first use, he gave notice by telephone and in person to the plaintiff's local agent and its traveling agent, Long, and that they were present when he was trying to operate the machine, and saw that it failed to fill the warranty; that he bought the machinery to be used in threshing wheat, and plaintiff's agents who sold it to him represented to him that the engine, separator and attachments were all that were necessary to thresh and separate wheat, and that at the time he bought the machinery and executed his notes therefor, plaintiff's agents from whom he bought it, knowingly, falsely, fraudulently, and with the fraudulent intent to deceive and cheat him, and to induce him to buy the machinery, represented to him that it was well made, of good material, and with proper management capable of doing the work for which it was sold, and that the engine was a good 16 horse power; that all these statements were false and fraudulent, and were made with intent to deceive him, and induce him to buy the machine; that relying thereon, he executed the contract and notes sued on, and but for them he would not have bought the machinery or executed the notes; that the machinery was of bad material and workmanship, but this was of a hidden nature, and could not be detected without opening it and going inside of it, but that it was so rudely and badly constructed that the defects could not be remedied without its being rebuilt. The plaintiff, by its reply, controverted the allegations of the amended answer, denying that its agents induced the defendant to buy the machinery by any false or fraudulent representations, or made to him any false representations at the time he executed his notes, or that they made any other statements about the machinery than those contained in the written contract; alleging that if they did, they acted beyond the scope of their authority, and the defendant never knew this. The case being submitted on the evidence, the court entered a judgment in favor of the defendant on the counterclaim for $600.30, and dismissed the plaintiff's petition, with costs.

The evidence for the defendant showed these facts: He had been running engines and separators for eleven years. He had an old engine of the plaintiffs' make, and in the spring of 1901 G. W. Long, the traveling salesman of the plaintiff, and A. D. Peyton, its general manager at Nashville, came to his house after there had been some understanding with Moss & Reese, of Clinton, Ky., who were the plaintiff's local agents. A contract was made for the purchase of the new rig for $1,892, the old engine being taken in at $750. The new machinery was shipped to Stubbs, Ky., and was there received by the defendant and taken to his house. In going from the station to his house, after Long had turned over the machinery to him, he had some trouble in going up hill from the fact that the water came out of the boiler into the cylinder. At this time he had not executed his notes for it. After he had reached his house the engine was fired up on several occasions to exhibit the machinery to other persons proposing to purchase, and while the persons to whom the machinery was exhibited were satisfied, Caldwell noticed the same trouble he had had in bringing the machinery home from the station. He made complaint to Peyton, the general manager, and Peyton said he would make it all right. This was before he signed the notes. He refused to sign the notes when presented by Long until he talked with Peyton, and he said to go on and sign the notes, and he would make everything all right. Caldwell then signed the notes. This was while the machinery was at his house, and before he began to use it. He first used it on Monday, June 24, and they had to stop four or five times in going a half a mile. When they started it to running the engine failed to develop power, blew the water through the cylinder, and they could not keep up a head of steam. That evening he notified Moss & Reese and Long, at Clinton, Ky., also notified them the next day, and two or three days later notified Peyton, at Nashville. All of this was by telephone. Several times afterward notices were given by telephone, and in the next few days. Peyton answered that he would send a man at once to fix the engine, but the man did not come for some time, or until about July 9, and then did nothing. Caldwell worked with the machine about twenty days, and then quit. He paid his hands for fifteen days' work. The machinery was never satisfactory. The separator gave trouble from breaking, and the engine did not develop power. When Peyton was notified of the trouble he said he would make everything all right, but this he failed to do, and Caldwell offered to deliver the machinery back to them at the place where he received it. After he quit threshing, or about that time, he notified the plaintiff at Battle Creek, Mich., by registered letter, of the defects in the machinery, and would have done so sooner if Peyton had not said that everything would be all right. He threshed about 15,000 bushels of wheat with the machine in the twenty days. Its estimated capacity was about 2,000 bushles a day. The offer to return the machinery was after he stopped threshing, and was made to Peyton and Long. After this he threshed six bushels of peas with the machinery as an experiment, to see how it would do. The proof for the plaintiff contradicts the defendant on every point, but in view of some letters in the record and the testimony of disinterested witnesses sustaining the defendant, we are not disposed to disturb the chancellor's conclusion on the facts. The defendant was a man of experience in the business, he had several other experienced men to assist him in the operation of the engine and separator at different times, and we are inclined to the conclusion that the trouble was due to an inherent defect in the engine by reason of which it failed to develop proper power. We also conclude that he promptly notified Peyton by telephone, of the trouble, also

Long and Moss & Reese; and Peyton promised to send a man at once to remedy the trouble. The man came about the 9th of July, and he went away without doing anything. On these facts, what is the law of the case?

It will be observed that the written warranty is upon the condition that if, within five days from its first use, the machinery shall fail to fill the warranty, written notice shall be immediately given by the purchaser to Nichols & Shepard Co., at Battle Creek, Mich., by registered letter, and also to the local dealer; reasonable time shall then be allowed the company to get to the machinery and remedy the defect; if a workman visits the machine for the company, and does not leave it working satisfactorily, the purchaser shall give immediate notice to the company at Battle Creek, Mich., by registered letter, as before, and allow time for another workman to be sent; and if after all this any part of the machinery can not be made to fill the warranty, that part shall be immediately returned by the purchaser to the place where it was received, with the option of the company either to furnish another in place of it, which shall perform the work, or return the money and notes which had been received by the company, and thereby rescind the contract and be released from any further liability thereon. It is expressly agreed that the company shall be liable only for the return of cash and notes actually received by it, and not for any machinery or other property taken as part payment. Caldwell did not give written notice by registered letter to Nichols & Shepard Co., at Battle Creek, Mich., that the machine failed to fill the warranty, nor did he notify them by registered letter immediately, when the workman who visited the machine for the company did not leave it working satisfactorily. The only notices he gave were verbal notices to Peyton, Long, and the local agents, and while these were promptly given, they were not a sufficient compliance with the contract. It is said that the agreement to give a notice in writing was only an agreement to furnish certain evidence of notice, and when the notice was given verbally, and was acted on, or agreed to be acted on, this was a waiver of a written notice. But a waiver of this sort can not be implied simply from the fact that Peyton said he would send a man to fix the machine. There was not enough in this to show a waiver of a stipulation in the contract. Besides, the notice was to be given to the company at Battle Creek, Mich. Peyton was at Nashville, Tenn., and it can not be presumed on the facts shown that either party had in mind the notice to him, as he had made the sale, the notice which was required to be given to the company at Battle Creek, Mich. It is settled that to recover a warranty like this the purchaser must comply with its terms (Frick Co. v. Morgan & Co., 24 Ky. Law Rep., 836; Osborne v. Taylor, 8 Ky. Law Rep., 359), and where there is a breach of the warranty, the purchaser must offer to return the property within a reasonable time after discovering the defectiveness of the machinery, and if he fails to do so, the sale becomes absolute. (McCormick Harvesting Machine Co. v. Arnold, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 663.) But in this case, before Caldwell completed the contract by executing the notes, he became apprehensive that the machinery was not all right and refused to sign the notes. He was induced to sign them by the assurance of Peyton that he would make everything all right. While Peyton denies this, his letters to Caldwell tend to confirm Caldwell's statement, which is also confirmed by the subsequent conduct of both Caldwell and Peyton. We, therefore, conclude that the chancellor was warranted in finding, from the evidence, that the notes were executed upon the faith of the agreement of Peyton that he would make everything all right, and that this he failed to do. What then are the rights of the parties?

The parties might, by a subsequent parol agreement, modify the written contract which they had made. Peyton was the general manager of the company and had authority as such to make such a contract with Caldwell. It was within the scope of his apparent authority, and when he induced Caldwell to give the notes by assuring him that he would make the machinery all right, the company is bound by his agreement, and can not, when it failed to comply with it, enforce the notes. The contract between the parties must, therefore, be rescinded, and the engine and separator with attachments should be adjudged to appellant.

As to how the rights of the parties should be settled upon a rescission, we have had great difficulty in determining. Caldwell threshed with the outfit 15,000 bushles of wheat at 8 cents a bushel, amounting to $1,200. His expenses were $61.35 for fifteen days, amounting to $919.25, which would leave a net balance in his hands of $280.75. He delivered to the appellant the old engine, which it took at $750 in the trade, but we do not find in the transcript any evidence by appellant as to its real value, except it comes out incidentally, that the commissions to the agent for making the sale, which would depend upon the value of this engine, were to be taken up later when this was ascertained. The record does not show how old it was, or how long it had been used, or what was its state of repair. It is stipulated in the contract that the company shall not be liable for any machinery or other property taken as part payment thereon. There is no charge of mistake or fraud in the execution of the contract in this particular. But a court of equity will not enforce a contract which is harsh and oppressive. When the contract is rescinded it must be rescinded upon equitable terms, and as far as practicable the court must place the parties in statu quo. The parties can not, by previous contract, tie the chancellor's conscience and require him to do what is inequitable when he rescinds the contract. The circuit court seems to have valued the old engine at $650, and from such knowledge as we have of such transactions this seems to be a fair conclusion. We can not tell from the record how much the new machinery was damaged by the use Caldwell made of it, but that it was damaged is, we think, clear from the evidence. Upon the whole case, making the best approximation we can, we have reached the conclusion that Caldwell be charged with $250 for balance received by him for the threshing, over and above his own services, and that he should also be charged with $200 for damages to the new machinery, and that this sholud be set-off against the $650 allowed against the company for the value of the old engine. Caldwell tendered the machinery back as soon as he became satisfied that Peyton was not going to make it do all right. His delay in tendering it back was due to Peyton's assurance that he would send a man to fix it. And while he was not in the wrong in continuing to use the machinery as he did, he ought to compensate the company for the injury to the property while he was running it.

On the return of the case to the circuit court, a judgment will be entered rescinding the contract and adjudging to appellant the property in controversy, and a judgment will be entered in favor of Caldwell for $200, with interest from July 30, 1901. Appellant will recover costs in this court, and Caldwell will recover costs in the circuit court.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for a judgment as above indicated.

STANDARD OIL CO. v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed June 3, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Appeal—Submission—Motion to dismiss—A motion to dismiss an appeal after it has been submitted for trial in the Court of Appeals, comes too late.

2. Indictment—Peddling—An indictment charging that the defendant did sell, vend and offer to sell goods, wares and merchandise, to wit, oil to D. M. Young and G. W. Lane, six different, distinct and separate times within twelve months prior to the finding of the indictment, it being then an itinerant peddler without first having a license to do so, is good.

3. Evidence—In an indictment for peddling without a license, where the evidence shows that appellant had a storage plant at Mt. Sterling of about 50,000 gallons, from which it supplied the retail merchants in the neighboring towns with oil for illuminating purposes, delivered from a tank wagon from ten gallons up, and that appellant's agent sold from said wagon as often as six times in one year to a saloon in Owingsville, for its own use and not for retail, and at a price less than the regular retail price for such oil, such sales constituted the appellant guilty of being an itinerant peddler.

Humphrey, Burnett & Humphrey and Robert H. Winn for appellant.

N. B. Hays for appellee.

Appeal from Bath Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

The appellant was indicted, tried and convicted in the court below of the offense of peddling without license, and its punishment fixed at a fine of $300. A new trial was refused, and it asks at the hands of this court a reversal of the judgment of conviction.

The case was submitted at the September term, 1901, and appellant's brief was filed on October 1 of the same year. The case remained under submission awaiting a brief for appellee, until the 2d day of February, 1904, at which time the attorney general filed a motion to strike from the record the bill of exceptions, motion and grounds for new trial, and all the transcript which is contained in the bill of exceptions, and also to dismiss the appeal.

We are of opinion that the motions come too late, and that appellee has waived any right it may have had to make the objections now presented. It has been repeatedly held by this court that such motions come too late when made after a submission of the case. (Bailey v. Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co., 19 Ky. Law Rep., 1617; Welsh v. National Cash Register Co., 103 Ky., 192.)

One of the complaints of appellant is that the indictment is fatally defective, and that the court below erred in overruling the demurrer thereto. The contention of appellant being that the indictment does not charge that the sales mentioned therein were made by appellant as an itinerant peddler, or in the course of its business as an itinerant peddler. The accusation in the indictment is that the appellant was guilty of the offense of peddling without a license; and the specific charge, that it did "sell, vend and offer to sell, goods, wares and merchandise, to wit, oil, to D. N. Young and G. W. Lane, six different, distinct and separate times, it being then an itinerant peddler, without having first secured a license so to do." * * * We think this language in substance and effect means to charge, and does charge, that the sales mentioned were made by appellant as an itinerant peddler. We are of opinion, therefore, that the indictment sets forth the offense charged in such manner as to comply with the statute upon which it is based, and with such certainty as to apprise the appellant of the nature of the accusation upon which it was to be tried, and to constitute a bar to a subsequent prosecution for the same offense. It follows, therefore, that the lower court did not err in overruling the demurrer. The case was tried by the court without the intervention of a jury, and on its own finding of the facts, it adjudged appellant guilty and fixed the penalty as stated.

Section 4215, Kentucky Statutes, provides that "all persons who are by this article deemed peddlers, shall, before the sale or attempted sale of any article or right, as herein contemplated, procure and pay for license, as required by law; and any peddler who shall violate the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of peddling without license and punished accordingly."

Section 4216 provides that "all itinerant persons vending * * * merchandise * * * and any other thing not hereinafter specially exempt, shall be deemed peddlers."

The offense denounced by the sections of the statute supra is peddling without license. It appears from the bill of evidence that the Standard Oil Co. had a storage plant or warehouse of oil in the town of Mt. Sterling with a capacity of about 50,000 gallons. From this warehouse it supplied the retail merchants in the neighboring towns, including Owingsville, in Bath county, with oil for illuminating purposes, the oil being delivered by appellant's agents from a tank wagon in quantities of from ten gallons up. The oil was then sold by the retail merchants to consumers. The evidence also shows that Young & Lane were engaged in the saloon business in the town of Owingsville; that they kept a pool room in connection with the saloon and that they carried a small stock of edibles, such as sardines, oysters, potted ham, crackers, etc., which were sold to, and eaten in the saloon by persons who drank at their bar. It is further shown by the evidence that in the course of twelve months before the finding of the indictment, as many as six sales, and perhaps more, were made by the driver of appellant's tank wagon to Young & Lane, and that each of these sales was made at the then prevailing wholesale price of oil in Owingsville, which was about two and one-half cents per gallon less than the retail price to consumers.

It is apparent from the evidence that the firm of Young & Lane were not engaged in the business of selling oil. They neither advertised nor held it out for sale to the public. The firm consumed large quantities of oil for lighting their place of business, and though they allowed Horace Lane, their clerk, and a porter in their employ, to take from their tank such oil as was needed for personal use at the retail price then prevailing in Owingsville, it is manifest that the oil purchased by the firm of appellant's agent, was all for use in their saloon. It is true the members of the firm testified that they would have sold oil to any person applying to them, but they never did in fact make such a sale, or offer to do so. What oil they bought was for their own use, and not for sale to consumers.

Proof was introduced by appellant to the effect that the oil in the storage warehouse at Mt. Sterling, and all of the personal and real property owned by it and located in Mt. Sterling, was regularly and duly assessed for taxation in the years 1897 and 1898, and that the taxes were paid thereon to the State, county and city. And further that the regular business of appellant at Mt. Sterling at the time the sales to Young & Lane were made, was that of selling illuminating oil in that town and the surrounding towns in wholesale quantities, and that it had a regular line of customers who were engaged in the business of retailing oil in the surrounding towns, including Owingsville.

In Standard Oil Co. v. Commonwealth, 107 Ky., 606, it was held by this court that the Standard Oil Co. was not guilty of violating the law against peddling without license, where it appeared that it had oil stored at central points from which it delivered to retail merchants in neighboring towns, oil for the purpose of resale, such sales not being peddling within the meaning of the statute.

In Hayes v. Commonwealth, 107 Ky., 655, it was also held by this court that where an agent of the Standard Oil Co., who had been but a few days in its service, and was without experience in its business, made sales of oil to two persons, one of whom he supposed to be a retailer of oil and a regular customer of appellant, and the other had told him that his house sold oil, such sales would not authorize the conviction of the defendant of the offense of peddling without license. But in discussing the question as to what constitutes peddling under the statute, this court in that case said: "It will be seen that the statute supra defines a peddler, and the indictment under consideration clearly charges that the defendant was an itinerant person and that he sold the oil in question. It is undoubtedly true that in order to constitute a person a peddler, he must not only be an itinerant persons, but must be engaged in vending or selling the article mentioned in the prohibitory statutes as a business or occupation. It is not, however, necessary that it should be his sole business, nor even his principal business; but it must, nevertheless, be a considerable part of his occupation. A person may have a permanent home in this State, where he may store his principal goods, and may even pay tax thereon, and still be an itinerant person, in the meaning of the statute, if he travels about from place to place vending or selling the articles prohibited by the statute."

Obviously the sales to Young & Lane were not the result of mistake or accident, nor were they made by an inexperienced agent, who was ignorant of the names and business of appellant's customers. They were made repeatedly, and certainly not fewer than six times, we are unable to tell how many more, as they were continued throughout the year, and under circumstances that afforded the agents of appellant every opportunity to know that Young & Lane were not retailing oil, but were simply buying it for the use of the saloon. It can not, therefore, be claimed that the agent supposed Young & Lane were dealers in oil. He must have known that they were not. It is further manifest that the fact that Young & Lane occasionally furnished their clerk and porter with oil for personal use, or that they would have sold it to others if requested to do so, did not make them retailers of oil, or authorize appellant's agent to so regard them. As Young & Lane were not retail dealers in oil, and the oil they received of appellant's agent was purchased for their own use, and that fact was known, or ought to have been known, to appellant's agent, we are constrained to hold, as did the trial judge, that as to the sales of oil to Young & Lane, appellant must be deemed a peddler; and it being admitted that it did not for itself, or agent, have a peddler's license, it follows that the lower court did not err in finding appellant guilty of the offense charged in the indictment, or in inflicting upon it the fine complained of.

Wherefore, the judgment is affirmed.

PHILLIPS, &c. v. PHILLIPS' ADM'R, &c.

(Filed May 19, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Judicial sales—Purchase by attorney—Inadequate price—While an attorney has no implied authority to purchase for his client land sold at a judicial sale, the law presumes that he acted for his client, and regards him as their trustee; and where an attorney purchased land at a decretal sale at a grossly inadequate price, where he represents the interests of infant children who are parties to the suit, a judgment of confirmation and deeds made in pursuance thereto should be set aside.

J. M. Roberson and Hazelrigg, Chenault & Hazelrigg for appellants.

T. L. Edelen for appellees.

Appeal from Pike Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

Frank Phillips died testate, domiciled in Pike county, Ky., in July, 1898. He appointed his widow, Nancy M. Phillips, executrix of his estate, which consisted in the main of divers tracts of land located in Pike county, and a tract of 2,200 acres in Buchanan county, Virginia. He directed that the Virginia land should be sold and the proceeds applied to the payment of his indebtedness, and bequeathed his various tracts in Pike county to his wife and children. In January, 1899, Nancy L. Phillips, as executrix, brought this action in the Pike Circuit Court against the children and creditors, for a settlement of her accounts as executrix, and for a sale of the 2,200-acre tract of land in Virginia, to pay the debts of her decedent and carry out the provisions of his will. The case was referred to the master commissioner to settle the accounts of the executrix and to ascertain and report the indebtedness of testator. His report under the order of reference was confirmed on the 11th of February, 1901, and judgment was entered decreeing the sale of the 2,200 acres of land in Virginia, and also the various tracts of land in Pike county.

At the sale made under this judgment, Auxier & Butler, the attorneys of the executrix, became the purchaser of four separate tracts of land lying in Pike county, described in the judgments as tracts No. 3, 4, 5 and 6, at about 25 per cent. of their appraised value. They subsequently transferred the benefit of their bid to the tract known as tract No. 6, lying on John's Creek, to York & Williamson. Exceptions were filed to the confirmation of the sale of each of these various tracts of land, on the ground that the prices at which they had been sold were grossly inadequate, by the guardian ad litem and creditors of the decedent. Exception was also made to the confirmation of the sale of the various tracts purchassed by Auxier & Butler, the attorneys of the estate, on the ground that they were representing the estate as attorneys and could not acquire any interest in the land sold to the disadvantage of their client. The exceptions were sustained as to the Virginia land, but confirmed as to the various tracts lying in the State of Kentucky, and to reverse the judgment of confirmation, this appeal has been prosecuted by the guardian ad litem of the infant defendants and by certain creditors. The executrix and mother of the infants having died after the institution of the suit, the clerk of the lower court was directed to copy the entire record with the exception of the claims filed by creditors, the report of the commissioner and the confirmation thereof, etc.

It is insisted by appellee that, as appellants are prosecuting an appeal from a partial transcript, and no notice of the filing of the schedule for such transcript was served upon appellees as required by section 737 of the Civil Code, that the judgment of the lower court must of necessity be confirmed. As the case was submitted without objection, and the point is raised for the first time in brief of counsel, it comes too late, especially as the schedule filed by appellant distinctly sets out the parts of the record which the clerk was directed to omit from the transcript, and it is apparent that the omitted parts have no bearing upon the questions relied on for a reversal upon this appeal.

The trial court properly refused to continue this case until the determination of the litigation involving the title to the 2,200 acres of land in the United States Circuit Court for the district of Virginia, as it was impossible to determine when, or how, that litigation would terminate, and in the meantime the debts of the Kentucky creditors were continually growing, But the chancellor erred in confirming the sale of the various tracts of land which had been knocked off by the commissioner to Auxier & Butler. They were the attorneys representing the estate, and "public policy demands that there should be no temptation on the part of one occupying the important relation of attorney, to make private gain out of the subject-matter of his professional employment." Whilst an attorney has no implied authority to purchase for his client, land sold at a judicial sale, yet if he does purchase, the law presumes that he acted for his client, and regards him as the trustee of the client respecting the property, unless he can show that the transaction was in every way fair and not to the client's disadvantage. (3 A. and E. Ency. of Law, 340; 4 Cyc., 958; Howell's Heirs v. McCreary's Heirs, and others, 87 Ky., 359.) In the latter case Judge Roberson said: "A purchase by an attorney under his client's execution over which he has control predisposes a chancellor to look on the transaction with peculiar jealousy and scrutiny, and should never be sustained when it was for a grossly inadequate price and exhibits a semblance of unfairness."

In Hall v. Hallett, 1 Cox, 134, Lord Thurlow said: "No attorney can be permitted to buy in things in course of litigation of which he has the management. This the policy of justice will not endure."

The judgment in this case was entered at the instance of the attorney's. They attended the sale thereunder. They were practically the only representatives of the infant defendants, as their mother had died, and no one seems to have looked after their interest. Under this state of fact they should not have been permitted to profit at the expense of their clients. For reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with instructions to set aside the judgment of confirmation as to these tracts of land and, the deeds made the purchasers pursuant thereto, and for such other steps as may be necessary to conform to this opinion.

GLEASON v. KENTUCKY TITLE CO.

Quashal of execution for costs—Where it does not appear that a purchaser took any part as to whether a sale should or not be confirmed, no costs should be recovered against him in a controversy between owner and lienholder.

Ed. M. Lewis for purchaser Bloom.

B. F. Washer for appellant.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, Second Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

It does not appear that the purchaser took any part in the contest as to whether the sale should be confirmed or set aside. The controversy was maintained between the owner of the property and the lienholder. No cost in this court should be recovered against the purchaser. The purchaser's motion to quash execution for cost is, therefore, sustained.

LEBUS v. DUNLAP.

Contracts—Where one assists another under a contract, giving him the benefit of his experience in similar matters, procured for him the opinion of able counsel and assisted in the presentation of facts in defense of a claim of the auditor's agent, there is nothing in such services opposed to the public policy of interference with public officials in the administration of their affairs of government, and for his services he may recover.

J. J. Osborne for appellant.

Lafferty & King for appellee.

Appeal from Harrison Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

On the former appeal of this case (23 Ky. Law Rep., 1481) the law applicable to the facts set out in the petition and controlling the contract alleged therein, was discussed.

We adhere to the conclusion there announced. Upon the return of the case an issue was made by the answer upon the allegations of the making of the contract and the performance of the services under it by appellee. This issue was submitted to the jury under appropriate instructions, and they have found in favor of the contract. The jury were told, that although they believed the contract was made as alleged, and the services charged for were rendered under it, yet that if the services consisted in whole or part of the exercise of the personal influence of said Dunlap with the auditor of the State, or with any of the officers of the State, they must find for the defendant. There was no evidence whatever that appellee exercised, or attempted to exercise any sort of personal influence in the matter, or that he did offer to do what any person might not have done with entire propriety. The sum of it was, that he gave to appellant his experience in similar transactions, got for him the opinions of able counsel based upon the facts as given him by appellant, and assisted appellant in the arrangement and presentation of those facts, so that upon their being presented to the auditor's agent he admitted that the claim being prosecuted by the State against appellant, in excess of $2,400, was without just foundation. There is nothing in these services in conflict with that public policy that is opposed to interference by outsiders with public officials, by personal persuasion or importunity in their administration of affairs of government.

Judgment is affirmed, with damages.

HOWARD v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed May 20, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Criminal law—Where there is nothing in the record showing that the error complained of was not known to appellant at the time the jury was empaneled, this court, by the provisions of section 281 of the Code of Practice, is prohibited from reversing from such a cause.

2. Same—Continuance—There being nothing in the record to show that a defendant asked for compulsory process to compel the attendance of his witnesses, or that he asked the court to fix another day in the term for the trial of the prosecution against him, and in the meantime give him compulsory process, it can not be said that the court erred in overruling his motion for continuance on the ground that his witnesses were absent.

Byrd & Howard for appellant.

N. B. Hays and Loraine Mix for appellee.

Appeal from Magoffin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

The appellant, Joseph Howard, was tried and convicted in the Magoffin Circuit Court on the charge of malicious shooting and wounding George Howard, with intent to kill, and his punishment fixed at confinement in the State penitentiary for a period of eighteen months, and from this judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

The facts are about as follows: George Howard, the party wounded, is an uncle of the appellant. On the day of the shooting and wounding appellant was at work on his farm. George Howard and one Kendall Howard, a brother-in-law of appellant, in passing appellant's farm, induced him to go with them over on Licking creek, where they purchased some whisky and all of them drank of it and became pretty drunk. On returning to appellant's house he invited them to stop and take dinner with him, it being about noon. George Howard accepted the invitation and took a seat on appellant's porch. Kendall Howard refused and remained at the outer fence. Appellant insisted on his coming in and getting dinner. Kendall answered and said "G—d d—n you and your dinner." They had some warm words at the gate when appellant ran into his house and got his shot gun. His wife caught hold of him, he presented the gun in the direction of Kendall Howard, and George Howard appealed to him not to shoot. Appellant then said to George "D—n you, do you take it up," and turned the gun on him and shot him through the arm.

The court gave to the jury proper instructions on malicious shooting, and shooting in sudden heat and passion. The court gave one on self-defense which was unnecessary. The appellant himself does not claim that he shot in self defense, but claims that he did not intend to shoot at all; that the gun was discharged by accident. The appellant complains that there was a second cousin of the wounded man on the jury which tried him, and that by reason thereof he did not get a fair and impartial trial. This fact is not made to appear until his motion for a new trial. There is nothing appearing in the record, by affidavit or otherwise, that appellant did not know this fact before and at the time the jury was being empanelled, and even if it did appear that he was ignorant of this relationship at that time, this court is prohibited by section 281 of the Code, from reversing for such a cause.

Appellant also complains that the lower court erred to his prejudice in refusing to grant him a continuance on account of the absence of several of his witnesses. The appellant filed his affidavit stating what he could prove by them, which the court permitted him to read as the evidence of the absent witnesses. The appellant contends that he was entitled to the presence of his witnesses or at least he was entitled to have compulsory process for them before he should be forced into trial, and cites the case of Adkins v. Commonwealth, 98 Ky., 539, as authority for his contention. We admit that this authority sustains him, but there is nothing in the record showing that he asked the court for such process nor did he ask the court to fix another day in the term, and, in the meantime, give him compulsory process for his witnesses.

Perceiving no error prejudicial to the substantial rights of the appellant the judgment is, therefore, affirmed.

FRISTOE, &c. v. GILLEN.

1. Attorney's fees—Settling estates—Inequitable allowance—Separate counsel—Minutes of last day—In an action by the administrator against the heirs of his intestate to settle the estate and to sell or partition the land, four of the six heirs employed separate counsel to resist the partition of the land. On the last day of the term a minute was made on the minute book of the court as follows: "C. Gillen v. Margaret Eden, &c. M. and E. allowed an attorney fee of $300 upon proof heard, to be taxed as cost," and at the close of the minute book of that day these words: "Ordered that court adjourned until court in course." This was signed by the judge. After the adjournment and before the next term, an order was written out at length, allowing Murphy & Eden, the attorneys who represented the appellees, $300 for their services, to be taxed as costs in the action. On the first day of the succeeding term, and before the orders of the last day's preceding term were read and approved by the court, appellants filed their affidavit and moved the court to refuse to approve the order allowing appellees' counsel $300. The court overruled the motion and approved the order. Held—That this was error, as it would be inequitable to compel appellants to pay four-sixths of the sum allowed appellees' counsel, and then in addition pay their own.

2. Unsigned orders—Control of court—We are of the opinion, under authority in 1 J. J. M., 114 and 80 Ky., 377, that the lower court had complete power and control over the minutes or orders made on the last day of the preceding term, and on the first day of the succeeding term could have approved or disapproved any of such orders. The minute was not a complete order, or of binding effect until spread on the order book and approved and signed by the court on the first day of the succeeding term.

Lee & Hester for appellants.

Murphy & Evers for appellees.

Appeal from Graves Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

Prior to the year 1893 one J. W. Gillen departed this life intestate domiciled in Graves county, Ky. He left some personal estate and 160 acres of land situated in that county. He left no wife or children surviving him, his only heirs being his brothers and sisters and their descendants, who are appellants and appellees herein. His brother, C. Gillen, one of the appellees, administered upon his personal estate and settled and distributed it.

In the month of September, 1903, C. Gillen instituted this action, making his brothers and sisters, and the descendants of those who had died, parties defendant. By this action he sought to divide the 160 acres of land left by his deceased brother between his heirs, alleging that it was susceptible of division into six equal parts without materially impairing its value, and prayed for a division and asked if the court could not adjudge a division, that then it be sold for the purpose of a division of the proceeds. Afterwards C. Gillen filed an amended petition, in which it was alleged that one of the appellants, Alfred H. Gillen, was indebted to the estate of J. W. Gillen, but did not state the amount, and asked that this interest in the land be charged with the payment of this indebtedness. The appellants representing four of the six interests in this estate, answered and denied that the property could be divided without materially impairing its value, and asked that the land sold and the proceeds be divided. The appellant, Alfred H. Gillen, filed a demurrer to the amended petition, which was sustained.

These appellants representing the four interests, employed their own counsel who represented them in this litigation. The court adjudged a sale of the land, and on the last day of the term of the court at which the sale of the land was ordered, there was placed on the minute book of the court the following words and figures: "C. Gillen v. Margaret Eden, &c. M. & E. allowed an attorney's fee of $300, upon proof heard, to be taxed as cost," and at the close of the minute book of that day these words and figures: "Ordered that court adjourn until court in course." This was signed by the judge.

It appears that between this day and the next succeeding term of court an order was drawn in full allowing Murphy & Eden, the attorneys who represented appellees, $300 for their services, to be taxed as cost in the action. On the first day of the succeeding term, and before the orders of the last day of the preceding term were read and approved by the court, the appellants filed their affidavits and moved the court that it refused to approve the order allowing appellee's counsel the $300, for the reason, as they claim, that they had employed their own counsel to represent them in the litigation, and that it would be unjust for them to contribute to the payment of appellee's counsel, and in addition, pay their own. The court overruled their motion and approved the order, and appellants have appealed.

We are of the opinion that the court erred in making this allowance. This court in the case of Bailey's Adm'r v. Barclay, &c., 22 Ky. Law Rep., 1246, in construing section 489 of the Kentucky Statutes, said: "The statute is only intended to apply to that class of cases where the parties have a common interest and a part, without objection from the others, prosecutes suits for their joint benefit and only such parties as are not represented in the case by attorneys selected by themselves. One jointly interested can not be compelled to pay for counsel employed by others, when he has himself employed counsel to represent his interest." (74 Ky., 168; 21 Ky. Law Rep., 75; 11 Bush, 166; 18 Ky. Law Rep., 616.)

Appellees desired a division of the land, appellants desired a sale, which was obtained. Appellees sought to deprive appellant, A. H. Gillen, of his interest in the land. He, with the other appellants, employed their own counsel, and it would be inequitable to compel them to pay four-sixths of the amount allowed appellee's counsel, and then in addition, pay their own. Appellees contended that as appellants did not except to and pray an appeal from the order entered on the minute book on the last day of the term, that they can not maintain this appeal; that their objection and exception to the approval of this order on the first day of the succeeding term was ineffectual; that it gave them no right or authority to prosecute an appeal from that judgment.

Under the authority of the opinions of this court found in 1 J. J. M., 114, and 80 Ky., 377, we are of the opinion that the lower court had complete power power and control over the minutes or orders made on the last day of the preceding term, and that on the first day of the succeeding term could have approved or disapproved any of such orders. This minute or order referred to was not a complete order and of binding effect, until spread upon the order book and approved and signed by the court on the first day of the succeeding term.

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

TUTTLE v. CINCINNATI, NEW ORLEANS & TEXAS PACIFIC RY. CO.

Railroads—Ejecting passenger—Damages—Peremptory instruction—Where a passenger on a train was drinking and did not pay or offer to pay his fare, the weather was mild and the time of the day was early in the afternoon, the fact that he was injured by a passing train after he had been put off the one on which he attempted to ride as a passenger, did not entitle him to recover in an action for damages, where he got off the train with a jug of whisky and after a while wandering on the track when he was struck by a passing train, his having been ejected not being the proximate cause of his injury.

W. A. Morrow for appellant.

O. H. Waddle and John Galvin for appellee.

Appeal from Pulaski Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

Appellant alleges in his petition that he purchased a ticket for passage on appellee's train from Somerset to Burnside; that he was at the time drunk and practically helpless, mentally and physically; that he boarded the train; that his ticket was taken from him by some employe of the train, or was misplaced by him, but that he is unable to say which; that the employes of the train, knowing his condition, negligently ejected him from the train at a point remote from any station or dwelling, in a dangerous place, and there left him; that while in this helpless condition he wandered on to the railroad track to reach shelter, and while there was struck by a passing train and injured. His proof tended to establish that he did purchase the ticket, and was at the time more or less drunk. He was able to get on the train and to control his own movements. When the conductor asked him for his ticket after the train had started he was unable to produce it. He refused to tell the conductor where he was going. A brakeman attempted to help him find his ticket, but it was not found. Appellant did not pay or offer to pay his fare. Thereupon the train was stopped, and he was invited to get off, which he did. The weather is not shown to have been inclement, the season was in the month of April, the time of day was shortly after noon. Appellant had with him a jug of whisky. He was not so drunk but what he remembered all that was recited above. He knew about where he was when he left the train, and started in the proper direction to reach his home; but he admits that he took more of his whisky, and continued to do so at intervals. He became so drunk that he laid out all night in the vicinity of the railroad track. Early the next morning he wandered on to the track, sat down on its edge, and went to sleep. It was then that he was injured by the passing train, whose operators were unaware of his presence or condition so far as anything in the record shows.

At the conclusion of plaintiff's evidence the court peremptorily instructed the jury to find a verdict for the defendant. It is of this action of the court that appellant complains on this appeal. While it is settled that those in charge of a railroad train in ejecting a drunken passenger who fails to pay his fare, or to produce a ticket, must exercise due care, such as may be required by the circumstances, in selecting a place for depositing such passenger as that he will probably be able to protect himself, or can be afforded protection by others, from danger from passing trains at that point, and from danger on account of the inclement condition of the weather, etc., yet the condition of the person ejected must be such that it would reasonably indicate to the railroad employes that he, on account of his condition and the surrounding circumstances, would be liable to such injury. (L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Ellis' Adm'r., 97 Ky., 340; Fagg's Adm'r v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 23 Ky. Law Rep., 383; Brown's Adm'r v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 103 Ky., 211.) The proof in this case did not show that appellant was in that state of mind and physical disability that he would probably be not able to properly take care of himself. But the controlling reason why the peremptory instruction should have been given is, that whatever may have been appellant's condition at the time he was ejected from the train, it is manifest from the record that the injury sued for was not proximately due to that condition; but for the whisky drunk by him afterward, by which he voluntarily continued and increased his state of helplessness, there is no reasonable probability that his injury would have occurred.

Judgment affirmed.

ALFORD, &c. v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed May 24, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Criminal law—Instructions—In a prosecution for murder, where a witness was asked if she did not say to certain persons that deceased was killed while he was asleep, which she denied, and the witnesses upon being called stated that she had made the statement to them, the court should have instructed the jury that the testimony of these witnesses could only be considered for the purpose of contradicting the witness, and not as substantive testimony that the deceased was killed while he was asleep.

E. N. Ingram, B. B. Golden and J. D. Black for appellants.

N. B. Hays and Loraine Mix for appellee.

Appeal from Bell Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Thomas Alford was indicted for the murder of Andrew Collins; he was found guilty as charged, and his punishment was fixed at confinement in the penitentiary for life. Collins and Alford were miners on Straight creek in Bell county. They were both unmarried and boarded with Steve Alford, a brother of Thomas Alford. They had been friends until something over a week before the homicide, when Collins fell out with appellant about a girl and attempted to shoot him. After this he threatened to kill appellant and manifested hostility to him. There was some trouble between them on Saturday night at a merry-go-round. The following Monday morning Tom Alford got his breakfast and left. Collins came in afterwards and said to Steve Alford while at breakfast he was going to the merry-go-round that night and there was some one going down there that night who would be carried back. Steve asked him who it was and Collins replied with an oath that he knew who it was. Steve then told him to get another boarding house. Collins went in to change his clothes and Steve Alford again told him he must get another boarding house. He answered that he would get one at 11 o'clock. Collins then had on his mining clothes and went on to the mine. At 11 o'clock he returned from the mine, washed and dressed, got out his things and said to Mrs. Alford that if Tom went to the merry-go-round that night he intended to kill him. She was sitting on the porch and he laid down on a board placed across the banisters saying to her "Nellie, I have to leave my boarding house, but I will do some dirt before I leave." While he was lying there Tom Alford, who had been interrupted in his work in the mines by water, came home. As to what followed the proof for the Commonwealth is circumstantial. A few minutes afterwards pistol shots were heard; Tom Alford was seen running away from the house up the hill and Collins was found lying on the plank shot through the head in three places. Two of the balls were imbedded in the plank and his face was powder burned. No weapon was found near him. While no witnesses produced by the Commonwealth so stated, the prosecution evidently proceeded on the idea that appellant shot Collins while he was lying on the board, asleep. On the other hand, the proof for the defendant was to the effect, by him and Mrs. Alford, that just as appellant got on the porch, Collins raised up and threw his hand back and as he did this appellant shot him in the head, and as he fell back on the plank, shot him a second and third time in quick succession. Mrs. Alford was asked if she did not say to Mrs. Callie Miller, Mrs. Gordon Haines, Mrs. Sarah Simpson and Sallie Durham at her house a few minutes after the killing that the defendant had killed Collins while he was asleep. She denied so stating. The witnesses referred to were called by the Commonwealth in rebuttal, and testified that Sallie Alford had so stated to them at the time and place referred to.

The court failed to instruct the jury that the testimony of these witnesses could be considered by them only for the purpose of contradicting the witness, Sallie Alford, and not as substantive testimony that the accused shot Collins while asleep. The case is in this respect on all fours with Feuston v. Commonwealth, 91 Ky., 230, where a judgment of conviction was reversed for this reason. The testimony of the four witnesses related to a statement alleged to have been made by Mrs. Alford soon after the homicide, and coming without restriction from the court as to its effect, the jury would naturally regard it in determining the question as to whether Collins was shot while he was asleep or when he was rising up to attack the accused. This was the turning point of the case. There was no other positive testimony in the case that the shooting occurred in this way, and while the facts stated by the Commonwealth's witnesses tended to show that the shooting might have been done in this way, the facts shown by the Commonwealth were not irreconcilable with the version of the difficulty as given by the defendant. The Commonwealth proved by several witnesses statements by the accused after he was arrested as to how the shooting occurred, but this proof was conflicting and taking it all, the jury were warranted on this evidence alone to conclude that his version of what he said was the correct one. The doctrine of the Feuston case was followed in Jones v. Commonwealth, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 355; Collins v. Commonwealth, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 743; Mullins v. Commonwealth, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 2433; Ashcraft v. Commonwealth, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 488.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for a new trial.

VANSANT, &c. v. MILLER.

(Filed May 24, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Conveyances—Contracts—Where, upon a reservation in a mortgage to appellants, of a strip of ground which they subsequently sold in violation of the contract of sale, a judgment for the value of it will be upheld, the jury having heard all of the facts and knew the parties and witnesses.

Thos. R. Brown for appellants.

Edgar B. Hager for appellee.

Appeal from Boyd Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

In the year 1894 appellee became indebted to one George Wheatley in the sum of $1,000 and made and executed to him a mortgage, to secure this sum, on a lot in the city of Ashland, Ky. In the following year he became indebted to one Nicholas Becker in a like sum and executed a mortgage to him on this same lot and also another and adjoining lot. In the month of April, 1896, appellee became indebted to a bank in that city in the sum of $700, and appellants R. H. Vansant and O. L. F. Beckett became endorsers on this note for appellee, and to secure them appellee made and executed to them a mortgage on both of these lots mortgaged to Wheatley & Becker, and also agreed and bound himself, in the event appellants were compelled to and did pay this $700 note to the bank, that he would convey to appellants, by deed of general warranty, the two above lots, save and except a piece 25 by 50 feet in the rear of and abutting on a 16 foot alley, and in consideration for this deed appellants promised to assume and pay the Wheatley & Becker mortgage debts. Appellee was unable to pay this $700 note when it became due, and on that day and in compliance with the stipulations in the mortgage, made and duly executed a deed to appellants which was accepted by them, covering the property mentioned in the mortgage and also excepting the strip of 25 by 50 feet. We quote so much of the mortgage as applicable to the question at issue: "Witnesseth, That the party of the first part, in consideration of $700 cash in hand, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, and the further consideration that the party of the second part is to pay and discharge for the party of the first part the full indebtedness of George Wheatley and Nicholas Backer due them respectively from the party of the first part as evidenced by mortgage on the property hereby conveyed; the party of the second part accepts this consideration."

The appellants failed to pay these mortgages to Wheatley & Becker, as they obligated themselves to do, but sold the property covered by their deed to one Mrs. Henderson, receiving a small advance over the price they paid and she assumed the payment of the mortgages. She also failed to pay and Wheatley & Becker enforced their mortgage liens and all the property was sold, including the strip 25 by 50 feet and Mrs. Henderson became the purchaser thereof at the price of the mortgage debts and costs. This action was brought by appellee against appellants for damages for the value of this strip 25 by 50 feet for $600 for the alleged violation of appellants' obligation and covenant to pay these mortgage debts and save to him this small strip of ground. He also alleged that there was a conspiracy and agreement between appellants and Mrs. Henderson at the time of the sale to her, that these mortgages should not be paid and the mortgagees suffered to enforce their mortgage liens that the property might be sold that she might become the owner of it all. Appellants traversed the allegations of the petition except their failure to pay the mortgages and the enforcement of them by the mortgagees and alleged that their failure to pay the mortgage debts was caused by the fault of appellee; that they refused to pay same because appellee, at the time of the execution of the mortgage to them for the security of the $700, and also at the time of their acceptance of the deed from appellee to the property, he represented that the interest had been paid to Wheatley & Becker on their notes up to that date, and also that there were no other liens or incumbrances on the property, when in truth and in fact there was $120 interest then due on the note, and city taxes to the amount of $154 was then due and unpaid and was a lien on the property. Appellee denied making any such representations. A trial was had before a jury which resulted in a verdict in favor of appellee for $400, this being the second verdict, the first one having been for $500.

The court only gave two instructions, and they are as follows:

"1st. The jury will find for the plaintiff the fair market value of the piece of real estate in controversy on the date of sale of same, to wit.: December 27, 1897, not exceeding $600, unless they find for defendant under instruction No. 2.

"2d. If the jury shall believe and find from the evidence that the plaintiff, J. C. Miller, at the time he made the contract with the defendants, R. H. Vansant and O. F. L. Beckett, for their endorsement of the plaintiff's note for $700, and for their taking and acquiring the property described in said contract, or at the time of the conveyance by plaintiffs to the defendants of said property, represented to the defendants that all accrued interest on the liabilities to Wheatley & Becker had been paid, and that there were no other liens or incumbrances on said property, and shall further believe and find from the evidence that said representations, or either of them, were untrue when made, and that the defendants not knowing said representations to be untrue, and relying upon same, accepted said deed, the law is for the defendants, and the jury will so find."

These instructions were very favorable to the appellants. The proof shows that this lien for taxes was never paid by appellants or their vendee and the proof is conflicting as to the interest due on the Wheatley & Becker mortgages and as to what was represented by appellee with reference thereto at the time of the contracts with appellants. The jury heard all the facts and knew the parties and witnesses and found that appellants were not deceived by any representations made by appellee, and we are unwilling to disturb their verdict, especially as it is the second verdict in his favor.

Wherefore, the judgment is affirmed.

MOORE v. TYLER, &c.

(Filed May 24, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Sale of personalty—In this action to recover upon an alleged contract for the sale of a saloon and its contents, it being alleged that appellant had contracted to pay $500 for the property, when it was then levied upon by the sheriff, but by agreement was sold by him to appellant for $300, when the latter refused to pay the remaining $200, while the evidence is conflicting the weight of it sustaining the allegations of the petition, the verdict of the jury upholding the original sale of the saloon will not be disturbed.

S. R. Crewdson and J. B. Grubbs for appellant.

W. F. Browder and J. C. Browder for appellees.

Appeal from Logan Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

Appellees filed their petition against appellant in September, 1903, and alleged that they were in the saloon business in Adairville, Ky.; that on or about the 4th of April of that year they made a contract and sold to the appellant their saloon and all its contents and fixtures for the price of $500, the appellant agreeing to pay $300 in cash and to execute his promissory note, due one day after date, for $200; that within the same month a judgment was rendered against the appellees in favor of Thixton, Millett & Co. for about $330, which was, by the sheriff of Logan county, levied upon this saloon and contents before the appellees delivered same to the appellant.

Appellees alleged that they induced the plaintiffs in the execution and the sheriff to make a sale of this stock under the execution privately to the appellant, Amos Moore, and to accept $300 cash to be credited on this execution, which was done. The sheriff, not being informed of the private sale to appellant, turned over the saloon to him and gave him a receipt showing a payment in full for the stock for the price of $300. Appellee also alleged that after the stock was turned over to appellant by the sheriff he refused to execute the note for $200, as agreed, and denied his liability for the same.

Appellant answered, denying this private purchase of the stock or that he had ever agreed to pay any sum other than the $300, which he paid to the sheriff. A trial was had before a jury and appellees recovered the full amount sued for. The court overruled appellant's motion for a new trial, and he has appealed.

The evidence was conflicting; the appellee and two witnesses sustaining the allegations of the petition. The appellant denied any private or other purchase from the appellees and claimed that he purchased solely from the sheriff, and introduced a writing signed by appellees requesting a private sale by the sheriff, the sheriff's return on the execution and the receipt given him by the sheriff for the full purchase price of $300. The appellant also introduced proof to contradict and discredit one of appellees' witnesses. The court, by two instructions, gave the correct law and put the issue fairly to the jury and under the circumstances we do not feel authorized to disturb their verdict.

Wherefore, the judgment is affirmed.

ROACH v. DANCE, &c.

(Filed May 24, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Wills—Remainder—In a devise to the wife for life, and remainder to his children at her death, at the death of the wife each of the children took under the will a vested remainder which might be defeated by their death without children before the death of the life tenant.

2. Homestead exemption—This court has never gone to the extent of holding that both the life tenant and remainderman can have a homestead in the same tract of land at the same time, and where the remainder interest was sold under execution before the death of the life tenant, such sale will not be disturbed on the ground that the remainderman was entitled to a homestead therein.

J. B. Wickliffe for appellant.

Reeves & Tharp for appellees.

Appeal from Ballard Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

This appeal involves the construction of the will of A. W. Roach, which reads as follows: "I give and devise to my beloved wife, Nancy Jane Roach, in lieu of her dower, the farm on which we now reside, * * * containing 150 acres, more or less, during her natural life. * * * At the death of my said wife, the real estate aforesaid I give and bequeath to my seven children (naming them) in equal shares; but if either of said children should die before my said wife, leaving no children living at the decease of my wife, then the share of such property so devised to such son or daughter, is hereby devised to the survivors of said children."

The will of testator was duly probated in October, 1891. In 1897, the one undivided one-sixth interest of the appellant, Pink Roach, a son and devisee of A. W. Roach, in this tract of land was sold by the sheriff of Ballard county to satisfy an execution in favor of W. A. Powell, which issued from the office of the Ballard Circuit Court. At this sale the appellee, Wm. Dance, and W. A. Powell, the plaintiff in the execution, became the purchaser of such undivided interest, and in August, 1898, the sheriff executed to them a deed therefor. The interest of W. A. Powell in this purchase was subsequently acquired by F. W. Tharp. After the death of the life tenant, the appellees, Dance & Tharp, instituted this proceeding, asking that the one-sixth interest devised to Pink Roach should be set apart to them, which he resisted on two grounds: First, because his interest in the land was contingent at the date of the sale under the execution, and was, therefore, not liable; second, because he occupied the land with his family in connection with his mother during her lifetime, and was so occupying it at the date of the levy and sale; and that his interest was of less value than $1,000; and that he was entitled to have it set apart to him as a homestead. A general demurrer was sustained to the answer of Roach, and judgment rendered in favor of the appellees, Dance & Tharp, for the land in controversy, and Roach has appealed.

The first question to be determined is, whether the children of testator took a vested or contingent interest in remainder in the tract of 150 acres of land devised to their mother for life. Judge Kent, volume 4, section 202, says: "An estate is vested when there is an immediate right of present enjoyment, or a present fixed right of future enjoyment."

Mr. Minor in his Institutes, volume 2, page 388, after quoting Fearne's definition of vested remainder, 212, says: "It is not the uncertainty of ever taking effect in possession, that makes a remainder contingent, for to this extent every remainder is and must be liable, since the remainderman may die, and die without heirs before the determination of the particular estate. The present capacity of taking effect in possession, if the possession were to become vacant before the estate limited in remainder determines, universally distinguishes a vested from a contingent remainder."

Each of the children of A. W. Roach took under his will a vested remainder, which might be defeated by their death without children before the death of the life tenant, or what is generally called a defeasible fee, and an interest in the land which could be subjected by their creditors during the life of the life tenant. If appellant had died before his mother, the interest would have descended to his children, and appellees would have taken nothing under their purchase. But as he survived her, the interest acquired by appellees by their purchase ripened into a fee simple. (Birney v. Richardson, 35 Ky., 424; Forsythe v. Lansing's Ex'ors, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 1064; Lewis v. Shropshire's Trustee, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 332; Baxter, &c. v. Isaacs, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1618.) Appellant's interest in the land was, therefore, subject to sale unless he was entitled to a homestead exemption therein.

He alleges that he resided with his wife and children upon the land with his mother at the time it was levied upon and sold by the sheriff under the execution; and that his interest being of less value than $1,000 was exempt as a homestead. It was decided in Robinson v. Smithey, 80 Ky., 636, that a party holding the title to a tract of land for life, with remainder to her children, and in the occupancy of the land was entitled to a homestead therein as against her creditors. In Merryfield, &c. v. Merryfield's Ass'ee, 82 Ky., 526, it was further held that the life tenant and remainderman could not have a homestead in the same tract of land at the same time. In the opinion in that case, this court said: "This court has never gone so far as to decide that both the widow and remainderman at the same time can have a homestead in the same tract of land. Nor do we think the statute can be so applied and extended. The rule of the homestead exemption is that the debtor required a prescribed amount in value of land to be set apart for the support of himself and family, but to accomplish such a benificent object he must have the right to occupy and use it, and it is indispensable that the party claiming the exemption must be in the actual possession. But a party having merely an interest in remainder is without any right to the possession, and, in the meaning of the law, not in possession."

It follows from these decisions that appellant was not entitled to a homestead in his interest in the land at the time it was sold by the sheriff under the execution to satisfy his debts; and that the judgment appealed from should be affirmed. And it is so ordered.

HENNING, &c. v. STEVENSON, &c.

(Filed May 24, 1904.)

1. Wills—Testamentary capacity—Undue influence—Instructions—In a will contest where the will was assailed on the ground of incapacity and undue influence, and where it is conceded that the will and codicils were all written by the testatrix herself, the following instructions to the jury are approved:

"First. The court instructs the jury that they should find the paper dated January 5, 1897, read in evidence and purporting to be the last will of Fanny Speed, and the four papers read in evidence as codicils thereto, to be the last will of Fanny Speed, unless they shall believe from the evidence that at the time she wrote said papers, or wrote one or more of them, she was not of sound mind, or that she wrote one or more of them under the influence of some other person or persons.

"Second. But if she was not of sound mind when she wrote the said paper, or one or more of them, they should find the paper or papers written by her when she was not of sound mind, not to be her last will.

"Third. If she wrote the said papers or any part of either of them, under the undue influence of any other person or persons, as defined in instruction No. 5, the jury should find the paper or papers, or the parts thereof written under such undue influence, not to be the last will of the said Fanny Speed."

By instruction No. 4 the court defined mental capacity; by instruction 5 he defined undue influence; by instruction 6 he directed the jury as to the form of their verdict. These were all the instructions given.

2. Evidence—Instructions—Prominence avoided—In a will contest where testable capacity is the issue, the instructions should be so framed as to leave the jury to decide the question on all the evidence without any expression from the court giving prominence to any part thereof; the will being before the jury, will be considered in connection with all the other evidence, in coming to their verdict.

3. Witness—Wife of contestant—Competency—In a will contest the wife of one of the contestants is incompetent as a witness for the contestants, the meritorious cause of the action being in him and not in her.

4. Expert testimony—Where two physicians testified fully, as experts from a hypothetical case put to them, as to the testable capacity, of the testatrix, stating fully the symptoms of the disease known as arterio sclerosis of the brain, the court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to allow them to further testify as experts, by taking the will and explaining to the jury from the will, what evidence they saw from the handwriting and the structure of the instrument that the testatrix was suffering at the time with said disease.

5. Burden of proof—When the propounders of a will have proved the due execution of a paper, not irrational in it provisions nor inconsistent in its structure, language, or details with the sanity of the testator, the presumption of law makes out for them a prima facie case, and the burden of showing incapacity on the part of the testator, is shifted to the contestants.

Pirtle, Trabue, Doolan & Cox, William Lindsay, O'Neal & O'Neal and Julius C. Klein for appellants.

Helm, Bruce & Helm for appellees.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Appellees offered for probate in the Jefferson County Court, a paper purporting to be the will of Fanny Speed. Its validity was contested; the county court admitted the paper to probate; the contestants appealed to the Jefferson Circuit Court where the case was heard before a jury who also found in favor of the will; judgment having been entered on the verdict the contestants appeal to this court. Fanny Speed was the widow of Joshua F. Speed, who died in the year 1882 leaving an estate amounting to over $650,-

000. They had no children; Mr. Speed, by his will, after certain specific devises, gave one-half of his estate to his relatives and the other half to his wife. She received, under the will of her husband, about $335,000. She made her will in January, 1897, and died in the summer of 1902. At the time of her death her estate amounted to over $500,000. Her husband was the partner of her brother, J. W. Henning, and her brother's sons managed her estate for her with rare fidelity and good judgment. Some weeks before the will was made she sent and got some legal cap paper and also got a former will she had made. After this, on two afternoons, she remained in her room and wrote with her own hand, nobody being present or knowing what she had written, the paper in contest, placed it in an envelope and delivered it to a lady who was living with her, to keep as her will. The lady declined to keep it and finally it was delivered to her nephew, Mr. Henning, who had it placed in a box in the vaults of the trust company, whence it was taken after her death, she having subsequently made some codicils to it that are not important. By her will, after a number of specific devises of no great value, she disposed of her entire estate. There was no question on the trial under the evidence, but that the paper was wholly in the handwriting of the testatrix and was executed and published as her will. Its validity was assailed on the ground of incapacity and undue influence. The chief complaint made on the appeal is of the following instructions given by the court:

"1st. The court instructs the jury that they should find the paper dated January 5, 1897, read in evidence and purporting to be the last will of Fanny Speed and the four papers read in evidence as codicils thereto, to be the last will of Fanny Speed, unless they shall believe from the evidence that at the time she wrote the said papers, or wrote one or more of them, she was not of sound mind; or that she wrote one or more of them under the influence of some other person or persons.

"2d. But if she was not of sound mind when she wrote the said papers, or one or more of them, they should find the paper or papers written by her when she was not of sound mind, not to be her last will.

"3d. If she wrote the said papers, or any part of either of them, under the undue influence of any other person or persons as defined in instruction No. 5, the jury should find the paper or papers, or the parts thereof written under such undue influence, not to be the last will of the said Fanny Speed."

By instruction 4 the court defined mental capacity; by instruction 5 he defined undue influence; by instruction 6 he directed the jury as to the form of their verdict. These were all the instructions given. The only instruction complained of is No. 1. This is complained of on the ground that the burden of proof as to capacity, continues upon the propounders throughout the case. But in Milton v. Hunter, 13 Bush, 163, this court, in a well-considered opinion by Chief Justice Lindsay, condemned an instruction which placed the burden of proof as to testamentary capacity upon the propounders, and laid down the rule that when they have proved the due execution of a paper not irrational in its provisions nor inconsistent in its structure, language or details with the sanity of the testator, the presumption of law makes out for them a prima facie case and the burden of showing incapacity on the part of the testator, is shifted to the contestants. This rule has since been followed in Flood v. Pragoff, 79 Ky., 611; Fee v. Taylor, 83 Ky., 259; Brammel v. Brammel, 101 Ky., 72; Howat v. Howat, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 756; King v. King, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 868; Boone v. Ritchie, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 864; Woodford v. Buckner, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 628; Dunnaway v. Smoot, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 2291. The evidence as to the execution of the will by the testatrix and as to its being wholly in her own handwriting. was uncontradicted; there being no conflict of evidence on these matters the court did not err in not submitting them to the jury and in assuming in the instruction that the testatrix had written the paper with her own hand.

But it is insisted that the court erred in not submitting to the jury whether the paper was consistent in its provisions and rational on its face. Our attention is called to the fact that the instruction approved in Brammel v. Brammel and Woodford v. Buckner contained words submitting this question to the jury. But in the Brammel case the instruction had been given on the trial and the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed. In the Woodford case the Brammel case was simply followed. In both these cases the only question considered by the court was as to the burden of proof. The form of the instruction in so far as it relates to the words referred to was not considered, and there is nothing in either of these opinions to show that these words were deemed material. On the other hand, in Howat v Howat and Boone v. Ritchie instructions were approved which were substantially the same as that complained of. It is a question for the court to determine when a prima facie case has been made out.

The court must determine this question in will cases as in others, for himself, and frame his instructions to the jury accordingly When the propounders have shown the execution of a paper rational in its provisions they have made out a prima facie case, and when the court comes to instruct the jury the rule is that he should not instruct them as to the presumptions of law, but should simply so frame his instructions as to indicate the burden of proof without expressly referring to it. (Davis v. Paducah Railway Co., 24 Ky. Law Rep., 185.) Under this rule the court must determine for itself on whom the burden of proof rests and so indicate in his instructions. When he has done this in a will case, it is a question for the jury under all the evidence, whether the testator was of sound mind at the time of the execution of the will. In determining this question they may consider all the evidence before them including the will itself, which, when wholly written by the testator, is potent evidence of the condition of his mind at the time. The rule is that the court should not in his instruction, single out or give prominence to any part of the evidence in the case. The instruction given by the court is preferable to the form referred to in Brammel v. Brammel and Woodford v. Buckner, for it gives no prominence to any of the evidence. The court did not determine for the jury that the will was rational on its face. It indicated nothing on this subject by the instruction. It simply indicated by the instruction the legal presumption in favor of sanity without expressly referring to it. The question to be determined by the jury as to the capacity of the testatrix was, whether she was of sound mind at the time she made the will. On this question the court by the instruction, indicated nothing except the party on whom the burden of proof rested. The jury were left to decide the question on all the evidence before them. The will was before them and they could give it such weight as they saw proper, but after all, the question of testable capacity was the issue to be determined by the jury, and this was properly submitted to them in general terms without any expression from the court giving prominence to any part of the evidence before them. If the court had added to instruction No. 1 the statement that in determining the capacity of the testatrix they should consider all the evidence before them, and that in so doing they should consider the will itself and the nature of its provisions, its practical effect would not have been at all different; for the will was before the jury, it was read and exhibited to them as the sole act of the testatrix in which she was unassisted by any one, and it was of necessity, if rational or irrational, considered by the jury in coming to their verdict.

The wife of one of the contestants was offered as a witness for them. The court refused to allow her to testify and of this they complain. By section 606 of the Civil Code, neither a husband nor his wife shall testify for the other in actions of this character, except in actions which might have been brought by or against the wife if she had been unmarried, and in such actions either but not both of them may testify. The wife had no interest in the case, and if she had been unmarried might have testified. But the meritorious cause of action was in the husband and not in her, and it was not one of those cases in which either the husband or wife may testify. Those are the cases where the meritorious cause of action is in the wife. (Wise v. Foote, 81 Ky., 10.) It is insisted, however, that though she could not testify for her husband she might testify for the other contestants. It has been held that where the defendants are severally liable and separate judgments may be rendered as to each, the wife of one is competent for the others. (Dovey v. Lamb, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 1157.) But a will contest is not a case of this sort. The admissions of one devisee are competent against all the devisees because they have a common interest in the same question, and must stand or fall together, being thus consolidated by their testator and by their own act in claiming under his will. (Beall v. Cunningham, 40 Ky., 399; Rogers v. Rogers, 41 Ky., 244; Gibson v. Sutton, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 868.) The question to be determined here was, whether the paper was the will of the testatrix. All the contestants and all the contestees must stand or fall together. The judgment established a status which determined all their rights. The interest of one could not be separated from the interest of others.

The wife of one of the contestants or devisees was not, therefore, a competent witness for her husband or for any of the other parties joined with him as contestants or contestees. (Wise v. Foote, 81 Ky., 10; Williams v. Williams, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1326.)

Appellants also complain of misconduct of counsel in asking certain questions, the purpose of which was to show that the contestants were already rich and that for this reason the testatrix acted rationally in only giving them one-half of her estate. The contestants are the heirs-at-law of the testatrix, the children of her deceased brother. If these people had been in indigent circumstances, this fact, if known to the testatrix, might have been shown by them as evidence that the testatrix ignored the natural objects of her bounty. The proof shows that she was on very affectionate terms with her relatives and was justly attached to them. To explain why she, under these circumstances, gave them only one-half of her estate and devoted the other half to a certain charity, the propounders undertook to show that she had been for years much interested in this charity, and that her relatives were already abundantly provided for. The evidence was competent for it only placed the jury in the light of the circumstances surrounding the testatrix, and aided them in determining whether she took a rational survey of her estate and disposed of it according to a fixed purpose of her own. The questions objected to were excluded by the court on the ground that they related to the financial condition of the devisees at the time of the trial, and not to their condition at the time the will was made. As over five years had elapsed since the making of the will the ruling of the court was proper, although by statute the will speaks as if executed by the testator immediately before his death. (Kentucky Statutes, section 2849.) But we do not see that there was any misconduct of counsel in asking the questions, for the admissibility of the evidence was a subject on which lawyers might well differ. But the court not having admitted it, we must presume that the jury tried the case under the evidence before them. We do not see anything in the record to indicate that the appellants were prejudiced by this matter; on the contrary, it is hard to see how the jury could have reached any other conclusion under the evidence.

Appellants also complain that two physicians called by them as experts, were not allowed to take the will and explain to the jury from the will, what evidences they saw from the handwriting and the structure of the instrument, that the testatrix was suffering at the time from arterio sclerosis of the brain. The witnesses were allowed to state to the jury fully the symptoms of the disease, and also to state from a hypothetical case put to them, their judgment as to the testable capacity of the person indicated. To have allowed them to have taken the will and gone over it stating what here and there they saw in the omission of letters or proper punctuation, to indicate sclerosis, would have been to have opened up a wide field of inquiry. The court has a discretion in the matters of this sort. The record before us comprises something like 1,000 pages. The real facts about the testatrix were proved by a number of witnesses and we do not see that there was an abuse of discretion on the part of the court in refusing to allow the evidence in question, or that if admitted it could have had any appreciable effect on the case. The will was before the jury. They could see and any attorney could call their attention to anything in the will, either in the shape of the letters or the punctuation or the structure of the sentences that indicated sclerosis. The experts were permitted to tell all the signs of the disease, and one person could apply the symptoms to the writing as well as another. Bad punctuation or the omission of a letter here and there, or badly constructed sentences, are not confined to people who are suffering with sclerosis of the brain and, therefore, what the writing really indicated was to be determined, not alone from expert testimony, but from common experience, as other like questions. In view of the whole record we conclude that appellants got their whole case fairly before the jury and that there is no substantial error to their prejudice shown by the record.

Judgment affirmed.

HELM v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed June 14, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Town marshal—Jurisdiction outside town limits—Appellant was indicted and convicted for maliciously cutting the town marshal, Mike Jackson, while attempting to arrest him outside of the town limits, and his punishment fixed at two years in the penitentiary. Held—That the jurisdiction of a marshal of a town of the sixth class is not confined to the corporate limits of the town, but he may make an arrest any where in the county, without a warrant, where a public offense is committed in his presence.

2. Indictment—Malicious cutting—Instructions—Where a marshal of a town of the sixth class attempted to arrest the defendant who was guilty of disorderly conduct at a picnic outside of the town, and was cut with a knife by the defendant, on the trial of the defendant for maliciously cutting the marshal with intent to kill him, an instruction of the court "that the marshal had the right to arrest the defendant for a public offense committed in his presence without a warrant, if the defendant knew he was marshal, and that it was his duty to submit to the arrest, and if he refused to do so and assaulted the marshal with a knife, then the marshal had the right to repel said assault and use such force as was necessary to do so, and to compel the defendant to submit to the arrest," was proper.

3. Evidence—General moral character of the defendant—It is competent to introduce evidence of the general moral character of the defendant by way of impeaching him as a witness.

N. B. Hays and Loraine Mix for appellee.

Appeal from Daviess Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Appellant, Sim Helm, was indicted and convicted in the Daviess Circuit Court for maliciously wounding Mike Jackson, his punishment being fixed at two years in the penitentiary. Jackson was marshal of the town of Whitesville in Daviess county, a town of the sixth class. There was a church picnic about two miles from the town. Helm was there misbehaving and the marshal was sent for. When he arrived he undertook to arrest Helm, who resisted arrest, and cut the marshal with a knife which he had in his hand. While the evidence is conflicting there was sufficient evidence to warrant the jury in finding that Helm committed a public offense in the presence of the marshal. The chief ground relied on for reversal is, that the court gave the jury the following instruction:

"4th. The court further instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that Mike Jackson was a marshal of the town of Whitesville, a town of the sixth class, in Daviess county, Kentucky, at the time of the cutting and stabbing alleged in the indictment herein, then it was his duty as such marshal to suppress any disturbance of the peace or any disorderly conduct committed in his presence in said county, and to arrest any person guilty of such offense where the offense was committed in his presence, and this he had a right to do without a warrant; it was likewise the duty of the said Mike Jackson acting as marshal, to arrest any person who was guilty of a public offense in his presence, such as using profane language or being drunk in the presence of the marshal, and this it was his duty to do without a warrant; and if the jury further believe from the evidence to the exclusion of a reasonable doubt, that a public offense was committed in the presence of the marshal by the defendant, Sim Helm, and the said Helm knew that Mike Jackson was a marshal, then the said Jackson acting as marshal, had the right to arrest the said Helm, the defendant herein, without a warrant; and if the jury believe from the evidence, to the exclusion of a reasonable doubt, that defendant had committed a public offense in the presence of Mike Jackson, the marshal aforesaid, and knew said Jackson was marshal, and said Jackson attempted to arrest the defendant in Daviess county for said offense committed in his presence, then it was the duty of the defendant to submit to the arrest, and if he refused to do so, and assaulted the said marshal with a knife or deadly weapon, then said marshal had the right to repel such assault, and to use such force as was necessary to repel said assault, and to compel the defendant to submit to the arrest."

It is insisted for appellant that the marshal's jurisdiction was confined to the boundary of the town, and that he was without official authority outside of the corporate limits of Whitesville. By section 3687, Kentucky Statutes, applicable to towns of the sixth class, the marshal is given the powers that are now or may hereafter be conferred upon sheriffs by the laws of the State, and shall in all respects be entitled to the same protection. In Heather v. Thompson, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 1554, we held, following Rigley v. Grace, 17 Ky. Law Rep., 1008, that the marshal of a town of the sixth class may make an arrest outside of the corporate limits of his town. It is earnestly insisted that the decision is wrong, and should be overruled. But we see no reason for departing from a rule which has been laid down. Before the adoption of the present statutes, when the towns of the State were governed by special charters, it was common to insert in them provisions, giving the marshal the same authority as the sheriff within the county in which the town was situated. By section 26 of the Civil Code, in naming who are peace officers, marshals are mentioned, and in section 86, in naming those who may arrest without warrant, it is provided that a peace officer may make such an arrest when a public offense is committed in his presence. Under these provisions of the Code and the Statutes, in force when our present system of municipal government was devised, the marshals of the towns were recognized as peace officers in their respective counties, and if the legislature had intended to change the rule then in force it must be presumed that it would have done so in language evidencing such intention. This it did not do; on the contrary, the language would seem intended to continue in force the rule which had then so long obtained. Were the rule otherwise, evildoers would find in many cases a safe asylum from the municipal officers just outside of the town limits. The rule is admitted that ordinarily an officer's authority is limited to the district which elected him, but this is a matter within the legislative control and his authority may, by the legislature, be made co-extensive with his county, although he is elected by one of its subdivisions.

On the trial, evidence was admitted as to what occurred before Jackson reached the picnic grounds. This evidence was several times excluded by the court, but afterwards it was admitted. Still by the instructions of the court the whole question was made to turn on whether the defendant committed a public offense in the presence of the marshal, and in view of all the evidence and the instructions of the court, we do not see that the defendant's substantial rights were affected by the proof as to what occurred when the marshal was sent for.

The Commonwealth was permitted to show that appellant's general moral character was bad by way of impeaching him as a witness. This also is complained of. But it is settled that the inquiry is not restricted to the witness' character for truth, but that his general moral character may be proved. (Hume v. Scott, 3 Mar., 261; Thurman v. Virgin, 18 B. Mon., 792; Tackett v. May, 3 Dana, 80.)

Judgment affirmed.

KELLY, &c. v. BRAMBLETT.

(Filed June 2, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Questions of law and fact—This case involves numerous land transactions and court proceedings between Middleton & Pace, Miller, DeBard & Everett and the Commonwealth Land and Lumber Co., and in which A. W. Couk and Maria Mott Davis were more or less connected, some of which were tried in the Harlan court of common pleas. There being no novel questions of law presented in the record, and the questions of fact being numerous and complicated, can best be gathered from the opinion in which the controverted questions of law and fact have all been affirmed.

H. L. Stone and Willson & Gifford for appellants.

Helm, Bruce & Helm for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

In the spring of 1887, James Middleton and Calvin Pace conveyed to Miller, DeBard & Everett the land here in controversy, lying in Harlan county, in consideration of $5,645, of which $1,400 was paid, leaving a balance of $4,245 due Middleton & Pace. Subsequently Miller, DeBard & Everett, by written agreement, sold the same land to the Commonwealth Land and Lumber Co. for $10,571.60, of which $375 was paid. The company failed to pay the balance of the price as contemplated by the parties. During the negotiations on March 20, 1888, the company, by its agent, gave Miller, DeBard & Everett an order for $1,500, which was assigned to Middleton & Pace and finally passed to A. W. Couk. The order was not paid, and on June 21, 1888, Couk filed an action in the Harlan court of common pleas against the maker and endorsers of the draft, to recover thereon. In that action the land and lumber company filed its answer in which it set out the purchase of the property referred to, but alleged that Miller, DeBard & Everett had no title to it, and that the title was in one Mary Mott Davis. It made its answer a cross petition, praying that the court determine the condition of the title and that in the event that it be found that its vendors had no title, the title bond to it be cancelled; and that if the court should decide that its vendors had title to the land, then that they be adjudged to convey the land to it on the terms and conditions set out in the title bond. Miller, as surviving partner of Miller, DeBard & Everett, filed an answer which he made a counterclaim against the land and lumber company, setting out that they had purchased the land from Middleton & Pace, the tender of a deed, on November 3, 1888, and denying that there was any defect in their title. Middleton & Pace obtained a quit-claim deed from Maria Mott Davis and filed their answer and counterclaim, praying judgment for the balance due them on the land, and Miller prayed judgment against the land and lumber company for the balance due by it to Miller, DeBard & Everett. In this condition of the pleading the case was submitted to the court on August 18, 1892, judgment having previously been rendered in favor of Couk, and the following judgment was entered:

"This cause having been submitted to the court upon the pleadings and exhibits relating to the cross petition and action of the Commonwealth Land and Lumber Co. against the firm of Miller, DeBard & Everett and the counterclaim of the firm of Miller, DeBard & Everett against the Commonwealth Land and Lumber Co., and the said firm of Miller, DeBard & Everett having tendered a deed of conveyance for the land sold by said Miller, DeBard & Everett to said Commonwealth Land and Lumber Co., which deed, in the opinion of the court, is good and sufficient, it is adjudged that the contract of sale be specifically performed; and the said Commonwealth Land and Lumber Co. having failed to traverse the allegations of the counterclaim of the said Miller, DeBard & Everett, the said counterclaim is taken for confessed, and the court being advised is of the opinion that the said firm of Miller, DeBard & Everett is entitled to the relief demanded. It is, therefore, considered by the court that the said Miller, DeBard & Everett recover of the defendant, the Commonwealth Land and Lumber Co., the sum of $10,571.60, subject to the credit of $375, with interest from the 16th day of July, 1891, until paid.

"The said firm of Miller, DeBard & Everett are also adjudged a lien on several certain tracts or parcels of land named in and described in the Commonwealth Land and Lumber Co.'s cross petition, and which is also described in the counterclaim of the said firm of Miller, DeBard & Everett, which lands the said Miller, DeBard & Everett may have sold for said firm in satisfaction of said judgment.

"It is furthermore adjudged that the cross petition of Middleton & Pace against Miller, DeBard & Everett be taken as true, and that the said firm of Middleton & Pace recover of the firm of Miller, DeBard & Everett the sum of $4,225, with interest thereon from the 16th day of July, 1891, and to recover payment of same they have a superior lien upon said land, and they may have said land sold in satisfaction of this judgment.

"It is furthermore adjudged that said land or a sufficiency thereof be sold to satisfy said judgment and lien. No part of the purchase money collected from the said Commonwealth Land and Lumber Co. shall be paid to said Miller, DeBard & Everett until the superior lien of Middleton & Pace shall have been paid to them." (Here follows order of sale.)

No sale of the land was made under this judgment. Executions were issued in favor of Miller, DeBard & Everett, which were returned no property found. On February 13, 1893, this action was begun in the Jefferson Circuit Court by Miller, DeBard & Everett on the return of no property found under their judgment against the land and lumber company, under section 439 of the Civil Code. On March 4, 1895, execution was issued on the judgment in favor of Middleton & Pace against Miller, DeBard & Everett and levied on the land which was sold by the sheriff and purchased by appellants, and it not having been redeemed, was conveyed to the purchasers by the sheriff on January 22, 1896. Other actions brought by other creditors for the same purpose were consolidated with this action, and in these actions attachments were taken out and levied on the same land. The purchasers of the land at the execution sales referred to were made parties to the actions and set up their title. The land was sold under the execution as the property of Miller, DeBard & Everett. The appellees maintain that the legal title had passed out of Miller, DeBard & Everett to the land and lumber company, under the deed tendered by them by virtue of the judgment above quoted, and also insists that if this be not so, the land was encumbered by liens and, therefore, the sale under the executions only conferred on the purchasers a lien for their purchase money, with interest at 10 per cent., under section 1709, Kentucky Statutes. The circuit court adjudged that the execution sales passed no title to the purchasers, but adjudged them a lien on the property for their purchase money and ordered a sale of the property to satisfy all the liens. From this judgment the execution purchasers have appealed.

The judgment of the Harlan court of common pleas was not void. In its cross petition the land and lumber company prayed that its vendors be adjudged to convey the land to it pursuant to the title bond, if it turned out that they had title. The vendors of the land and lumber company in their counterclaim tendered a deed, denied any defect in their title and prayed judgment for the balance of the purchase money due them. Middleton & Pace also prayed judgment for the balance of the purchase money due them and set up the quit-claim deed from Maria Mott Davis. When the case was submitted to the court on these pleadings, the parties being all before him, he had jurisdiction under their prayer for general relief to enter a degree settling their rights, although Miller, DeBard & Everett had not in terms prayed the specific performance of the contract. None of the parties took an appeal from the judgment, and it had, therefore, become an absolute bar when the execution in favor of Middleton & Pace was issued. Not only so, but Middleton & Pace were parties plaintiff jointly with Miller, DeBard & Everett in this suit instituted in the Jefferson Circuit Court on February 13, 1893, and by instituting that action they elected to stand by the judgment. Having so elected, they are estopped to question its validity, for they can not claim under and against it, nor can they claim that it is valid in so far as it enforces the lien for purchase money and invalid in so far as it decrees specific performance of the contract; for unless the contract was enforced, there would be no lien for purchase money. Miller, DeBard & Everett tendered a deed and asked the court to enforce their lien for the purchase money. When the court decreed them the relief sought, the judgment operated as fully to pass the title as if the lumber company had accepted the deed out of court. The substance of the judgment is that the chancellor requires the land and lumber company to accept the deed and pay the price.

The land and lumber company acquiesced in the judgment, and the title, therefore, necessarily passed to it. It is true that by the terms of the bond and by the terms of the deed the land and lumber company was to pay the balance of the consideration when the deed was made, but when it did not pay, the court gave judgment against it for the money, and in this judgment, as shown above, Miller, DeBard & Everett acquiesced. If the court had added to his judgment words to the effect that the land and lumber company must accept the deed tendered and lodge it in the proper office for record, and this had been done, there would be no question that the title passed. But the legal effect of the judgment the court entered was that the land and lumber company must accept the deed, otherwise so much of the judgment as holds the deed to be sufficient and decrees specific performance, is meaningless. After that judgment was entered the land and lumber company could not have alleged that it had not accepted the deed which had been tendered it or have demanded another, for the court had held that it must accept the deed as tendered. The fact that the deed was not withdrawn from the record and recorded, is immaterial, for title passes by an unrecorded deed. The only purpose of recording a deed is to give notice; and this Middleton & Pace had as they were parties to the action.

We, therefore, conclude that the title to the land having passed to the land and lumber company the circuit court properly held that the purchasers under the execution obtained no title thereto by virtue of the execution sale, and properly adjudged them the money paid by them out of the proceeds of the sale made under the judgment in this case. (Smith v. Frankfort & Cincinnati Railway Co., 24 Ky., 2040; Burnley v. Stephenson, 15 Am. Rep., 621.)

Judgment affirmed.

GEORGE & BRO. v. CITY OF WINCHESTER, &c.

NUNAN v. SAME.

(Filed June 2, 1904.)

1. Local option—Operation in county—Separate vote in precinct—Effect—Under Constitution, section 61, and the act of the general assembly regulating the sale of spirituous liquors under what is known as the "local option law," where, by a vote of the people of a county, said law has been adopted in the entire county, a precinct of a city of the fourth class in such county, after three years from the adoption of said law, may, by an election held under said law, take a vote whether such law shall become inoperative therein; and if a majority of the voters in such precinct shall vote in favor of making such law inoperative therein, the board of council of such city may be compelled by mandamus to grant a license to sell such liquors therein to a proper person, at a proper place, who shall apply therefor in a proper way.

2. Constitution—Statutes—City ordinances—Conflict—It was the intention of the constitutional convention and the general assembly, that the voters in the counties, or political subdivisions thereof, or municipalities therein; should determine whether they would live under the license or prohibition system, and to the extent that section 3490, Kentucky Statutes, apparently authorizes the board of council to refuse to license to sell liquors where a majority of the voters voted to license it, or to license it where they have voted to prohibit its sale, it is invalid.

J. F. Winn and J. M. Stevenson for appellants.

Pendleton & Bush for appellees.

Appeal from Clark Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

On June 27, 1896, by a vote of the people of Clark county the local option law was put in force in the county, including the city of Winchester. On June 28, 1899, an election was held in the North Winchester Precinct to determine whether the local option law should become inoperative in that precinct. A majority of the voters voted that it should become inoperative therein. Winchester is a city of the fourth class. The appellants applied to the board of council for licenses to sell spirituous, vinous and malt liquors in that precinct. Without giving the appellants an opportunity to be heard upon the question as to whether they were suitable persons to carry on the business, the board of council arbitrarily refused to grant a license; thereupon it adopted a resolution expressing the sense of the board that no license to sell spirituous, vinous or malt liquors should be "granted in the city of Winchester during the period of two years, our terms of office." The appellants instituted these proceedings to compel the board of council to grant to each a license to sell liquors. It is averred in the petitions that the plaintiffs are men of good character and suitable persons to conduct the business of selling liquors. The real question to be determined is, can the board of council of a city of the fourth class arbitrarily refuse to grant a license to retail liquor in a precinct which has voted in favor of the sale.

More than three years had elapsed from the time the vote was taken upon the question as to whether the local option law should be in force in Clark county, to the date when the vote was taken in the North Winchester Precinct on the question of the local option law becoming inoperative in that precinct. Section 61 of the Constitution makes it the duty of the general assembly to provide by general law a means whereby the sense of the voters of any county, city, town, district or precinct may be taken as to whether or not spirituous, vinous and malt liquors shall be sold, bartered or loaned therein, or the sale thereof regulated. As required by that section the general assembly passed a local option law for the State. The general assembly has left to the decision of each local community under which of two policies it shall live, the license system or prohibition, and authorized the people to take a vote at certain intervals, and thus change from one system to the other as they see proper. (Sections 2561 and 2563, Kentucky Statutes; Cole v. Commonwealth, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 824; Smith v. Patton, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 165; Commonwealth v. Overby, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 843; Commonwealth v. Bottom, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 412.)

It is urged that the voters did not vote upon the question as to whether liquors should be sold in North Winchester Precinct, because a vote that the local option law should be inoperative is not equivalent to voting that liquors might be sold. It is expressly provided in section 2554, Kentucky Statutes, that the question may be submitted to the voters "whether or not any prohibition law in force in any county, city, town, district or precinct by virtue of any general act or special act or acts shall become inoperative." The question, as provided by the statute, was submitted to the voters of the precinct in question. It is evident that every voter when he voted knew that he was expressing his opinion upon the question as to whether or not liquors should be sold in the precinct. It is the substance of the act done, not the form, that determines its quality and effect.

It is insisted that the board of council had the right to arbitrarily refuse to grant the license to sell liquors by virtue of the charters of the cities of the fourth class, which is section 3490, Kentucky Statutes. It reads as follows: "The council shall have power, by ordinance, to license, permit, regulate or restrain the sale of all kinds of vinous, spirituous or malt liquors within the limits of the city, or to restrain or prohibit the sale thereof within one mile of the limits thereof, provided nothing herein shall be construed as granting the power or right to one town or city to license, permit, regulate, restrain or prohibit the sale of vinous, spirituous or malt liquors in any other town or city, and may fix the penalty or fine for violation of an ordinance under this section at any sum not exceeding $100: Provided, That no license to sell such liquors, to be drunk on the premises where sold, granted under this section, shall be for a less amount than $250 nor for a greater amount than $1,000. For license to sell same by retail, for medical purposes, they may charge not less than $50 nor more than $500. For license to sell same by retail in quantities not less than a quart, they may charge not less than $100 nor more than $500. The board of council, shall at any time, have the power and authority to refuse to grant any license, and to suspend or revoke any license granted under or by virtue of the authority conferred by this section, when the board shall deem it necessary so to do in order to preserve the peace or good morals of said towns, and said board of council shall be the exclusive judges of the necessity."

The act for the government of cities of the fourth class became a law before the local option law was passed. Until that act was passed and put in force, the board of council's authority was defined by that section. This section provides that the board of council may license, permit, regulate or restrain the sale of liquor within the limits of the city, or to restrain or prohibit the sale within one mile of the limits thereof. After Clark county, including the city of Winchester, voted that liquor should not be sold within the limits of the county, no one would seriously contend that the board of council could grant a license to sell liquor within the city of Winchester. Why not? Because the general assembly by virtue of the Constitution had placed it within the power of the voters to prohibit the sale of it in Clark county. The board of council could not nullify the action of the voters in putting in force a law which prohibited the sale of it. It was the intention of the constitutional convention and the general assembly that the voters in the counties or political subdivision thereof or municipalities therein, should determine whether they would live under the license or prohibition system. If the section in question would not authorize the board of council to grant licenses when the voters had put in force the local option law, it certainly would not authorize them to arbitrarily refuse a license when a majority of the voters had decreed that liquor should be sold within the given territory. To the extent that section 3490 apparently authorizes the board of council to refuse a license to sell liquor where a majority of the voters voted to sell it, or to license it where they have voted to prohibit its sale, it is invalid. The section must be read in connection with the local option law. It is the duty of the board of council to grant the license to an applicant at a proper place, if he is a proper person and applies in the proper way. The board of council can not refuse to grant a license under the conditions averred in the petitions. (Riley v. Rowe, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 2168; Hodges v. Metcalf County Court, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 1553, 1706 (In Riley v. Rowe, a provision of the charters of cities of the sixth class was under consideration, and under that provision it was made the duty of the trustees to grant a license to sell liquors whenever a majority had voted therefor. The court in construing the section, held that they should be required to grant a license to a proper person and at a proper place. In our opinion mandamus is the proper remedy.

The judgments are reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

RATTERMAN v. CAMPBELL.

(Filed June 2, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Contract—Specific performance—Separate propositions—Disconnected—Incapacity to contract—O. S. Kline & Co., who are real estate agents, had been endeavoring to purchase from J. O. Campbell for J. B. Ratterman, certain property in the city of Louisville on First street, which resulted in the following propositions:

"Louisville, Ky., February 25, 1902.

"O. S. Kline & Co.—

"I will give $5,500 cash for 49 feet 3 inches by 105 feet of ground on the west side of First street, between Main and Market streets, this city, with brick building on same, No. 218-220. The title to be good and merchantable and free from all incumbrances and taxes.

(Signed) "J. B. RATTERMAN."

This writing was taken by Kline to Campbell and read to but not shown to him, the name of the purchaser being withheld; thereupon Campbell requested until the next day at 10 o'clock to give an answer. The next day the following proposition in writing was signed by Campbell and given to Kline:

"Louisville, Ky., February 26, 1902.

"O. S. Kline & Co.—

"I will sell 49 feet 3 inches by 105 feet of ground on the west side of First street, between Main and Market streets, this city, with brick building on same, No. 218 220, for $5,500, and will pay you 2½ per cent. commission for selling the same, the title to be good and merchantable and free from all incumbrances and taxes.

(Signed) "J. O. CAMPBELL."

On March 1, 1902, Campbell, through his attorneys, addressed Kline & Co. a letter revoking the proposed sale, which they duly received, after which Ratterman indorsed under the signature of Campbell:

"I accept the above proposition.

"J. B. RATTERMAN."

Campbell refusing to convey the property, this action was instituted by Ratterman in equity for specific performance. Held—The proposition to purchase made by Ratterman on February 25, and that to sell by Campbell, made on the 26th, on their face purport to be entirely separate and distinct transactions. There is no reference in either to the other, and they can not be connected except by the introduction of verbal testimony. The only memorandum in writing, signed by the party to be charged, is that of February 26. This, the evidence without contradiction, shows to have been withdrawn before it was accepted by Ratterman. It also appears in evidence that appellee, owing to extreme age (eighty-two years), and his many infirmities of body and mind, was incapable of making a contract, and, under the facts as they appear in the record, we hold that the chancellor's refusal to grant a decree of specific performance, was correct.

Dodd & Dodd and O'Neal & O'Neal for appellant.

Farnsley & Means for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

O. S. Kline & Co., who are real estate agents in Louisville, Ky., had been endeavoring to purchase from J. O. Campbell, for J. B. Ratterman, certain real estate on First street, between Main and Market streets, being No. 218-220, First street, in that city. These negotiations resulted in the following proposition:

"Louisville, Ky., February 25, 1902.

"O. S. Kline & Co.—

"I will give $5,500 cash for 49 feet 3 inches by 105 feet of ground on the west side of First street, between Main and Market streets, this city, with brick building on same, No. 218-220. The title to be good and merchantable, and free from all incumbrance and taxes.

(Signed.) "J. B. RATTERMAN."

This writing and taken by O. S. Kline to J. O. Campbell, and read, but not shown to him, the name of the purchaser being withheld; thereupon Campbell requested until the next day at 10 o'clock, in which to give an answer, desiring, in the meantime, as he said, to consult his family and friends. On the next day, the following proposition in writing, was signed by Campbell, and delivered to O. S. Kline & Co.:

"Louisville, Ky., February 26, 1902.

"O. S. Kline & Co.—

"I will sell 49 feet 3 inches by 105 feet of ground on the west side of First street, between Main and Market streets, this city, with brick building on same, No. 218-220, for $5,500 cash, and will pay you 2½ per cent. commission for selling the same, the title to be good and merchantable, and free from all encumbrances and taxes.

(Signed) "J. O. CAMPBELL."

On March 1, 1902, Campbell, through his attorneys, addressed Kline & Co. a letter revoking the proposed sale, which they duly received; after which, Ratterman indorsed on the proposition under the signature of Campbell:

"I accept the above proposition.

"J. B. RATTERMAN."

Campbell refusing to convey the property, this action was instituted by Ratterman in equity for a decree for specific performance. Upon final hearing, the chancellor dismissed the petition, and, in so doing, we are of opinion that he correctly ruled the law as applicable to this case.

The proposition to purchase, made by Ratterman on the 25th day of February, and that to sell, by Campbell, made on the 26th, on their face purport to be two entirely separate and distinct transactions. There is no reference in either to the other, and they can not be connected except by the introduction of verbal testimony. Smith, in his work on the Law of Contracts, star page 84, thus enunciates the rule applicable to the case in hand: "But though, where there are several papers, the agreement may be collected from them all, provided they are sufficiently connected in sense among themselves, so that a person looking at them all together can make out the connection and the meaning of the whole without the aid of any verbal evidence; yet it is otherwise when such connection does not appear on the face of the writings themselves; for, to let in parol evidence in order to connect them with one another, would be to let in the very mischief which it was the object of the framers of the act to avoid, namely, the uncertainty and temptation to falsehood occasioned by allowing the proof of the contract to depend on the recollection of witnesses." * * *

The only memorandum in writing signed by the party to be charged, is that of February 26, wherein Campbell offered to sell his property for $5,500 cash. This, the evidence, without contradiction, shows to have been withdrawn before it was accepted by Ratterman. The question as to whether or not the attorneys for appellee had been instructed to write the letter of revocation by J. O. Campbell, himself, or by some one for him, is immaterial; they were so authorized, as the evidence shows, and that was sufficient.

One of the defenses of appellee was that, owing to his extreme age (eighty-two years), and his many infirmities of body and mind, he was incapable of making a contract, and there is much evidence in this case to substantiate that claim; so that whether we regard the conclusion of the chancellor, that the offer of sale had been withdrawn before acceptance, as correct, or whether we investigate the sufficiency of the evidence showing the incapacity of appellee to make the contract in question, we are constrained to the conclusion that his refusal to grant a decree of specific performance, was correct.

A decree of specific performance is not at all times a matter of absolute right, but rests largely in the sound discretion of the chancellor. In the case of Woolums v. Horsley, 93 Ky., 582, this court said: "There is a distinction between the case of a plaintiff asking a specific performance of a contract in equity, and that of a defendant resisting such a performance. Its specific execution is not a matter of absolute right in the party, but of sound discretion in the court. It requires less strength of case on the side of the defendant to resist the bill, than it does upon the part of the plaintiff to enforce it. If the court refuses to enforce specifically, the party is left to his remedy at law. Thus a hard or unconscionable bargain will not be specifically enforced, nor, if the decree will produce injustice or under all the circumstances be inequitable, will it be rendered. In other words, a court of equity will not exercise its power in this direction to enforce a claim which is not, under all the circumstances, just, as between the parties, and it will allow a defendant to resist a decree, where the plaintiff will not always be allowed relief upon the same evidence. A contract ought not to be carried into specific performance unless it be just and fair in all respects. When this relief is sought, ethics are considered, and a court of equity will sometimes refuse to set aside a contract, and yet refuse its specific performance."

In the case cited, it was said in the opinion of the defendant: "He was then about sixty years old, uneducated, afflicted with disease disabling him from work, owned no other land, and but very little personal property. He knew but little of what was going on in the business world owing to his situation and circumstances in life. He moved in a small circle."

In the case of Horsley v. Asher's Heirs, 94 Ky., 314, it was said: "We think it is also clear that J. D. Asher did not, nor was able to, comprehend the nature, import and effect of the contract he made, and was, in fact, overreached and defrauded by Horsley acting through his agent. Asher was, at the date of that bond, upwards of seventy years of age. He had been diseased and suffered physical pain for several years to such an extent that he had not attempted, nor was qualified, to properly transact business, all of it having been done during a period of five or six years by his wife or sons. The witnesses also testify, without contradiction, that he, though originally a man of good sense and business capacity, had become, at the date of the bond, childish and notionate. In fact, he closed the contract and signed the bond at the agent's house, where he had gone for another purpose, without taking any time for reflection or consultation, and was in a few hours eager, and offered to rescind, but the agent refused to do so. * * * In our opinion the contract was not one fit to be enforced in a court of equity, but was made to such disadvantage of J. D. Asher as to induce belief, which the evidence makes a conviction that he was, by reason of want of capacity to understand the meaning and effect thereof, overreached and defrauded." To the same effect is the case of Cocanougher v. Green, 93 Ky., 519.

In the case of McCabe v. Matthews, 155 U. S., 558, it was said: "A decree for the specific performance of a contract for the sale of real estate, does not go as a matter of course, but is granted or withheld acording as equity and justice seem to demand, in view of all the circumstances of the case."

In the case of DeSollar v. Hanscome, 158 U. S., 216, the court, through Justice Brewer, thus announces the rule: "And where the existence of a contract is a matter of doubt, equity will not, as a rule, decree specific performance, especially in a case like this, where, as appears, the property was rapidly rising in value"

In the case at bar, the appellee was over eighty years old, infirm both in body and mind, and had, for a year or two, practically been able to do little or no business. It is true that he came to his place of business daily, when well enough, but seems to have relied entirely upon his son, E. C. Campbell, in all matters requiring an exercise of judgment. The price he was induced to name for his property was much below its real value, and, upon the whole case, we think the conclusion of the chancellor, in his refusal to decree a specific performance, rests upon sound equitable principles.

Wherefore, the judgment is affirmed.

COURT OF APPEALS OF KENTUCKY.

COMMONWEALTH LAND AND LUMBER CO., v. CORNETT, &c.

(Filed June 2, 1904—Not to be reported.)

In an action which involved title to a large tract of land, the plaintiffs were entitled to a continuance upon an affidavit of one of their counsel to the effect that the chief attorney was absent, 150 miles away; that he had entire preparation of the case; that one of the defendants had told him that the litigation would be compromised and that absent counsel had been so informed, and over this affidavit was another from this defendant saying that conversation was had but that the the proffered compromise was all off. In view of these statements, time should have been given plaintiffs to prepare their case and take their proof.

W. S. Pryor and W. F. Hall for appellant.

H. C. Clay for appellees.

Appeal from Harlan Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

This action involves the title to a large boundary of land situated in Harlan county, Kentucky. The only question for review on this appeal is the correctness of the judgment of the trial court in overruling appellants' motion for a continuance, in order that they might get in their evidence, and the submission of the case over their protest.

The issues were made up in December 1902. At a special term of the Harlan Circuit Court in July, 1903, appellees, who were defendants below, filed a supplemental answer. The special term continued up to the commencement of the regular August term of the court; during this term, the appellees (defendants), who had taken some evidence, moved for a submission of the case in chief, and that the allegations of the supplemental answer be taken as true, which was objected to by appellants; thereupon the counsel for appellants filed his own affidavits, in which he, in substance, states that appellant W. L. Bramlette, who had charge of the preparation of the case, was absent from Harlan county, and resided 150 miles therefrom; that when last in Harlan county, he had had a conference with A. B. Cornett, one of the appellees, with a view of compromising and adjusting the matters in litigation between them, and that the counsel had been informed that the proposed compromise would be effected; he also filed the affidavit of one Huff to the same effect; that relying upon this information, he, as counsel for the appellants (plaintiffs), had not taken the testimony of his clients, and the case was wholly without preparation, so far as the evidence was concerned; that during the special term of the court in July, and since the regular term in August had commenced, he had been so engaged in the court with his professional duties as to render it impossible for him to take the evidence; that appellants (plaintiffs) had a meritorious cause of action, and if afforded an opportunity so to do, he could secure testimony sufficient to substantiate the allegations of the pleading.

Opposing this, the affidavit of appellee Cornett was filed, admitting the conversation with Bramlette in regard to the compromise, but stating that he had refused to accept the proffered terms, and that all propositions of compromise were at that time ended, and he had so informed Bramlette. It may be conceded that appellants had been guilty of laches in the preparation of their case, and that the counsel had relied upon rather vague talk of compromise; but considering the fact that appellees had filed a supplemental answer at the special term, immediately preceding the regular term, and that the counsel had been engaged busily in the court since that time, we are inclined to the opinion, that, under all the circumstances, the court should have given appellants an opportunity to obtain their evidence. Any other conclusion would result in the loss to them of the land involved in the litigation, and this, we are loath to see done, except by a judgment upon the merits of the case.

For the reasons indicated the judgment is reversed, each party to pay their own cost on this appeal.

BENEDICT, &c. v. WILHOITE, &c.

(Filed June 2, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Vacation of judgment—Pleading—In an action to vacate a judgment, where the petition alleges that plaintiffs are nonresidents of the State; that they had instituted an action for damages for the removal of timber; that while the action was pending their attorneys, without their knowledge or consent, and against their will, entered into an agreement with the defendants as to the location of their division line, and that by such agreement they would lose 300 acres of land, and that they had no knowledge of these transactions until shortly before the filing of their action, a cause of action is stated and the petition is sufficiently definite and specific.

2. Same—Attorney and client—It is a well settled rule that an attorney has no power by virtue of his retainer, without express authority, to compromise a pending suit of his client so as to bind him, although the client may live in a distant State.

W. O. Jones, H. W. Stoy, J. S. Lay and M. M. Logan for appellants.

J. S. Wortham for appellees.

Appeal from Grayson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The appellants brought this action in equity in the Grayson Circuit Court.

to set aside and vacate a judgment which was entered by consent by attorneys representing them and Alexander Williams, the father of appellee, in a controversy over a division line between their respective tracts of land.

The defendants filed a general demurrer to their petition, and also a motion to make more specific. The motion to make more specific was sustained. Appellants thereupon filed an amended petition, and the trial court again sustained a motion requiring them to make the averments to their petition as amended, more specific. They then tendered a second amended petition which the court refused to allow them to file, on the ground that it did not cure the defects of their original and first amended petition, and dismissed their action, and they have appealed. The petition alleges in substance that they were nonresidents of the State of Kentucky; and that they had instituted an action in the Grayson Circuit Court against William Vanmeter, Aaron Scott and Alexander Williams, the father of the defendants, to recover damages for cutting and removing timber from certain lands owned by them; and that while this action was pending, the attorneys whom they had employed to represent them, without their knowledge or consent, and against their will, entered into an agreement with Alexander Williams, the father of the defendants, as to the location of the division line between their respective tracts of land, and which, on the 12th of April, 1894, they entered up as a judgment of the court in the pending action; and that subsequently, on the 26th of July, 1894, their attorneys, also without their knowledge or consent, and against their will, entered into another and distinct agreement with Alexander Williams, establishing another and distinct division line between their respective tracts of land, which was also entered upon the records of the court as an agreed judgment in the action; that the attorneys who assumed to represent them in this matter had no authority to do so; and that as a result of these unauthorized judgments, they had lost more than 300 acres of valuable land; that they had no knowledge of these transactions until shortly before the institution of this suit, and prayed that both of the agreed judgments entered in April and July, 1894, should be vacated and set aside. While the petition seems to be unnecessarily prolix, we are of the opinion that it sets out a good cause of action and was sufficiently definite and specific. It is well settled that an attorney has no power by virtue of his retainer, without express authority, to bind his client by a compromise of a pending suit, or any other matter intrusted to his care, although the client may live in a distant State.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

SUMMERS v. SUMMERS.

(Filed June 2, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Practice—Judgment of inferior court—This court will treat the judgment of a lower court as the verdict of a properly instructed jury; that is, a judgment thus rendered will not be reversed unless it is palpably against the evidence.

2. Contract for the sale of real estate—Commissions—Where the seller of land agreed to pay 5 per cent. commission to whoever would sell his property for as much as $6,500, the fact that one of the parties who helped effect the sale had accepted $50 for his services, the judgment of the lower court in awarding the amount of the commission less the $50, will not be disturbed where it appears that the land brought a sum in excess of what the seller asked, and where the agent who took the $50 did so upon the understanding that if, upon its sale, it brought as much as the contract price, he was to share his part of the commission.

Allen & Ewing, Sandidge & Sandidge and Allen Sandidge for appellant.

Fox & Jackson for appellee.

Appeal from Cumberland Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

This action was instituted by appellee to recover $335, the balance of a 5 per cent. commission for making the sale of land for the appellant. The law and facts were submitted to the court and a judgment was rendered for the appellee for the amount claimed, less $50. This court will treat the judgment of the lower court as the verdict of a properly instructed jury. The rule is that a judgment thus rendered will not be reversed, unless it is palpably against the weight of the evidence. There is no conflict in the evidence on some material matters. The evidence shows that the appellant employed the appellee to sell his farm in Barren county, and for making the sale he was to receive 5 per cent. commission, if it brought as much as $6,500. After this was done the appellee called the attention of W. T. Ewing, a real estate agent at Harrodsburg, to the fact that the appellant had the farm for sale; thereupon Ewing wrote to appellant for authority to make the sale of the land. Both appellee and Ewing testified that Ewing was to act with appellee in making the sale, and that they agreed between themselves to divide the commission for making it. It is agreed by all the parties that the commission was to be 5 per cent. of the amount for which the farm should sell, providing it be sold for as much as $6,500. Many letters were exchanged between the parties. On April 24, 1902, appellant wrote appellee a letter in which he said: "As to you and Ewing dividing the commission, you all will have to settle that yourself. I will give 5 per cent. to whoever sells the property, and nothing if do not sell. Now, I don't think there is any room for any misunderstanding in the matter. If you find a man, you and Ewing decide whose customer that he is. * * * I am not willing to pay but one commission on the sale of the property, so I think you will understand this."

This shows that the appellant had been apprised that there had been some arrangement made between appellee and Ewing as to the division of the commission for selling the land, and as to that matter he expressed a purpose to allow the appellee and Ewing to arrange that between themselves; but he made it plain that he was to pay but one commission. Under this arrangement between the appellee and Ewing, they procured a purchaser for the land. There were supposed to be 460 acres in the tract, and the purchaser had agreed to pay $6,000 for it, but before the sale was consummated he insisted that the land should be surveyed to ascertain the number of acres in the boundary, and they agreed that if the number of acres should be less than 460, there should be a corresponding reduction of the price, and if the boundary contained more than that number of acres, then he was to pay for the land in excess at the price per acre agreed upon in the sale of the land. To evidence this contract a writing was executed. It was really a sale by the acre. By the survey it was ascertained that instead of there being 460 acres in the boundary, there was 515, which made the contract price $6,700, which was actually paid the appellant by the purchaser. None of the parties at the time the contract was consummated, knew what the purchaser would have to pay for the land under his contract. If there had been no contract other than the one we have mentioned, the appellant should have paid the 5 per cent. commission on the $6,700, because the purchaser was furnished by the appellee and Ewing, or rather by the appellee through the agency of Ewing.

The principal ground of defense is, that just before the writing evidencing the sale of the land was executed, Ewing agreed to take $50 in full of his commission for making the sale, and that subsequently that amount was paid to him.

We will assume that the appellee was bound by whatever Ewing did as to the adjustment of the amount of commission to be paid. We are of the opinion from the facts of this case, that in good conscience appellant should have paid the 5 per cent. commission, because the appellee and Ewing had furnished the purchaser of the land at a price greater than $6,500. Ewing testified that when he agreed to accept the $50, that it was agreed that if the purchase price should turn out to be as much as $6,500, he was to have the 5 per cent. commission acording to their contract. The court gave judgment for $335, less the $50 paid to Ewing. In doing this, he reached the conclusion that Ewing's version was the correct one. Under all the facts and circumstances of this case, we are unwilling to say that the judgment is so palpably against the weight of the evidence that it should be reversed for that reason.

The judgment is affirmed.

MILLER, &c. v. McCONNELL, &c.

(Filed May 24, 1904.)

Pleading—Technical errors—Trial on merits—Appeal—When the parties in a case have tried out the only issues presented, the judgment will not be reversed because the pleadings in the case are technically bad. Civil Code, section 134, requires that no error in a pleading shall be considered on appeal that does not affect the substantial rights of the party complaining, and where technical errors are invoked merely to injure the other party, they ought to be ignored by the courts, after judgment on the merits.

Z. Gibbons and A. B. Ambrose for appellants.

Breckinridge & Shelby and W. Worthington for appellees.

Appeal from Fayette Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

The petition and cross petition seeking to collect debts owing by appellants to appellees, secured by mortgages, failed to set out the condition of the mortgages or their breach. The only issue made was whether the consideration had partly failed as to one debt and as to certain payments upon the other. On these issues the circuit court adjudged the case in favor of appellee, the suing creditors. The judgment also decreed an enforcement of the mortgage liens and sale of the mortgaged property to satisfy them. This appeal presents the sole question whether the judgment of sale was proper under the state of pleading.

Undoubtedly, good pleading requires the conditions of the mortgage to be set out in the petition, as well as that the breach of the condition be alleged. The fact that the mortgage is filed with the pleading can not aid its defects or supply omissions in the pleading. The rule is, an exhibit may be looked to to contradict a pleading, and make it bad, but not to help it. (Riggs v. Maltby & Co., 2 Met., 88; Hill v. Barrett, 14 Ben Mon., 67; Murphy v. Estes, 6 Bush, 582; Huffaker v. Monticello, 12 Bush, 287; Gardner v. Con. Ins. Co., 25 Ky. Law Rep., 426.)

But the parties in this case have tried out the only issues presented. So far as the judgment goes upon the issues presented, it is not questioned, and seems to us to be right. The Code of Practice, section 134, requires that no error in pleading shall be considered on appeal that does not affect the substantial rights of the party complaining. The execution of the mortgages is expressly admitted The only effect of a reversal on account of the technical lapse of the pleaders, would be to impose costs upon appellees with no benefit whatever to appellants. While technical rules of pleading and practice are maintained and are valuable to protect the rights of parties, the modern practice and aim as brought about by our Code system, is to prevent them being used, as formerly, to defeat the ends of justice. When they cease to protect the complainant, and are invoked by him merely to injure the other party, they ought to be ignored by the courts, after judgment upon the merits. (Riggs v. Maltby, & Co., supra.)

Judgment affirmed.

OBERDORFER v. WHITE.

(Filed May 24, 1904.)

Lieber & Lincoln for appellant.

Samuel Avritt for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, Second Division.

Judge Hobson delivered the following response to petition to correct mandate:

Appellee obtained a judgment in the Jefferson Circuit Court adjudging a deed executed by her to appellant to be a mortgage. He appealed from that judgment, with supersedeas to this court, and the judgment was affirmed. (Oberdorfer v. White, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 1629.) The clerk entered up a judgment affirming the judgment appealed from, with damages. A motion is now made to correct the mandate in so far as it awards damages. Section 764 of the Civil Code provides that 10 per cent. damages on the amount superseded shall be awarded against the appellant upon the affirmance of a judgment for the payment of money, the collection of which has been superseded. The only judgment for money in favor of appellee was the judgment for costs in the action. It has been the uniform rule of the court not to adjudge damages on costs. It was so held in Hanley v. Russell, 8 Ky., 152, and this rule has been uniformly maintained by the court since.

The motion to correct the mandate is, therefore, sustained.

TALLIFERRO, &c. v. THORNTON'S EX'OR, &c.

(Filed May 24, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Wills—Personal representative—Power of—Where it was provided in a will that the executor should continue the business of the testator, and exercise his own judgment in the management of the estate so as to produce the best results, he had the right to mortgage certain of the real estate in order to procure money to pay the indebtedness of the estate.

Brent Spence and Thos. Healey for appellants.

Wright & Wright and Matt Herol for appellees.

Appeal from Campbell Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

Appellants are legatees under the will of R. T. Thornton. A clause of the will authorized and empowered the executor to continue the business of the testator for a season, and to exercise his own judgment in the management and sale of his estate so as to produce the best results in reducing it to cash in order to pay the testator's debts and the specific legacies created by the will. It also empowered him to sell the property to pay the indebtedness, or to mortgage the property or any of it, if necessary to secure debts, which he was authorized to renew, and to convert simple debts into specialties. Some years after the qualification of the executor, he mortgaged certain of the real estate belonging to the testator's estate, to appellee, the German National Bank of Newport, to secure a note made to it for borrowed money obtained by the executor, it is alleged and undenied, to discharge the indebtedness of the estate. In this suit to settle the executor's accounts and sell the unsold lands to liquidate the estate, the bank asserted and was adjudged a lien under its mortgage. Appellants complain on the ground that the power vested in the executor was not broad enough to authorize the mortgage. In our opinion it was But, even if not, as the money was used to pay indebtedness which was a claim against the estate before devisees were entitled to anything, the bank ought to have been subrogated to the rights of the creditors whose debts were discharged.

In addition to the foregoing, Sarah J. Thornton, a sister and favored devisee of the testator, was given a certain interest in his estate, which was expressly given priority over all other devises. It appears that this interest was greater than the estate mortgaged to the bank—at least greater than it brought at the decretal sale. She joined the executor in the mortgage. It, therefore, appears that if any one was injured by the executor's act it was she, and as she is not objecting, it can not affect the rights of appellants whether the mortgage was or was not authorized by the will.

Judgment affirmed.

(Filed May 24, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Lane & Harrison for appellants.

H. H. Herr, Tyler Barnett and R. L. Greene for appellees.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division.

Judge Hobson delivered the following response to petition for rehearing:

In the case of William Specht v. Barber Asphalt Co., this day decided, it was held, following Cooper v. Nevin, 90 Ky., 90, that to produce equality of burden contemplated by the statute, cross streets will be extended so as to intersect the street improved. The chancellor ordered the commissioner to charge the quarter squares contiguous to the improvement according to the rule laid down in the statute. The presumption is the commissioner did his duty and that the judgment of the circuit court is right. It is insisted in the petition that part of the territory in contest is not defined into squares by principal streets. To illustrate, the maps filed do not show a street parallel to Frankfort avenue west of Young avenue, nor a street west of Young avenue and parallel to it. But we know from the record that the territory in contest lies at the east end of the city of Louisville. The body of the city lies west of it, and that the city boundary extends a considerable distance east of it is shown by the records. The territory east of Young avenue for a considerable distance is defined by streets into squares, and we must presume, although it is not so laid down on the map, that the territory to the west of Young avenue is also defined into squares by streets. We also know that 420 feet is the depth of an ordinary square. The commissioner went back 210 feet, which i s one-half a square. The apportionment made by the commissioner seems to do justice between the parties, and we do not find in the record, evidence that it was not made in accordance with the chancellor's order. On the contrary, everything in the record supports the presumption of law in favor of the report. In this case the chancellor found as a fact in the judgment referring the case to the special commissioner, that the territory was defined by streets into squares, and this conclusion of his is borne out by the record before him at that time under the rulings of this court. In fact, we do not see that the defendant had taken any proof to contradict the proof taken by the city on the subject of the streets. The other questions discussed by counsel seem to be sufficiently disposed of in the original opinion. The petition was considered by a judge other than the one who wrote the opinion.

The petition for rehearing is overruled.

ADAMS v. CITY OF ASHLAND, &c.

(Filed May 24, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Street improvements—Cost of—In an action to enjoin a city of the fourth class from entering into contracts for the paving of certain streets, judgment dismissing the petition and denying the injunction sought, will be upheld where the ordinance providing for the improvement was enacted pursuant to section 3572 of Kentucky Statutes, and the various subsections thereof.

2. Same—The spreading of cinders and ashes upon a graded street can not be called original construction; it is only temporary in its nature and only intended to serve the passing needs of the city until such time as a permanent improvement can be made.

Proctor K. Malin for appellant.

Hager & Stewart for appellees.

Appeal from Boyd Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

Appellant filed a petition in the Boyd circuit court seeking to enjoin the city of Ashland and the mayor and members of the city council from entering into contracts for the paving of certain streets in that city, and to enjoin and restrain them from issuing bonds of the city to provide a fund to pay for the improvement. The suit involves the validity of an ordinance of the city (a city of the fourth class), passed pursuant to the provisions of section 3572, and the various subsections thereof, of Kentucky Statutes. The ordinance provides that certain named streets of the city shall be paved with vitrified paving brick, with curbing and gutters. The cost was, by the ordinance, to be apportioned among the owners of abutting property according to the number of front feet owned by each. The ordinance also provides that bonds shall be issued for the cost of the improvement which is admitted to be $70,000, the bonds, principal and interest, to be paid out of the assessment against the property abutting upon the streets, and to be collected in ten annual installments in accordanec with the provisions of section 3575, Kentucky Statutes

It is admitted that appellant is the owner of a lot fronting fifty feet on one street, and ninety-two and one-half on another, which are embraced by the improvements ordered by the ordinance, and that prior to the adoption of the present charters of cities of the fourth class, the city of Ashland was an incorporated city of this State, incorporated under act of assembly, approved 26th of March, 1876; that under the provisions of that act the city council was empowered to grade, construct and improve the streets of the city, and apportion the cost among the owners of property abutting upon the streets so improved, according to the number of front feet owned by each; that the amounts so apportioned were liens upon such lots; that pursuant to the original charter the council of said city, in the years 1890 and 1891, adopted an ordinance for the improvement of these same streets by grading and macadamizing same with cinders and mill ashes, and that pursuant to that ordinance these streets were so improved in accordance with specifications adopted by the council, and the cost thereof apportioned against the property abutting upon the streets; that the cost apportioned against appellant for the improvement of Greenup avenue, one of the streets mentioned, was $34.60 for the lot mentioned, exclusive of gutters and curbing, and the cost thus apportioned for the improvement of Sixteenth street, another of the streets mentioned, was $42.25, exclusive of curbing and gutters. These figures apply to one-half of the width of the streets adjacent to the lots against which they were charged. It is also admitted that $70,000, for which the bonds were to be issued, exhausts the revenue provided for the year in which the ordinance was adopted.

Greenup avenue is 100 feet wide and Sixteenth street (or Broadway) is also 100 feet wide. It will thus be seen that the cost of this so-called construction was, in the first instance, less than 70 cents a front foot, and in the second about 50 cents per front foot against appellant's lot, and proportionally of course against all others.

Under the statute applicable to cities of the fourth class the cost of reconstruction of a street, but not of curbing, must be borne alone by the city. The cost of reconstructing the curbing and of original construciton of a street must be borne by the abutting property according to the front feet of the lot.

The first question is, whether the proposed construction is an original construction or a reconstruction of that street. This is practically the same question which the court had under consideration in City of Catlettsburg v. Self, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 161. The spreading of cinders and ashes upon a graded street can scarcely be called an original construction of a street as contemplated by the statute. At best it was temporary in its nature, and intended only to serve the passing needs of the city until such time as its growth and the extent of travel over the proposed street was such as to require or justify a radical and permanent improvement. A construction by using cinders and ashes is but little more permanent than would have been the grade of the original earth. The nature of the material and its very slight cost alike, show that it was intended merely as a temporary affair.

Upon the other point this case differs but little in the facts, and not at all in principle, from Catlettsburg v. Self, supra. Here it is not proposed to issue the city's bonds as a municipal liability, or that the city shall at all become liable for the cost of this work. It is to be charged alone against the abutting property, and to be paid by that property. There can be no liability against the city for the work. The holders of the bonds would be compelled to look alone to the fund created by the collection of these assessments against the abutting property for their payment. The inhibition of section 157 of the Constitution against a municipality's becoming indebted in any year beyond the revenues of such year, without a favorable vote of two-thirds of the voters upon the proposition, can not apply.

The judgment of the circuit court denying the injunction and dismissing the petition is affirmed.

SCHERM v. GARRETT'S ADM'R.

STITES v. BARTLETT, &c.

(Filed May 24, 1904.)

Lien on land for ditching—Lis Pendens purchaser—The appellant's having purchased their lands after proceedings had been begun in the county court under the drainage act of March 17, 1896, section 2358a, Kentucky Statutes, and a judgment entered in said court that a ditch should be established and the cost thereof apportioned on the lands in the district, which included appellants' lands, they were lis pendens purchasers, and a lien attaches to their lands for their porportion of the cost of the ditch.

R. G. Hill for appellants.

J. R. Hays for appellees.

Appeal from Daviess Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

These actions were brought by the respective appellants to quiet their title to certain parcels of land in Daviess county, which they are the owners of, as against the claims of appellees for liens asserted by them for the cost of establishing a ditch under the drainage act. The lots were proceeded against as the property of Thomas S. Pettit. As a matter of fact, the beneficial owner was R. G. Hill. Hill was a party to the proceeding in the county court to establish the ditch at the cost of the property owners cited, but it was because of other property which he owned. However, he was an attorney for the petitioners in the proceeding, drew the orders, and urged and procured their entry by the county court, establishing the ditch and apportioning its costs against the lands of the district established by the order of the court, including the lands in controversy.

Pending the proceedings Hill was adjudged to be the owner of the title of the lots in question. After the judgment of the county court directing the opening of the ditch, and apportioning its cost according to the report of the viewers, Hill sold and conveyed these lands to the appellants. As was required by the statute, due advertisement was made, offering to the owners of the lots the right to do the work themselves, as required by the report of the viewers under the judgment of the court, but in default thereof the contracts were sold to the lowest and best bidder within the statutory price. Such bidder is called, in the statute, the purchaser of the contract. He completed the work without objection from appellants, and was thereafter given a certificate of that fact by the surveyor. The owner against whom the assessment had been made, Pettit, having refused upon demand to pay the ditch taxes assessed against him, the certificate was levied upon the land by the sheriff.

Appellants contend that this was illegal because Pettit had personal property out of which the sum could have been made, and until it was exhausted the sheriff could not legally destrain the real estate for taxes. This question, however, was presented on the appeal of appellant against the sheriff from the judgment of the court dismissing the sheriff from the suit, and was decided adversely to appellant's contention in that case. (Scherm v. Short, Sheriff, 25 Ky. Law Rep, 1108.)

The only other ground of complaint of enough importance to attract serious attention, is the claim of appellants, that as they were innocent purchasers of the land without notice of the proceeding in the dicth case, and that as no notice was filed under section 2858a, Kentucky Statutes (being the act of March 17, 1896), the land can not be charged in their hands with this lien. The court is of opinion that the section relied on would be applicable if the proceedings to create the lien against the original owner, Hill or Pettit, as the case may be, had progressed to the point where the contractor had obtained a lien or a right to a lien upon the land. But such was not the case here. At the time that appellants bought, the proceedings (which were had under section 2880, Kentucky Statutes) had gone only so far as the determination, by judgment of the county court, that a ditch should be established and opened at that point, and that a certain proportion of its cost should be devolved upon the land in question. By the terms of the statute the owner is permitted to himself do the work, and not until he has refused or failed for a given number of days after the confirmation of the report of the viewers, and the contract be let by the county court clerk under subsection 19 of the act. So that when appellants bought the land the situation was, that it had been ascertained in a proceeding in rem against it, that it would be benefited or improved more than the cost assessed against it for the proposed public ditch, that the owner, appellants' vendor, had the right to himself then do this work so far as this land was assessed. Up to that time no one had a lien against the land, nor a right to such lien. After appellants' purchase the contract was offered for sale. It was then, upon appellees' buying the contract, that any one for the first time had a right to a lien against appellants' land for any sum in connection with this work. If such contractor wanted to protect himself against innocent purchasers from appellants, he could have done so only by filing the lis pendens notice provided for in section 2358a, supra. But as between the parties, that is, the contractor and the then owner, the lien was enforcible. The only chance the contractor took in the matter was that appellants might have sold and conveyed the land to another, an innocent purchaser, for value, without notice, and thus have defeated his claim for a lien. Hill, the vendor, did not sell the land improved by the ditch. Up to the time of sale the improvement was merely one in contemplation, that added neither to the value of the land, nor created a charge against it. There being neither a lien in existence against the land, nor a claimant of such lien, it was obviously impossible for the lis pendens notice provided for by section 2358a, supra, to have been filed. That section could not, therefore, have applied to this proceeding at that time.

The judgments in both cases are affirmed.

STAGGENBORG v. BAILEY, BY, &c.

(Filed May 24, 1904.)

1. Guardian ad litem—Right to appeal—Where an attorney is appointed guardian ad litem for infant defendants in the lower court, his services do not end with the judgment in lower court, but he may, under said appointment, prosecute an appeal to the Court of Appeals if he believed it to be to the interest of the infant defendant that he should do so.

2. Allowance for services—Where a guardian ad litem was allowed a fee of $50 in the lower court for his services in that court, for the infants in a will contest which was decided adversely to the infants, and he prosecuted an appeal to the Court of Appeals where the judgment was affirmed, an allowance of $300 as an additional fee by the lower court for his services in the Court of Appeals was excessive, his services being no more onerous in the appellate court than in the lower court. An additional allowance of $50 would have been sufficient.

3. How service to be estimated—In making such allowance the court should have in view the character of the litigation, the amount involved, the labor performed, and the results achieved by the guardian ad litem.

P. J. Ryan and T. J. Michie for appellant.

L. J. Crawford for appellee.

Appeal from Campbell Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

By the will of Bridget Kelley, a widow, a small estate was devised in trust for the benefit of her only child, Anna Staggenborg, during her life, with remainder over to her three infant granddaughters, children of Anna Staggenborg. The will was probated by order of the Campbell County Court. Anna Staggenborg prosecuted an appeal therefrom to the Campbell Circuit Court. Upon her motion, S. C. Bailey, an attorney, was appointed guardian ad litem for the infant defendants in the absence of a statutory guardian. A trial before a jury resulted in a judgment invalidating the will. S. C. Bailey, as guardian ad litem, at the termination of the trial in the circuit court, was allowed on his motion, $50 for his services, to be taxed as cost, and prosecuted an appeal as guardian ad litem from the judgment of the circuit court to this court in behalf of the infant defendants, which resulted in an affirmance of the judgment. (Staggenborg, &c. v. Staggenborg, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 1073.) He subsequently filed the mandate of affirmance in the lower court, and moved for an additional allowance for his services and expenses as guardian ad litem. Over the objection of Anna Staggenborg, he was allowed an additional fee of $300, the cost of the transcript of the record and the necessary cost incurred by him in the Court of Appeals, and a judgment was entered directing the payment to him of these various sums, and that they should be taxed as cost and paid by plaintiff, who has appealed to this court. She asks a reversal on the ground that the circuit court had no jurisdiction to make the order for the additional allowance to the appellee, after the affirmance of the judgment of the lower court by this court.

The duties of a guardian ad litem do not terminate with the rendition of a judgment in the trial court, but he may, when he thinks it to be to the interest of the infant defendants, take an appeal therefrom, and his duties continue until the final determination of the cause, unless removed by the court or terminated by the arrival of the infant at the age of majority. (15 A. & E. Enc. of Law, 15; Reed, &c. v. Louisville Bridge Co., 71 Ky., 69; Hussey v. Seargent, &c., 25 Ky. Law Rep., 315.) And there was no final determination of the litigation until the mandate of affirmance from this court was filed in the circuit court. In many States of the Union the allowance to a guardian ad litem is made by the court wherein the services were rendered; but in this State it has been expressly decided that the allowance to a guardian ad litem for the services rendered by him in the entire case, must be made by the court wherein he was appointed. (Robertson v. Fidelity Trust and Safety Vault Co., 11 Ky. Law Rep., 318; Williams v. Williams, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1753.) Subsection 4 of section 38 of the Civil Code, provides that: "The court shall allow to the guardian ad litem a reasonable fee for his services, to be paid by the plaintiff, and taxed as cost. The affidavit of such guardian or other person, or other competent evidence, is admissible to prove the services rendered, but not to prove their value. The court must decide concerning such value without reference to the opinions of the parties or other witnesses."

We are of the opinion that the lower court, upon the filing of the mandate of affirmance, had jurisdiction to entertain a motion for an additional allowance to the guardian ad litem for services rendered in this court. In making such allowance the court should have in view the character of the litigation, the amount involved, the labor performed, and the results achieved by the guardian ad litem. It seems to us that the services of the guardian ad litem in the lower court were certainly as onerous and valuable as those performed by him in this court, and for these services he was allowed $50. His services in this court consisted, in the main, of preparing and filing a short brief, and the appeal resulted in the same judgment as that entered in the trial court; and after a careful examination of the record upon the prior appeal, we conclude that the appellee should have been allowed for his services in this court, $50 and his cost and necessary expenses incident to the appeal, in addition to the $50 which had been previously allowed him for services in the circuit court, and the judgment is, therefore, reversed and cause remanded for a judgment in conformity with this opinion.

COMMONWEALTH, BY, &c. v. ADAMS EXPRESS CO.

1. Franchise taxation—Auditor's agent—Right to institute action—Under sections 4077, 4079, 4080, 4084, 4090, 4241 and 4260, Kentucky Statutes, providing the way and manner in which the board of valuation and assessment may determine the valuation of a franchise of corporations, and the duty of the auditor in apportioning and certifying the same to the clerks of counties in which the franchise is exercised, a proceeding instituted by the auditor's agent in the county court of Mason county, alleging that appellee, Adams Express Co., is a quasi corporation and common carrier, and had continuously, for the years 1896 to 1902 inclusive, done business within this State and exercised its franchise therein, and in Mason county, and had failed and refused to report and list its franchise and pay the tax thereon for any of said years, and that the value of its franchise for said years was $1,463,040, and in Mason county $26,000. is not demurrable in the county or circuit court, on the ground that the franchise is not liable to be assessed for taxation by any court, but could only be assessed by the action of the State Board of Valuation and Assessment.

2. Omitted property—Jurisdiction of courts—Proceedings—Kentucky Statutes, sections 4241 and 4260, make it the duty of the auditor's agent to see to it that omitted property be valued and listed for taxation, and to invoke the aid of the courts for that purpose; and while it was the intention of the legislature to authorize the county courts of such counties only, in which the corporation exercised its franchise, to take jurisdiction and list and fix the value of the corporate franchise, the county first assuming would have jurisdiction, and an action in that county will be a bar to any action in any other county in the State as to that particular franchise for the years named; and in order to avoid fragmentary taxation, the clerk of the court having jurisdiction of the case, is required to certify the value of the franchise as fixed by the court, to the auditor of the State, who is chairman of the board of valuation, and said board will apportion this assessment among the different counties in the State in which the franchise is operated.

Allen D. Cole for appellants.

W. H. Wadsworth for appellee.

Appeal from Mason Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

This proceeding was instituted in the month of August, 1902, in Mason County Court by F. S. Watson, then auditor's agent.

It was in substance alleged in the statement and amended statements filed, that appellee, Adams Express Co., had continuously, since the year 1895, operated and done express business within the State of Kentucky, and exercised its franchise therein; that appellee was a quasi public corporation, a common carrier for hire, and required by section 4077 of Kentucky Statutes to report and pay taxes on its franchise; that appellee's franchise in question, exercised by it during the years mentioned, extended throughout the States of Ohio, New York and many other States of the Union, besides the State of Kentucky; that the property sought to be assessed is but a fragment of the entire franchise owned and exercised by appellee in the United States; that appellee had, since the year 1895, continuously done business and exercised its franchise in Mason county, Kentucky, and in many other counties in the State, nd the value of its franchise during each of the years named was $1,463,040, and in Mason county $26,000.

It was also alleged that the appellee had failed and refused to report and list its franchise and pay any taxes thereon from the year 1896 up to and including the year 1902.

The county court and circuit court, on an appeal, sustained a demurrer to the statements and decided, in effect, that the franchise of appellee was not liable to be assessed for taxation by any court, but could only be assessed and made liable for the payment of taxes by the action of the State Board of Valuation and Assessment, which board is composed of the Auditor, Treasurer and Secretary of State.

Section 4077 of the Kentucky Statutes provides in positive terms, that an express company is liable to pay annually a tax on its franchise to the State, and a local tax thereon to the county, incorporated city, town and taxing district where its franchise may be exercised.

In sections 4079, 4080, 4084 and 4090 is provided the way and manner in which the board of valuation and assessment may determine the value of the franchise of corporations, and the duty of the auditor in apportioning and certifying the same to the county clerks of counties in and through which the company exercises its franchise. It is contended by appellee that these statutes referred to provide the only method under and by which the franchises of corporations can be assessed or valued, and that the county court has not the power to fix a value on them for taxation. We can not agree with appellee in this. It is true, however, that this was the method provided by the legislature for the valuation and assessment of franchises, but the legislature, anticipating that the corporations might not make a report of the extent and value of their property, to the board of valuation and assessment as contemplated by that body, and also that the board of valuation and assessment might be derelict in its duty with reference thereto, enacted sections 4241 and 4260. We quote so much of these sections as are applicable to the point involved. By section 4260 it is provided: "It shall be the duty of the revenue agent to cause to be listed for taxes, in the manner required by law, of the property in the county, for which he may have been appointed, which may have been omitted to be assessed by the assessor, board of supervisors, board of valuation and assessment or railroad commission, or any license tax which may be due to the Commonwealth. It shall be the duty of the revenue agents for the State at large, to cause to be listed for taxes in the manner required by law of any property in any county, city or town of the Commonwealth which may have been omitted to be assessed by the assessor, board of supervisors, board of valuation and assessment or railroad commission, and it shall be the duty to enter proper motions and proceedings in any court of competent jurisdiction or before the State Board of Valuation and Assessment or railroad commission or other competent assessing authority, and cause the assessment to be made of any omitted property."

This section makes it the duty of the revenue agent to see to it that omitted property be valued and listed for taxation, and authorizes him to invoke the aid of any court of competent jurisdiction for that purpose.

We quote so much of section 4241 as will help to elucidate the question before us: "It shall be the duty of the sheriff or auditor's (i. e., revenue) agent, to cause to be listed for taxation all property omitted, or any portion of property omitted by the assessor, board of supervisors, board of valuation and assessment, or railroad commission, for any year or years. The officer proposing to have such property assessed, shall file in the clerk's office of the county in which the property may be liable to assessment, a statement containing a description and value of the property proposed to be assessed, and the value of corporate franchise, if any, and the name and place of residence of the owner, his agent or attorney, or person in possession of the property, and the year or years for which the property is proposed to be assessed." Upon which a summons against the owner may be issued to show cause why such property or corporate franchise shall not be assessed at the value named in the statement filed. This section also authorizes a trial of the question as to whether or not the property shall be valued and listed for taxation, and if it be decided by the court that the property is liable to assessment, the clerk of the county court shall certify to the auditor of public accounts a description of the property and the amount of the assessment for taxation, together with the amount of the penalty and cost of the assessment. This section expressly provides that the county court shall have the power to hear and determine and fix the value of corporate franchises, when the board of valuation and assessment has failed to perform this duty. It is admitted in this proceeding that the franchise of appellee was not reported for assessment to this board of valuation and assessment, and that the board had failed to assess it, and it was also admitted by the demurrer that the appellee had not paid any tax in this State on its franchise, during any of the years named in the statement. It is evident that the general assembly enacted these two provisions to meet just such a case as this one.

Appellee contends that this construction of the statute is erroneous and gives as a reason that if the construction be correct, it might be sued in every county in the State through which it operates its franchise; that the general assembly did not intend or have thought of any such result. It was not the intention of the legislature, in enacting these statutes, to authorize the county court in every county in the State to take jurisdiction and list and fix the value of a corporate franchise, but only intended that the county court in a county through which a corporation exercised its franchise, should take jurisdiction and hear and determine this question; and the action of that court in any one county would settle and determine the valuation and assessment of that particular franchise. The county court first assuming would have jurisdiction, and an action in that court would be a bar to any action in any other county court in the State, as to that particular franchise for the years named in the statement filed.

This construction of the statutes obviates the appellee's fears of fragmentary taxation, as the clerk of the court having jurisdiction of the case is required to certify the value of the franchise, as fixed by the court, to the auditor of the State, he being chairman of the board of valuation and assessment, and this board will apportion this assessment among the different counties in the State through which the franchise is operated.

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

Whole court sitting.

SPECHT, &c. v. BARBER ASPHALT PAVING CO.

BARBER ASPHALT PAVING CO. v. EWALD, &c.

(Filed May 24, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Two orders must be read together—The order of May 3 and May 5, must be read together as one order, and as the order of May 5 was intended as the substitute for the one of May 3, we conclude that the order of May 3 is no longer in force, and the appeal of the Barber Asphalt Co. from that order is dismissed.

2. Defective pleading—Defense made—Proof heard—Duty of court—Upon the appeal of the property owners, although the plaintiff was not entitled under the pleadings to the relief sought, it prayed for all proper relief, and, defense having been made and the court having all the parties before it, it was its duty under section 2834, Kentucky Statutes, to make all corrections, rules and orders necessary to do justice to the parties. Its failure to order an additional pleading in no wise prejudiced appellants, and, under section 134, Civil Code, providing that the court must in every stage disregard any error which does not affect the susbtantial rights of the adverse party, and that no judgment shall be reversed for such error, the judgment of the lower court must be affirmed.

Gordon & Gordon and Lane & Harrison for Specht, Ewald, &c.

B. F. Washer and Wm. Furlong for Asphalt Co.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, Second Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

By an ordinance approved June 6, 1900, the carriage-way of Frankfort avenue was ordered to be improved 40 feet in width by grading, paving and curbing with asphalt, from Cayewood avenue to Raymond avenue, at the cost of the owners of the adjoining ground, extending back from the street 195 feet, the council proceeding on the idea that the land was not divided into squares by principal streets. The contract was made with the Barber Asphalt Paving Co. to do the work. It performed the contract, the work was accepted by the city and apportionment warrants were issued to the contractor. Some of the property owners failing to pay, this suit was filed against them. Defense was made by the property owners on the ground that there was a principal street on each side of Frankfort avenue and running parallel or substantially parallel with it, and that the ordinance of the council was void because it fixed the taxing district at 195 feet instead of going back half way to the next street. Spoliation was also pleaded and relied on. It appeared that only a few feet of the property of John Ewald and Christopher Bader was taken. The court on May 3, 1909, delivered an opinion holding that as to these two defendants the assessment amounted to spoliation as the little strip taken was too narrow to be sold as a lot. The clerk on that day entered an order dismissing the petition against Ewald and Bader. On May 5 a fuller judgment was entered to the same effect. On May 7 a written motion was filed to set aside the order of May 5, and on a subsequent day the judgment dismissing the action was set aside, and it was adjudged that the territory was defined into squares by principal streets, the apportionment as made by the council was set aside and the case was referred to a special commissioner, with directions to re-apportion the cost of the improvement among the owners of lots of land in the quarter squares contiguous thereto, according to the number of square feet owned by each of the parties respectively. The re-apportionment was made, and having been confirmed by the court a judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff against the defendants for the amount found due by them respectively. From this judgment the first of the above appeals is prosecuted. It is insisted for the appellants on that appeal that although the judgment of May 5 was set aside, the judgment of May 3 was not set aside; and that it having become final the court had no further jurisdiction to enter a judgment in the action. The second of the above appeals is prosecuted by the Barber Asphalt Co. from the judgment of May 3 to reverse it, in case the court shall be of opinion that it is still in force.

From an inspection of the entire record, including the orders made by the court and the grounds filed by counsel on motion to set aside the judgment of May 5, we are satisfied that the judgment of May 5 was intended as a substitute for the less formal order entered on May 3, although it does not in terms refer to that order. There could have been no other reason for entering it so far as appears from the record, and it was evidently so understood by the circuit court. The motion was made by the Barber Asphalt Co., and by the city of Louisville, to set aside the judgment rendered by the court adversely to them. But one opinion was delivered. The entries on the order book were intended to put in effect that opinion, and the order setting aside the action of the court was intended to set the parties in statu quo. The order of May 5 must, therefore, be treated as entered as a substitute for the less formal order of May 3, or, what is the same thing, the two entries should be read together. The rule that where the court has rendered one judgment in a case he can not at another term enter another after the first has become final, has no application, for here the judgments were entered at the same term and while the court had control of the action. We, therefore, conclude that the order of May 8 is no longer in force. The appeal of the Barber Asphalt Co. from that order is, therefore, dismissed. (Lockhart v. Trabue, 2 Bibb., 251; Graham v. Lynn, 4 B. Monroe, 18; Smith v. Todd, 3 J. J. M., 299; Brown v. U. S. Home and Dower Association, 12 Ky. Law Rep., 283.)

On the appeal of the property owners it is insisted that the judgment against them is not warranted by the pleadings. The plaintiff alleged in his petition that the property referred to was not defined into squares by principal streets, and while the defendants alleged the existence of the parallel streets they did not allege the existence of cross streets. Still, when the proof was made, the facts were presented to the court and although the plaintiff was not entitled to the relief it sought, it prayed for all proper relief, and defense having been made it was the duty of the court, under section 2834, Kentucky Statutes, to make all corrections, rules and orders necessary to do justice to the parties concerned. The plaintiff was willing to stand upon the apportionment made by the council. The defendants insisted that this apportionment was invalid and in showing this they established the facts which, by law, required the apportionment to be made, as directed by the court. As the court had all the parties before him, it was incumbent on him under the statute, to proceed to do justice between them. The statute is mandatory. The court would have erred in refusing to obey it. If an additional pleading was necessary he should have ordered a forthwith amendment under section 130 of the Code. His failure to do this in no wise prejudiced appellants.

In Ellison v. Dunlap, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 1495, we said on this subject: "Section 129 of the Code provides that no variance between pleading and proof is material which does not mislead a party to his prejudice in maintaining his action or defense upon the merits; also that a party relying on the variance must show to the satisfaction of the court that he was misled, and then the court may order the pleading to be amended upon such terms as may be just. By section 130 it is provided that, if the variance is not material, the court may direct the fact to be found according to the evidence, and may order an immediate amendment. By section 134 it is further provided that the court must, in every stage of the action, disregard any error which does not affect the substantial rights of the adverse party, and that no judgment shall be reversed by reason of such error. Under these provisions of the Code, if the circuit court had concluded that there was a variance between the terms of the contract alleged in the petition, and that shown by the evidence, as the variance was not material and did not mislead the defendants in maintaining their defense upon the merits, it would have been the duty of the court to order an immediate amendment, and direct the facts to be found according to the evidence. The question seems not to have been presented to the circuit court, and, if the judgment was reversed here therefor, it would be with directions to the circuit court to order an immediate amendment, and find the facts according to the evidence. But this is unnecessary, as the substantial rights of appellants were not affected, and no judgment shall be reversed for an error not affecting the substantial rights of the party complaining." (East Jellico Coal Co. v. Golden, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 2056.)

While the cross streets on the north side of Frankfort avenue were not extended so as to intersect the cross streets on the south side of Frankfort avenue, because of the right of way of the L. & N. R. R. Co., which intervened, for the purposes of assessment under the statute these cross streets must be treated as extended. This was so held in Cooper v. Nevin, 90 Ky., 90. The circuit court followed that case which seems to us in accord with the spirit of the statute. The assessment complained of was before this court in L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Barber Asphalt Co., 25 Ky. Law Rep., 1024, and while the point made here does not appear to have been made there, the assessment was sustained and the judgment in favor of the contractor was affirmed. Upon a re-examination of the subject we see no reason for receding from the conclusion we then reached.

On the appeal of William Specht and others the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

TORBITT & CASTLEMAN v. JACKSON.

(Filed May 25, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Homestead—Exemptions—Appellee having purchased a house and lot which after occupying as a homestead he sold, accepting so much cash and the purchaser assuming the payment a lien upon the property, in an action by appellants, his creditors, seeking to attach in the hands of the purchaser of the house and lot the purchase price of the lot, the chancellor properly held that he was entitled to have set apart to him the proceeds remaining after the lien debt was paid, it being less than $1,000, he being a housekeeper with a family, resident in this Commonwealth.

Pryor, Sapinsky & Castleman for appellants.

Wm. Carroll for appellee.

Appeal from Henry Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

In May, 1900, the appellee, W. O. Jackson, purchased a house and lot in the city of New Castle, at the price of $1,200, from the Bank of New Castle, for which he executed his promissory notes due and payable on the 1st day of May, 1903, to the bank, which were secured by a lien upon the property. Immediately after his purchase, he moved into the house with his family, and occupied it as a homestead until September, 1903, when he sold it by executory contract to Miss Mattie Young and others, in consideration of $100 in cash and $1,900, which was due and payable on the 1st day of March, 1904, and for which, note was executed. It was further stipulated that the lien to the bank was to be paid out of the deferred payment, and a deed executed to the purchasers. He surrendered the possession under the contract to his vendees on the 15th of October, 1903, and on the 26th of October thereafter, appellants brought this suit against appellee for a personal judgment for their debt, and at the same time sued out a general attachment, upon the ground that he had no property in the State subject to execution, or not enough to satisfy appellants' demand. This attachment was executed upon Miss Young and others as garnishees. Appellee controverted the ground of the attachment, and alleged that he was a housekeeper with a family resident in this Commonwealth, and that after the lien debts against the property sold the Youngs were paid, there would be less than $1,000 left from the proceeds of the sale, which he claimed to be exempt from the attachment lien of appellant. The cause being submitted on the pleadings and the facts heretofore recited, the lower court adjudged that the defendant, Jackson, had a homestead right in the funds.

Upon this appeal by the plaintiff, it is insisted that appellee was not entitled to a homestead in the property sold to the Youngs, for the reason that he had not paid any part of the purchase money therefor to the bank of New Castle, prior to the sale of the property, and not having acquired a homestead in the property itself, he could not claim the surplus proceeds as exempt. To support this contention we are cited to the case of Moseley v. Bevins, 91 Ky., 650, and a number of subsequent decisions which are rested upon the opinion in that case. In Moseley v. Bevins, it was decided that a debtor was not entitled to the homestead exemption as against a debt created prior to the payment of the purchase money for the land, although the debt was cerated subsequent to the purchase of the land, and the debtor's entry upon it as a homestead. The opinion in that case was bottomed upon the ground that there was no difference in principle or effect between purchasing and paying for a homestead with means that ought to have been applied to the payment of a pre-existing debt, and the purchase of a homestead on credit, and after the creation of the indebtedness paying for the homestead out of means acquired subsequent thereto. In this case no money was paid by the appellee in the purchase of the homestead after the creation of appellant's debt. He acquired a homestead in the property subject to the lien for the purchase money thereon, long before the creation of appellant's debt. In Morrow, &c. v. Bailey, 109 Ky., 359, it was decided, first, that a conveyance by a debtor of his homestead was not fraudulent as to creditors; second, that where a debt was created after the debtor had purchased and partly paid for the land, and erected improvements thereon, and after the creation of the debt, the unpaid purchase price was paid by selling part of the land, that the remainder of the land was exempt as a homestead. If the bank had enforced its lien and the property had been sold for $2,000, there can be no doubt that under section 1705 of the Kentucky Statutes, appellee would have been entitled to have had the overplus, after paying the lien debt to the bank, paid over to him for the purpose of enabling him to purchase another homestead. We, therefore, conclude that the trial court properly refused to subject the funds in the hands of Miss Young and others to the payment of appellant's claim.

Judgment affirmed.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE R. R. CO. v. MAYES.

(Filed May 25, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Evidence—Examination of witness—The examination of a witness in an action against a railroad for damages, was improper in going into his peculiar religious belief.

2. Same—This court has held that under our Constitution, persons may testify without regard to their religious belief or disbelief; and the action of the trial court in permitting the examination of a witness to turn upon his religious belief, with a view to affecting his credibility, was improper.

C. J. Waddill and Benjamin D. Warfield for appellant.

Jonson & Jennings for appellee.

Appeal from Hopkins Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

The appellee, J. H. Mayes, who is a colored preacher of the gospel, instituted this action to recover damages of the appellant because, as he alleges in his petition, its conductor, W. D. Bell, while taking up his ticket, insulted him by using toward him vile and profane language; all of which was denied by appellant. A trial resulted in a verdict of $200 in favor of appellee.

The only error that we find in the record grows out of the permission by the court to counsel for appellee, in the presence of the jury, to cross-examine W. D. Bell on the subject of his religious belief. A few of the questions propounded to the witness, and his answers thereto, will illustrate the character and extent of this cross-examination.

"Q. Don't you know that you don't believe in the existence of a God, as described in the Bible?"

"A. I don't know. I can not answer that."

"Q. You say that you can not answer the question as to whether or not you believe in the existence of an Orthodox God, as described in the Bible?"

"A. I don't know that I can."

"Q. Do you believe in the divinity of Jesus Christ?"

The witness not answering this question in response to the counsel, the court said: "Do you believe in the divinity of Jesus Christ?"

"A. I don't know whether he was or not."

"Q. Do you believe he was?"

"A. Well, in the teachings of the Bible, he was."

"Q. Do you believe the teachings of the Bible?"

"A. I don't know as I am required to answer all these questions; am I being tried for heresy? If so, why that would be all right."

"Q. Do you believe a whole lot that Christ is a son of the Orthodox God?" (No answer).

"Q. Do you believe a right smart or a whole lot of the teachings of the Bible, wherein it says that Christ is a son of the Orthodox God?"

"A. I believe it as much as any history."

These questions, and the answers, constitute but a small part of the cross-examination of the witness touching his religious belief, evidently made for the purpose of discrediting him in the eyes of the jury. The question involved here arose in the case of Bush v. Commonwealth, 80 Ky., 244, in which the court held that the then Constitution of the Commonwealth changed the common-law rule as to the incompetency of an Atheist to testify in a judicial examination. The thorough and enlightened manner in which the question is treated in the opinion by Judge Hines in the case cited, makes it unnecessary for us to do more than refer to it. After reciting the constitutional provisions bearing upon the question at issue, the court said:

"We think that this provision of the Constitution not only permits persons to testify without regard to religious belief or disbelief, but that it was intended to prevent any inquiry into that belief for the purpose of affecting credibility. It places the Atheist, in this regard, on the same footing as any other witness, and leaves the question as to credibility to be inquired into in the same way." Subsection 2 of section 1 of the Bill of Rights, and section 5 of the present Constitution, are substantially similar to those in the former Constitution, adverted to in the opinion. The opinion in Bush v. Commonwealth was approved in White v. Commonwealth, 96 Ky., 180.

For the reasons indicated the judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

MARSHALL, &c. v. WALKER, &c.

(Filed May 25, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Wills—Construction of—A clause in a will by which testator devised his property equally to his two children, "my son, Wm. Young, and my daughter, Ann Marshall, to her and her bodily heirs forever," vested in the latter the fee to the land embraced in the will.

2. Same—Construction of statutes—At common law a devise to one and her bodily heirs created an estate tail, which was by our statute converted into fee simple estate, and where, in a devise, such words not being used in a sense different from their legal and technical sense, the judgment of the chancellor having been in accordance with the reasoning herein, will be upheld.

L. M. Dembitz, C. M. Lindsay, H. L. Stone and Kohn, Baird & Spindle for Park Commissioners.

Forcht & Field for appellees.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, Second Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

This action involves the construction of the will of Walter Young, which was probated in 1840. The clause of the will necessary to be quoted reads as follows: "After all my just debts being paid out of my estate, I do hereby will and bequeath to my beloved wife, Sarah Young, all my real property and mixed estate, during her natural life, and after her death I wish it to be equally divided between my two beloved children, my son, Wm. Young, and my daughter, Ann Marshall, to her and her bodily heirs forever."

The daughter, Ann Marshall, lived until a short time before this action was instituted by her children to recover the real estate which was devised to Ann Marshall and her "bodily heirs." At the death of the testator she had one child.

For the plaintiffs, who are appellants, it is insisted that the testator's daughter, Ann Marshall, took a life estate, with remainder to her children. For the appellees it is urged that the will created a fee in her. At common law the clause would have created an estate tail, which, by the statute, has been converted into a fee. (Prescott v. Prescott's Heirs, 10 B. M., 56; Lochland v. Downing's Ex'or, 11 B. M., 82; Robb v. Belt, 12 B. M., 643; Brown v. Alden, 14 B. M., 114; Johnson v. Johnson, 2 Met., 331; True v. Nicholls,

2 Duvall, 547.) When an estate tail is converted under the statute into a fee, it becomes an absolute fee. (Pruitt, &c. v. Holland, 92 Ky., 641.) The words "to her and to her bodily heirs" are not words of purchase, but words of limitation. The court in Johnson v. Johnson, supra, said: "These words are words of limitation, and unless there is something in the deed or will from which a reasonable inference can be drawn, that the words were used in a sense different from their legal and technical signification."

Learned counsel for appellant urges in argument that as the court in Righter v. Forrester, 1 Bush, 278, Northcutt v. Curry, 6 Ky. Law Rep., 588, and in Mitchell v. Simpson, 88 Ky., 125, found from other provisions of the papers, the words were used in a sense different from their legal and technical signification, and that they are authority for his position. The court did not intend, to by these cases, depart from the rule of interpretation provided by the statute, which converts an estate tail at common law into a fee. There is no provision of the will under consideration, to show that the testator intended to use the words in a sense different from their legal and technical signification, as it was in the cases to which reference has been made. We are of the opinion that Ann Marshall was vested with the fee to the land in question. This conclusion is supported by many cases in addition to those cited.

The judgment is affirmed.

BRANSON, &c. v. EVERSOLE.

(Filed May 25, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Lands—Practice—In an action to quiet title to land, when issue was joined and an order of survey made, but the surveyor to whom the order was taken being sick and unable to make the survey, the court overruled a motion for continuance upon that ground, and this action of the court was erroneous and prejudicial to the party seeking the order.

W. F. Hall for appellants.

J. G. & J. S. Forrester for appellee.

Appeal from Harlan Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The appellee, Eversole, sued the appellants, Branson & Coldiron, and alleged that he was the owner and in possession of a certain tract of land and sought to be quieted in the possession and enjoyment of it. The appellant, Coldiron, filed an answer, denying that the plaintiff was the owner of the land, or that he was in the actual possession of it, and claimed that he was the owner of a tract of land, and that there was a lap in the boundaries, etc. The petition was filed in December, 1902. At a special term of the court in July, 1903, upon motion of appellants, an order of survey was made and one Reynolds, a surveyor, was directed to execute it. The special term continued until the August term of court. After the August term of court the appellant, Coldiron, obtained a copy of the order of survey and went to a place in Harlan county, where he had reason to believe the surveyor would be found, with a view of delivering it to him and having it executed. He learned that the surveyor was seriously ill and had been taken to his home in Knox county, consequently the order of survey was not executed. At the November term of court the appellant, Coldiron, filed his affidavit, showing the facts stated, and moved the court for a continuance of the case. He stated that he had not prepared his case for trial, because the survey was necessary to an intelligent understanding of it, and to enable him to take his testimony. The case was in equity. The court overruled his motion for a continuance and gave judgment against him.

When the order of survey was made the court evidently was of the opinion that a survey was necessary. Nothing was developed in the record which shows it was unnecessary. In most of cases involving title to land a survey is necessary to enable the court or jury to understand the location of the boundary lines of the land. Where a survey is necessary, it is impossible to properly prepare a case for trial without it. The appellants had the right to rely upon the judgment of the court previously given that a survey was necessary. When the court changed its mind, the appellants had no time in which to prepare the case for trial. They were not afforded an opportunity to have their side of the case presented for hearing. The court erred in overruling appellants' motion for a continuance, as it was not his fault that the survey was not made. (Green v. Culver, Hull & Co., &c., 19 Ky. Law Rep., 186; Schamberg, &c. v. Leslie, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 599.)

The judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

HEDDRICK, &c. v. HUFFAKER, &c.

(Filed May 25, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Contracts—Alteration of written instruments—Where notes have been executed in consideration of a contract authorizing the sale of books in certain territory, the fact that another county was added to the contract after the execution of the notes, did not release a surety, for the reason that such an enlargement of the contract was beneficial because it increased the opportunity to sell the books. A contract can only be invalidated by an alteration which is material and it can not be material unless it affects in some way the rights of the obligors or their obligations.

Sharp & Siler for appellants.

Harrison & Harrison and O. H. Waddle for appellees.

Appeal from Wayne Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

This action was instituted by the appellants on two promissory notes executed to W. P. Ennis for $135 each, for 300 copies of "Farmers Business Record," and the notes were assigned and transferred to the appellants. At the time the notes were executed the "Farmers Business Record Co." owned the copyright for the "Farmers Business Record," and it appointed the appellees, I. B. and Thomas Huffaker, sole and exclusive agents for the sale of the "Farmers Business Record" in the counties of Putnam and Coffee, Tennessee, and gave them the exclusive privilege of selling that publication in the counties named, for a period of three years. There are other provisions of the agency contract not necessary to be stated here.

The defense relied upon in the lower court and here, by I. B. Huffaker, is, that after the notes had been signed and the agency contract delivered, Coffee county was inserted in the agency contract by the "Farmers Business Record Co.," with the consent alone of the co-obligor, Thomas Huffaker, the claim being that the exclusive privilege for selling the publication was in Putnam county. The appellee, I. B. Huffaker, claims that he was only surety on the notes, and that there was a material change in the contract without his consent and, therefore, the notes are unenforcible. The record is against his claim that he was only surety on the notes. He signed the notes first, and in the agency contract it is recited that he and Thomas Huffaker are constituted agents for the sale of the publication within the specified territory. However, we will assume that I. B. Huffaker was only surety on the notes. The notes were not altered, only the contract of agency, which was in part the consideration for the notes. A contract can only be invalidated by an alteration which is material, and it can not be material unless it in some way affects the rights or obligations of the obligors. The duties of the obligors, their liabilities or obligations, must be increased or changed by the alteration. (Terry & Bell v. Hazlewood, 1 Duvall, 104; Smith v. Lockridge, 8 Bush, 480; Warren v. Fant's Trustee, 79 Ky., 1.) The purpose of buying the books was to sell them. The opportunities for selling them in Putnam county would be less than they would be in that and Coffee county. The opportunity of selling the books would certainly be increased by having the territory in which they might be sold enlarged, which was, therefore, beneficial to the obligors to insert Coffee county in the agency contract. If I. B. Huffaker was only surety, he was not prejudiced by this change because it increased the chance of his principal to sell the books and pay the notes. The court should have rendered judgment on the notes.

The judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

LOUISVILLE PUBLIC LIBRARY CO. v. CITY OF LOUISVILLE.

(Filed May 25, 1904.)

1. Fire escapes—Valid ordinance—The following ordinance of the city of Louisville, approved August 14, 1899, with reference to fire escapes, is valid, viz.: "All buildings occupied by any person or persons, or in which any person or persons shall be employed or assembled (except such as are used as private residences exclusively), of three or more stories in height, shall be provided with one or more permanent, approved fire escapes when ordered by the inspector or his deputies, and the escapes must be in such number and constructed and located in such manner as directed in notice or order."

2. Repeal of former acts—Exclusive control by city council—The act of July 1, 1893, section 2758, Kentucky Statutes, providing that "the statutes heretofore enacted for the inspection of buildings and the appointment of building inspectors, shall continue in force until superseded by appropriate ordinances passed by the general council; but in no case shall such acts now in force continue longer than March 4, 1894," operated as a repeal of all former acts on this subject, and the whole question is to be regulated by the ordinances passed by the general council.

Hardin H. Herr and Marion W. Ripy for appellant.

Warwick Miller for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, Second Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

An ordinance, approved August 14, 1899, with reference to fire escapes, reads as follows: "All buildings occupied by any person or persons, or in which any person or persons shall be employed or assemble (except such as are used as private residences exclusively), of three or more stories in height, shall be provided with one or more permanent, approved fire escapes when ordered by the inspector or his deputies, and the escapes must be in such number and constructed and located in such manner as directed in said notice or order."

Is the ordinance valid. It is urged that it is invalid, because it is in conflict with the act approved February 13, 1888, which appears in sections 1830 and 1832, Kentucky Statutes. Section 1830 prescribes the conditions under which the owners of certain property shall place ladders or fire escapes thereon. Section 1832 provides a penalty of not less than $50 nor more than $250 for each thirty days the building may be unprovided with a ladder or fire escape. The compiler of the Kentucky Statutes supposed this act to be in force, and it is conceded that if it is, the ordinance is invalid under section 168 of the Constitution, which provides that no municipal ordinance shall fix a penalty for a violation thereof less than that imposed by the statutes for the same offense. On February 27, 1890, another act was approved in regard to fire escapes. (Acts 1889-1890, page 384.) Section 34 of that act is substantially the same as section 1830, except in the latter the chief of the fire department is authorized to require the erection of ladders and fire escapes, etc., while in the former the inspector of buildings does so with the advice of the fire chief. Besides, in the former act, the penalty is not less than $10 nor more than $200, and an additional fine of $50 for each week that the owner fails to comply with the order of the building inspector. This act also provides that all acts in conflict with it are repealed. On July 1, 1893, the act for the government of cities of the first class was passed. Section 2758, Kentucky Statutes, is part of that act. It reads as follows: "The statutes heretofore enacted for the inspection of buildings, and for the appointment of building inspectors, shall continue in force until superseded by appropriate ordinances passed by the general council; but in no event shall such acts now in force, continue longer than March 4, 1894."

It is unnecessary to enter into a discussion as to the extent the act of February 27, 1890, repeals the act of February 13, 1888, for by section 2758 the whole question is to be regulated by the ordinances passed by the general council. The Constitution made it the duty of the general assembly to classify cities and pass acts for their government, and it was deemed wise to allow the general council to regulate the matter of the construction of fire escapes. Our opinion is that the ordinance in question is valid.

The judgment is affirmed.

Judge Barker not sitting.

DYER v. CITY OF NEWPORT, &c.

(Filed May 25, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Municipal corporations—Taxation—Improvements authorized and begun before the adoption of the present Constitution—By an act of the legislature, approved April 16, 1890, the board of council of the city of Newport was authorized to divide the city into sewerage districts, having in view the construction of a sewerage system adequate to the needs of the city, and to issue twenty-year bonds to pay for same. The city having been divided into such districts, the city council passed an ordinance on April 26, 1904, for the completion of said sewerage in district E., pursuant to the said act of 1890, and for the issual of twenty-year bonds to pay for same, to meet the interest of which, a tax of 66 cents on the $100 will be required. Held—That although this will increase the tax rate beyond that allowed under section 157 of the present Constitution, yet the same is authorized under section 158 of the Constitution, which provides that municipalities may contract an indebtedness in excess of the limitation prescribed in section 157, when it has been authorized under laws in force prior to the adoption of this Constitution, or when necessary for the completion of an improvement undertaken and not completed and paid for, at the time of the adoption of the present Constitution.

H. Gunkel, Jr., for appellant.

Jas. T. Thornton and Aubrey Barbour for appellees.

Appeal from Campbell Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

By an act, approved April 16, 1890, entitled "An act to provide for sewerage in the city of Newport," the board of council of the city was authorized to divide the city into sewerage districts, having in view the economical construction of a system of sewerage adequate to the needs of the city and the water sheds of the city included therein, and to have each district provided with sewers at the cost of the district, the city to issue sewerage bonds payable in twenty years, and a tax to be levied upon the property of the district sufficient to pay the interest on the bonds and provide a sinking fund to pay the principal. The city was divided into sewerage districts pursuant to the act, and sewers have been constructed in districts A, B, C and D. On February 8, 1894, the city passed an ordiinance providing for the sewering of district E. Pursuant to the act sewers have been built in part in district E. On April 26, 1904, the city passed an ordinance for the completion of the sewer system in district E pursuant to the act, and for twenty-year bonds to be issued to be paid by a tax as therein provided. To meet these bonds a tax of something over 66 cents on the $100 of property will have to be levied, which will increase the rate of taxation in this district to more than the limit provided for in section 157 of the Constitution. The reason for the passage of the ordinance in February, 1904, was, that a large part of the district was not sewered, although the work had been begun and the purpose was to complete the contemplated plan which had been begun under the act of 1890 soon after its passage. Appellant brought this suit as a taxpayer of the district on the ground that the proposed tax being in excess of the constitutional limit, was void, and that the bonds could not properly be issued. The court dismissed his petition and he has appealed.

In Warren v. Newport, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1006, the court had under consideration the validity of bonds issued by the city for sewer district A, and it was held that the act of April 16, 1890, is in force. It was also held, upon the authority of several previous cases, that the constitutional limitation as to indebtedness did not apply to debts authorized under laws in force prior to the adoption of the Constitution, and necessary for the completion of a public improvement undertaken at the time of its adoption. After calling attention to section 3072, Kentucky Statutes, the court said: "It will be observed that this section was enacted with reference to the constitutional provisions in question and with reference to the opinion of this court in Holzbauer v. City of Lexington, and this court in the 'city of Lexington on appeal' recognized the validity of this section. Section 158 of the Constitution provides that the municipality 'may contract an indebtedness in excess of such limitations, when the same has been authorized under laws in force prior to the adoption of this Constitution, or when necessary for the completion of and payment for a public improvement undertaken and not completed and paid for at the time of the adoption of this Constitution.' The legislature interpreted the Constitution as meaning that cities of the second class were authorized to issue bonds for an amount sufficient to construct, complete and pay for any sewer authorized to be constructed under laws theretofore enacted, or for completing and carrying out any contract made after the construction of any such sewer. So the legislature expressly authorized the city of Newport to complete its sewer system as provided for by the act of 1890 "

It is said that this case is not conclusive of the one before us, because there the additional tax incurred by reason of the issue of bonds to pay for the construction of sewers in district A, did not increase the total rate to $1.50. But section 157 of the Constitution is applicable to the tax rate in the city. It has no application to local assessments to pay for local improvements. (Gosnell v. Louisville, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 519; Catlettsburg v. Self, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 161.) The bonds here are to be paid by the tax on the local district which gets the benefit of the improvement, and we do not see that there is any substantial distinction between such bonds and the bonds issued for the improvement of a street. The legislature might have required the cost of the improvement to be assessed directly against the property. If it had done this, no question could have been raised of a violation of section 157 or 171 of the Constitution. But the issuing of the bonds was simply an expedient to divide the burden and distribute it over a number of years so that it would not fall all at once on the property owners. Still in the end it is the same thing in this class of improvements. The objection that no vote of the people was taken authorizing the indebtedness under section 157 of the Constitution, and that the tax rate was exceeded, was expressly disposed of in city of Lexington on appeal, 93 Ky., 258, and cases cited.

Judgment affirmed.

KENTUCKY AND INDIANA BRIDGE AND RAILROAD CO. v. SHRADER.

(Filed May 25, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Carriers—Negligence of motorman — Injury to passenger—Excessive verdict—In an action by a young lady, twenty-five years of age, for injury in which her nose was broken, impairing her breathing and greatly disfiguring her face, by reason of the negligence of the motorman in leaving his brake wound up in such a manner that it came loose and reversed itself and struck her as she got on the car, a judgment of $2,250 is held not to be excessive.

2. Instruction—The court did not err in defining negligence to mean "the failure to use such care as ordinarily prudent persons exercise under like or similar circumstances," because the word "usually" did not precede the word "exercise" therein.

Humphrey, Burnett & Humphrey for appellant.

Bennett H. Young and Stottsenberg & Weathers for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, Third Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

The Kentucky and Indiana Bridge and Railroad Co. is a corporation operating a railroad over its bridge across the Ohio river, between the cities of Louisville, Ky., and New Albany, Ind. The appellee, Carrie J. Shrader, does business in Louisville, and lives in New Albany.

On the 21st day of August, 1901, about 6 o'clock in the evening, appellee, while getting aboard an electric car, owned and operated by appellant, at its Fourth street station in Louisville, was struck by the handle of the car brake, with such force that her nose was broken, and other painful and serious injuries inflicted upon her, to recover damages for which this action was instituted, the jury rendering a verdict of $2,250 against appellant. The claim for damages is based upon the alleged negligence of appellant's motorman in leaving his brake wound up in such manner that it came loose and reversed itself, with such speed and velocity, just as appellee, a passenger, was boarding the car, that she was struck and injured in the manner indicated. The errors seriously argued by appellant are, first, that the negligence of its employe, the motorman, was not established by sufficient evidence; second, that the verdict was excessive; third, that one of the jurors was guilty of such misconduct as indicated hostility to appellant, and, fourth, that the court erred in its instruction defining negligence. Without going into the evidence in detail, a careful reading of the record convinces us that the jury did not err in arriving at the conclusion that appellee's injuries were caused by the negligence of the motorman in charge of the car. By his own admission, after he had wound up and set the brake, in order to avoid being jostled by the incoming passengers, he abandoned it, and stepped back into the vestibule, leaving this dangerous instrument wholly unguarded, although it was apparent that an awkward step of a passenger or even the jostling of the car, might unset it, and start the fly-wheel of the brake upon its rapid and dangerous revolution; that appellee's injuries resulted by reason of the motorman's failure to hold the brake until the passengers were on, is shown by his own admissions. His familiarity with the brake was bound to teach him, but for his own negligence in failing to learn the lesson, the danger to incoming passengers in leaving the set brake unprotected and unguarded.

The appellee, who is a young lady of twenty-five years, had her nose broken by the accident, greatly disfiguring her face, and her breathing is so much impaired, that, unless she can be relieved by a successful surgical operation, her health will undoubtedly be permanently injured. As to how far this operation can be successfully performed, the evidence is contradictory, as it is also on the question of whether or not her lip is paralyzed. We think that the jury were the best judges of these questions, which were fairly submitted to them by the instructions of the court, and we are not willing to say that the verdict is excessive.

We are unable to agree with counsel, in their claim that the juryman, whose conduct they criticise, in asking questions of its witness, the motorman, showed hostility to it. The interrogation complained of is as follows:

"Q. If you had stood up by the brake and held your hand on the crank, would it have hit the lady?"

"A. If I held my hand on it, it would not have hit the woman."

"Q. If you had stood by the brake and held it, would you have been liable to be run over?"

"A. They would have run over me if I had not gotten out of the way."

"Q. Would it not have been better for you to jump off the car and let everything go?"

"A. Just as well, because they crowded in on both sides."

We do not perceive that these interrogatories deviated from the line of propriety. Perhaps, the last question is subject to the criticism of being inconsequential, but certainly not of being improper.

The learned trial judge, in overruling the motion for a new trial, in apt language expresses our views on the question in hand. "This case is before me on a motion for a new trial, and the only ground urged is misconduct of a juror during the trial. The misconduct complained of is that the juror indicated, by questions asked by him and his manner in asking the questions, that he was opposed to the defendant. At the time the questions were put, defendant moved to discharge the jury, and the motion was overruled with an exception. I was of the opinion then, as I am now, that it would be very unwise for a trial judge to discharge a jury every time a juror asked a question which indicated which way he leaned. My own experience teaches me that there is nothing more deceptive than the manner of jurors during a trial. Jurors who seem to be your best friends, turn out to be strongly against you, and vice versa. I see no misconduct in this case that would justify granting a new trial, and the motion is overruled."

It is insisted that the court erred in the second instruction, by which is defined negligence, "Negligence, as used in the first instruction, means the failure to exercise such care as ordinarily prudent persons exercise under like or similar circumstances." It is insisted that the word "usually" should have preceded the word "exercise" in the last line of the instruction. The instruction, as written, gives, substantially, the law upon the question to which it is directed, and is not subject to the criticism made by counsel.

For the reasons indicated the judgment is affirmed.

LOUISVILLE HOTEL CO. v. KALTENBRUN.

(Filed May 25, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Master and servant—Damages—Appellee, who was the foreman in charge of the laundry of appellant, slipped on the wet floor of the laundry, and in an attempt to regain his balance, his arm was caught in a centrifugal machine and torn off at the elbow. He was awarded $3,000 by the jury in this action for damages against appellant. It appearing that a certain box which was used in carrying the wash from one part of the machinery to another had become so defective as to leak badly, allowing water to run upon the floor, which, when wet, was dangerous to walk upon, and the appellee had called the attention of appellant's manager to this condition of the laundry and was promised that the necessary repairs would be made, but before they were done the injury resulted as above indicated. Held—The verdict of the jury will not be disturbed.

2. Same—Ordinarily when the master makes a general promise to repair without naming a time, the rule is that this should be construed to mean such time as would be reasonably necessary for performance of the promise; but when the master fixes a definite time within which the repair is to be made, there is no rule which would preclude the servant from waiting the expiration of the time named, but the servant does not assume the risk of an injury caused to him within such a period of time, after the promise to repair would be reasonably allowed for its performance.

Forcht & Field and O'Neal & O'Neal for appellant.

Clarence C. Hiett and Henry M. Johnson for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, Third division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

The appellee, August Kaltenbrun, was a foreman in charge of the laundry of appellant. The floor of the laundry room was made of cement somewhat elevated in the middle, and slanting toward the walls, so as to carry off any water which might be spilled thereon. A certain box, which was used in carrying the wash from one part of the machinery to another, had become so defective that it leaked badly, allowing the water to run out and spill upon the floor. When this happened, the wet floor became slippery and danegrous to walk upon. Appellee had called the attention of George Mulligan, appellant's manager, to the defective condition of the box, and the consequential dangerous condition of the floor, and he seems to have promised appellee that, when the carpenter was through with a certain work in which he was engaged up stairs, he would have him make a new and perfect box. Before this promise was complied with, appellee slipped on the wet floor, and, throwing out his arms in an attempt to regain his balance, one of them was caught in a centrifugal machine, and torn off at the elbow; whereupon he instituted this action to recover damages, and was awarded a verdict of $3,000 by the jury.

We think appellee's action is in tort for the negligence, and not on the contract, as contended for by appellant, although the petition alleges the facts of the promised repair with minute detail; these do not change the character of the action from ex delicto to ex contractu.

Counsel for appellant concede that the verdict of the jury establishes the fact that appellant promised to make the repair as alleged by appellee, but contend that the box was an instrument so simple in its nature, and the danger so apparent, appellee was not justified in relying upon it. To this, we can not agree. The difference between a simple instrument and a complex one vanishes when the servant fully understands that it is dangerous to further use it; and, we do not understand the rule to be that the servant, after obtaining knowledge of the danger and, complaining of it to his employer, is precluded from continuing his service, if the employer promises to repair, unless the danger is so imminent and manifest that no prudent person would be justified in taking the risk of the continued service. Shearman & Redfield, in their work on Negligence, 5th edition, section 215, thus state the rule: "In some old cases, the mere continuance of a servant in his work, with knowledge of defects in his associates or his materials, was treated as conclusive evidence of his having waived objections thereto. Such rulings were unjust; because a servant has the same right that any one else has to complete his contract in reliance upon its original terms. And those opinions have now been distinctly overruled. A party to any other contract, having mutual obligations, is allowed to perform fully his part, notwithstanding the failure of the other party to fulfill a condition precedent, without necessarily waiving his right to insist upon performance of such condition at a later period. It is not fair to require from servants a more peremptory assertion of their rights against masters, than would be required between parties standing upon a more equal footing. Indeed, the dependent positions of servants generally, makes it reasonable to hold any notice on their part sufficient, however timid and hesitating, so long as it plainly conveys to the master the idea that a defect exists and they desire its removal. The real question to be determined in each case is whether, under all the circumstances, the master believed and the servant intended to make him believe, that all objections to the unfitness of a fellow servant, or to the defects in the materials provided for the work, were waived; and that an implied contract exempting the master from liability was freely accepted. This is a question of fact, not of law; and if not free from doubt, it must be left to the jury. There is no longer any doubt that where a master has expressly promised to repair a defect, the servant does not assume the risk of an injury caused thereby, within such a period of time after the promise as would be reasonably allowed for its performance, or, indeed, within any period which would not preclude all reasonable expectation that the promise might be kept."

In the case of Hough v. Railway Co., 100 U. S. Rep., 213, the foregoing quotation was approved and adopted, as was the following quotation from Cooley on Torts: "If the servant," says Mr. Cooley, in his work on Torts, 559, "having a right to abandon the service because it is dangerous, refrains from doing so in consequence of assurances that the danger shall be removed, the duty to remove the danger is manifest and imperative; and the master is not in the exercise of ordinary care unless or until he makes his assurances good. Moreover, the assurances remove all ground for the argument that the servant by continuing the employment engages to assume the risks."

And the court further said: "We may add, that it was for the jury to say whether the defect in the cowcatcher or pilot was such that none but a reckless engineer, utterly careless of his safety, would have used the engine without it being removed. If, under all the circumstances, and in view of the promises to remedy the defect, the engineer was not wanting in due care in continuing to use the engine, then the company will not be excused for the omission to supply proper machinery, upon the ground of contributory negligence; that the engineer knew of the alleged defect was not, under the circumstances and as matter of law, absolutely conclusive of want of due care on his part."

In the case at bar, the servant knew of the danger and complained of it to his superior; the superior promised within a certain time to remedy the defect. We think he had a right to rely upon this assurance until the time indicated in the master's promise had expired without its fullfilment. Of course, the servant was not absolved from exercising due care in performing the master's labor under the dangerous circumstances with which he was surrounded, but that appellee was negligent in the manner of performing his work at the time he was hurt, is not contended for in this case.

We can not agree to the proposition that the danger in walking on the slippery floor was so apparent and imminent, that none but an utterly reckless person would have used it under the circumstances. The other employes in the laundry were walking on it at the same time, and did not fall; it was not at all probable that, if appellee fell, he would receive such terrible injury as happened to him on this occasion. This is not like the Sullivan case, where the employe was working on a narrow plank over a deep and rapid river, where to fall meant almost certain death; or that of the servant who uses a ladder without nails in the end, on ice, where it was almost certain that the ladder would slip when used, and equally certain that the fall would inflict serious injury, if not death, when it took place. At any rate, this, as was said in Hough v. The Railway, was a question for the determination of the jury. It is believed that the foregoing principles are sustained by Breckinridge Co. v. Hicks, 94 Ky., 362; Bell & Coggeshall Co. v. Applegate, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 470, and Reiser v. Southwestern Planing Mill and Lumber Co., 24 Ky. Law Rep., 796.

The following instruction, No. 3, given by the court, is complained of: "If the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant failed to exercise ordinary care to furnish plaintiff a reasonably safe place in which to work, by reason of said box being defective, and the plaintiff was injured by reason of the defective condition, if any, of said box; and if they further believe from the evidence that the defendant, through its manager, Mulligan, upon complaint being made to him by plaintiff, of the defective condition, if any, of said box, promised to repair the same, and relying upon said promise, if any, plaintiff continued to work, and plaintiff was injured within a reasonable time after such promise, if the same was made, that is, such a time as an ordinarily prudent man would have a right to expect that said promise, if any, would be complied with, they shall find for the plaintiff, etc."

It is contended that the court should have said to the jury, that the plaintiff could only rely upon the promise of the master to repair, for such a time as would reasonably be allowed for the performance of the promise, or only so long as would reasonably be necessary to make the repairs, instead of using the words contained in the last four lines of the instruction. We think the instruction is more favorable to appellant than it was entitled. Ordinarily, when the master makes a general promise to repair, without naming a time, the rule is that this should be construed to mean such time as would be reasonably necessary for the performance of the promise; but when the master fixes a definite time within which the repair is to be made, we know of no rule which would preclude the servant from waiting the expiration of the time named. In the case at bar, the promise was that the new box should be made as soon as the carpenter was through with some work up stairs. The accident seems to have happened before this took place, and appellee was authorized to wait until the expiration of the time named; or, as Shearman & Redfield state the rule, "the servant does not assume the risk of an injury caused thereby within such a period of time after the promise, as would be reasonably allowed for its performance, or, indeed, within any period which would not preclude all reasonable expectation that the promise might be kept."

For the reasons indicated the judgment is affirmed.

THRELKELD v. LIVINGSTON COUNTY FISCAL COURT, &c.

(Filed May 25, 1904.)

Jailer—Fees—Services not rendered—Special terms of court—Where the county judge holds special terms of his court in his own office or in the county clerk's office, of which he fails to give the jailer notice, and thereby fails to use the court room, the jailer of the county is not entitled to the statutory fee, or any fee, for the holding of such special terms, though he was daily in attendance upon the court room and courthouse, as, under section 1749, Kentucky Statutes, "no officer shall demand or receive any fee for services not actually rendered."

J. W. Bush and C. C. Grassham for appellant.

C. H. Wilson for appellee.

Appeal from Livingston Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Appellant was elected jailer of Livingston county in 1897 and re-elected in 1901. He filed this suit on October 21, 1903, to recover of the county an account amounting to $904 for fees coming to him for special terms of the county and fiscal courts, alleging that the county judge failed to use the court room in holding these special terms without any legal reason, and held these terms in the county clerk's office or in the county judge's office and thus prevented the plaintiff from giving his actual attendance upon these terms of court, though he was daily in attendance upon the court room and the courthouse; that in every instance the county judge opened the term of court without notifying him and refused to use the court room for these special terms. The circuit court sutained a demurrer to his petition, and he has appealed.

He relied upon section 1780, Kentucky Statutes, which is in these words: "The fees of jailer shall be as follow: For attending county and quarterly court, to be paid out of the county levy, per day, not exceeding * * * $2. For furnishing fuel and light to county and quarterly court, a reasonable compensation, not exceeding $2 per day, to be paid out of the county levy. For putting a prisoner in irons, for an offense other than a felony or contempt, besides the cost of the irons, to be paid out of the county levy, * * * 50 cts. For keeping and dieting prisoners in jail, when confined for an offense other than a felony or contempt of court, 50 cents per day, to be paid out of the county levy, unless confined for a breach of the by-laws or ordinances of a city or town, or for the violation of a statute, where the city or town gets the benefit of the fine; in that case to be paid by such city or town. For imprisoning and releasing a prisoner charged with a misdemeanor, 60 cents, to be paid out of the county levy, unless confined for a breach of the by-laws or ordinances of a city or town, or for a violation of statute, where the city or town gets the benefit of the fine; in that case, to be paid by such city or town. And for imprisoning and releasing a prisoner charged with a felony, 60 cents, to be paid out of the State treasury. For all other services performed by him, the same fees as sheriffs."

This section must be read in connection with section 1749, which contains this provision: "No officer shall demand or receive for his services any other or greater fee than is allowed by law, or any fee for services rendered when the law has not fixed a compensation therefor, nor any fee for services not actually rendered."

The meaning of section 1730 is that the jailer is to be paid for attending county and quarterly court, not exceeding $2 per day, and for furnishing fuel and lights a reasonable compensation, not exceeding $2 a day; for putting a prisoner in irons or for keeping a prisoner each day, 50 cents, or for imprisoning and releasing a prisoner, 60 cents. But he is not to be paid for any of these things unless he actually renders the services. If he does not attend the county court he can no more recover a fee therefor, because the county judge did not notify him and give him an opportunity to attend, than he could recover for fuel or lights if the county judge chose to hold the court in the dark or in a cold room, and not have fuel or lights furnished. We know of no statute requiring the county judge to hold his special terms in the court room. The county judge's office is in the courthouse, and so is the county clerk's office. Both these offices are set apart for the public business, and we see no reason why the county judge may not hold his special terms at his convenience either in his own office or in the county clerk's office. As a matter of fact, we know that this has been the universal custom throughout the State, which was of course well known to the legislature, and its continued silence on the subject would certainly indicate that the practice was not disapproved. The county judge in holding his special term usually transacts only routine or ex parte business, and his office is large enough for this purpose without using the court room. When the county judge uses the court room for a special term, and the jailer in fact attends the court, he is entitled to his fee under the statute; but under the facts stated in the petition he is entitled to no fee for the four hundred and fifty odd special terms of the court which were not held in the court room and which he did not attend.

Judgment affirmed.

SINGER MANUFACTURING CO. v. WITT, &c.

(Filed May 26, 1904.)

1. Appellate jurisdiction—While the judgment appealed from, $175, exclusive of interest and cost, is not sufficient to give this court jurisdiction of the appeal, the counterclaim of the defendant, which is germane to the original action, is for $60.53, which makes the real amount in controversy $235.53, and thereby this court acquires jurisdiction.

2. Parol evidence to vary writing—There being no ambiguity in the written contract sued on, and no allegation that it does not contain the agreement between the parties, it must be accepted as conclusive, and it was error to admit parol evidence, the effect of which was to vary or contradict the terms of the writing.

Robbins & Thomas for appellant.

Bullock & Smith for appellee.

Appeal from Fulton Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The appellee, J. W. Witt, was in the employ of the appellant, the Singer Manufacturing Co., as salesman and collector, from the 8th of August, 1901, until the 7th of April, 1902, under a written contract, which provided that he was to be paid a premium of $7.50 for each sale or lease of family machines when approved by the company, and a commission of 15 per cent. on the net amount of cash received and paid over to the company by him. The written contract further provided that all accounts or machines sold by him which were uncollectible, and in all cases in which the company were compelled to take back the machine, he should refund the cash premium of $7.50 that may have been paid to him by the company thereon. The contract also contained many other stipulations and provisions which it is not necessary for us to consider. On the 7th of April, 1902, he had fallen behind $351.14 in his accounts with the company, after he had been credited with the full amount of premiums on machines sold by him and commissions on collections paid to the company. But on that date there remained outstanding and uncollected claims due the company for machines sold by him, on which, when collected, he would be entitled to the commission provided by the contract, which were not credited to him in the settlement. To enable Witt to pay the balance due by him to the company, F. S. Moore, J. A. Noonan, J. W. McElroy, S, D. Luten, H. M. Kerby, G. L. Carpenter and J. H. Pollock signed their names as sureties for Witt to a promissory note for $351.14, which was discounted in a bank at Hickman, and the proceeds paid to the appellant. Contemporaneously with the execution of this note, the following contract was written by F. S. Moore, one of the sureties, and signed by J. W. Witt and E. H. Lamm, appellant's agent in this transaction:

"Whereas I, J. W. Witt, of Hickman, Fulton county, Ky., am indebted to F. S. Moore, etc., in the sum of $380.50, for money loaned, I have this day transferred, assigned, set over and conveyed, and by these presents do hereby transfer, assign and set over to F. S. Moore the following goods and chattels, to wit: All commissions and earnings accrued and accruing under my contract with the Singer Machine Co., prior and subsequent to the termination of said contract, in amounts, both all and singular whatsoever, to have and to hold in trust to pay the above indebtedness, and hereby giving, granting, constituting and appointing said F. S. Moore my true and lawful attorney, both in law and fact, to collect and draw above-mentioned commissions and earnings, and to receipt in my name for same, which shall be binding and of as full force and effect as if I myself was present.

"The Singer Machine Co. covenants and agrees to pay said commissions and earnings to the said F. S. Moore as per terms of said contract, making first settlement with F. S. Moore six months after termination of said contract between said company and J. W. Witt, and remainder thereof as said commissions and earnings accrue. In witness whereof all parties have hereunto set our hands and seals this April 7, 1902.

(Signed) "J. W. WITT,
"E. H. LAMM.

"Attested by: F. S. MOORE."

Witt's connection with the company ceased on that day. When he entered their service he was required to and did execute a bond of indemnity which was signed by a guaranty company. When the note in bank fell due, it was paid by the securities thereon, and the appellee, Witt, thereupon brought this suit in his own name for the use and benefit of these sureties against the appellant. He alleged in substance that he had represented to his sureties in the note, in the presence of E. H. Lamm, the agent of the defendant, to induce them to sign the note to raise the money to pay his indebtedness to the company, that there would be due to him as commissions upon uncollected claims due the company for machines sold by him, $175, before the proposed note would fall due, and which could be applied to its payment; and that Lamm made similar representations to them; and that relying upon these representations of defendant's agent, they signed the note. The defendant filed a general demurrer to the petition, which was overruled. It thereupon denied that their agent, Lamm, had represented that there would be due to the plaintiff, Witt, $175, for unaccrued commissions which could be applied as a credit upon the note, or that he promised that they should be so applied, admitted the execution of the contract by Lamm, and alleged that the accounts for nine sewing machines turned over to the company by Witt on the 7th of April, 1902, had proved worthless, and that they had been compelled to take back these machines, and that under their contract with him, they were entitled to have refunded $7.50 allowed and paid him as a premium on each of these machines; and that they had also been compelled to refund $3.93 commissions paid him, making his indebtedness to them since the settlement, $81.43, and admitted that there was due to him commissions on collections made since the payment to them on the 7th of April, 1902, $20.90, leaving a balance due to the company of $60.53, for which they prayed judgment against Witt, by way of counterclaim. The affirmative averments of the answer were controverted by reply, and a jury trial resulted in a judgment for the plaintiff for the amount sued for.

Upon the trial, the court instructed the jury in substance, that if they believed from the evidence that the company's agent, Lamm, had represented that there would be $175 due Witt on commissions, and guaranteed a credit of that amount on the note, and the plaintiffs were induced by his representations and guaranty to become the sureties of Witt upon the note to the bank, they should find for them. The converse of this instruction was also given. The defendant insisted that it could only be made liable in accordance with the terms of the written contract which had been signed by its agent, and asked the court to so instruct the jury. It also asked that the jury be directed to return a verdict for the defendant. All of which were overruled, and it has appealed.

It is insisted for appellee that, as the judgment is only for $175, that this court has no jurisdiction of the appeal. While the judgment rendered against appellant, exclusive of interest and cost, is insufficient to give this court jurisdiction, the counterclaim of the defendant is for $60.53, which makes the real amount in controversy $235.53; and in a number of cases it has been decided that when the defendant relies on a counterclaim against the plaintiff, which is germane to the original cause of action, and the original sum sued for and the sum named in the counterclaim exceed $200, then the amount in controversy is sufficient to give this court jurisdiction. It is conceded that the alleged parol representations made by the agent of the company as to the unearned commissions which would be due to Witt when collected, preceded the execution of the written contract between the parties and the contract itself is not assailed. The law is well settled that where contracts between parties are reduced to writing, the written contract must control, and not mere verbal declarations, which may have preceded its execution. (Van Sant v. Runyon, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 1981.) The rule is thus stated in 1 Greenleaf on Evidence (Lewis' Edition), section 275: "When parties have deliberately put their engagements into writing, in such terms as import a legal obligation, without uncertainty as to the object or extent of such engagement, it is conclusively presumed that the whole engagement of the parties and the extent and manner of their undertaking was reduced to writing; and all oral testimony of a previous coloquium between the parties or of a conversation, or declarations at the time when it was completed or afterwards, as it would in many instances substitute a new and different contract for the one which was really agreed upon to the prejudice possibly of one of the parties, is rejected."

We find no uncertainty or ambiguity in the terms of the written contract. In it the appellee, Witt, only assigned such commissions as might be due or become due to him from the company; and the company only agreed to pay Moore what should be found due Witt after the settlement of his accounts with the company in accordance with the terms of the contract. It follows that the trial court erred in admitting parol evidence, the effect of which was to contradict and vary the terms of the written contract between the parties by proof of alleged representation by the agent of the company before the execution of the written contract. The court also erred in giving instructions based upon this testimony to the jury. In the absence of any allegation that the written contract did not contain the agreement between the parties, it must be accepted as conclusive. The trial court should have sustained defendant's motion for a peremptory instruction to find in their favor on the cause of action set out in the original petition. And as the appellee, Witt, did not deny the correctness of appellant's account against him, they were entitled to a judgment against him on their counterclaim for $60.83.

For reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

KOCH, &c. v. KENTUCKY AND INDIANA R. R. AND BRIDGE CO., &c.

1. Railroads—Building siding on street—Damage to abutting lots—It was formerly held by this court that a legislative grant coupled with a municipality grant to a railroad company to lay its tracks upon a highway or street, was not an additional servitude upon the dominant estate and, therefore, did not entitle the owners of abutting property to claim compensation therefor unless the work was done negligently, or so near the property as to prevent ingress and egress to and from the same, for which a special action could be maintained; but under the provision of Kentucky Statutes, section 768, subsection 5, enacted in 1893, allowing compensation to such abutting owners, these former rulings can not be relied on in this case.

2. Estoppel—The fact that appellants or their vendors stood by and suffered the switch to be constructed under the belief that it was to be temporary, without saying or doing anything to mislead the appellees or to induce them to believe they would not claim compensation in case the switch should become permanent, will not serve as an estoppel to the appellant's from now claiming damages, and as the appellees have now made the switch a permanent construction and propose to maintain it as such, a matter over which the abutting lot owners has no control, such owner under the statute is entitled to compensation for the damage thereby done to his abutting property.

Pendleton C. Beckley and G. Garner Clark for appellants.

McDermott & Ray for appellee Third National Bank, etc.

Humphrey, Burnett & Humphrey for K. and I. Bridge and R. R. Co.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, Second Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

Appellants who own lots on 29th street in Louisville, have brought this suit against the Kentucky and Indiana Railroad and Bridge Co., and against the owner of a manufacturing plant, formerly William Bennett, now the Third National Bank and the Ginnick Furniture Manufacturing Co., to enjoin the operation of a switch or railroad siding extending along 29th street, and in front of appellants property; also to compel the removal of the track from the street. By an amendment filed some while after the beginning of the case, appellants also prayed for $4,000 damages, which they claim their lots have suffered by reason of the construction of the track and the operation of trains upon it. The suit is based upon the idea that the placing and maintenance of the track upon the street is a purpresture and a nuisance, by reason of which appellants have suffered special damage. The facts are that Bennett and the railroad company built this siding to connect with the main line of appellee railroad company's road, about 1890. At that time the territory traversed by the siding in question was not within the corporate limits of the city of Louisville, nor any other town or village. In fact, the lots were an uninclosed common, although its former owner, Dr. Elliott, had, by the plat which he had caused to be recorded in the Jefferson County Court, subdivided the original tract into lots, public streets and alleys, which latter he had expressly dedicated to the public use. These streets and alleys, however, had not been accepted either by or on behalf of the public in any manner. Bennett applied to Mrs. Elliott, the then owner of the property, for permission to build the siding over the strip known as Twenty-Ninth street, and fronting her other property, which she granted. The terms of the grant or license, whichever it may have been, are not clearly shown, although they were set forth in letters which passed between the parties, but which are now lost. It is conceded that there was no consideration for this permission by Mrs. Elliott. She claims that it was upon the understanding that it was to be temporary only, and that the track was to be removed upon her demand. The contrary contention is that it was to be permanent, and that the cost of building the switch and of certain extensive improvements in the enlargement of their plant done by Bennett's company upon the faith of its permanency, all indicate that they understood it was to be permanent, and that Mrs. Elliott herself likewise so understood it. In 1898, and about that time, Mrs. Elliott sold and conveyed the abutting property to some of the appellants, but with the understanding between her and them, that the railway track was only a temporary obstruction and that it was to be removed at her request. Therefrom appellants argue that the railway company and the furniture company, in building this siding, were mere licensees, whose right was permissive only, dependent upon the will of the licensor, and that the fact alone of Mrs. Elliott's conveyance of the property to others, was itself a revocation of the license.

We think it is sufficiently shown that appellee railroad and bridge company, was authorized by the legislature to construct the siding, but of course subject to the rights of the property owners whom it particularly affected. In 1895, by an ordinance duly adopted, the city of Louisville extended its boundary so as to include the territory where this road and Twenty-Ninth street are located, and by other ordinances the city generously granted to the bridge company and its vendors the right to build such spurs, sidings and switches as to have justified its building the one now in suit. Prior to the adoption of the present Constitution, and of certain legislation had thereunder, which will be presently noticed, it was formerly held by this court, that a legislative grant coupled with a municipal grant to a railroad company to lay its tracks upon a highway or street within the municipality, was not an additional servitude upon the dominent estate, and, therefore, did not entitle the owners of the abutting property to claim compensation therefor; that it was only in the event that such road was built so negligently or so near the property as to actually impede the ingress and egress to and from the lots, that they had a special right of action therefor. Those decisions are relied on as conclusive of this case. They can not apply because of a radical change in legislation on that subject, since the cases cited became authority. The statute alluded to is quoted further along.

A plea in estoppel is also interposed by appellees, based upon the fact that appellants and their vendors had stood by and suffered appellees to incur the extraordinary expense in building the switch, and erecting certain last-

DANCE'S ADM'R v. MAGRUDER.

(Filed May 26, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Decedent's estate—Claim against for board—Account against for services rendered decedent—In an action against a decedent's estate for board and for services rendered in caring for deceased during his last illness, it was error to render judgment for the amount of claim for board, there being no evidence showing a contract to pay board, but under the rule that there may be an implied contract when the person receiving necessaries is incapable of contracting for them, compensation for services rendered deceased during his last illness will be allowed, where it appears from the ravages of disease he was incapable of making a contract with reference to the payment of services received by him.

F. L. Turner and Jacob Corbett for appellant.

J. B. Wickliffe for appellee.

Appeal from Ballard Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

Appellant's intestate, William Dance, and the appellee, Annie L. Magruder, were brother and sister. William Dance died in the year 1902 and appellee brought this action against his administrator on an account for board of the deceased for the three last years of his life amounting to $872, for washing, $8, and for nursing him in his last illness, $100. The appellant traversed appellee's petition and on a trial in the lower court the jury found for appellee the full amount of her claim, $480, from the judgment on which verdict appellant has appealed.

The proof shows that the appellee was poor and with several children, and that she and her husband resided upon the farm of the deceased as renters, giving him a portion of the crop as rent; that the deceased was very fond of his sister and her children, and he frequently expressed the intention of giving this farm to his sister and the proof clearly indicates that, when on his death bed, he sent for the county judge for the purpose of writing his will, but when the judge arrived he was not in a condition to make a will. While, under the testimony, we are confident that if he had been in a proper state of mind at that time he would have devised the property to her and possibly her children, but we have been unable to find any evidence proving a contract for the payment of board. Nor was there any proof showing an intention on his part to pay board or on her part to receive it. (Thomas, &c. v. Arthur, 7 Bush, 245; Miller v. Swan & Brown, 91 Ky., 36.)

The proof showed that appellee did the washing charged in her account, and that it was worth the price of $8, and that she gave her constant care and attention to and nursed the deceased for fifteen days during his last illness, and that $100 was reasonable for such nursing, considering his condition. The proof also showed that he was not in a state of mind to have made a contract during this illness.

In the case of Frailey's Adm'r v. Thompson, &c., 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1179, the court said: "The jury should also be instructed that for such services rendered, if any, not personal to decedent—and this would include such as washing and making or mending clothes—the law implies a contract to pay, and as to such services the burden is on defendant to show that they were rendered, if at all, gratuitously; and unless the jury should find that there was not an agreement not to charge for such services, the plaintiff would be entitled to the reasonable value of such services."

The case of Combs v. Beatty, &c., 8 Bush, 614, was one wherein appellant cared for her brother or half-brother, and a suit was brought to subject his estate to the payment of the claim for such services. The court in that case, said: "Although no express agreement for compensation to the appellant is shown to have existed in this case, yet, as Robert Beatty was an idiot, and, therefore, incapable of making a contract, and as his sustenance was necessary and requisite to the support of his life, we think he was liable therefor upon an implied promise to pay, according to the well-settled principle, that persons incapable of making contracts generally may, nevertheless, be charged for necessaries."

Under this rule of law, and it is a just one, appellee is entitled to receive pay for her services rendered him in his last illness at which time it is shown by the evidence he was unconscious by reason of the ravages of disease, and incapable of making a contract. Under these authorities and the evidence in this case appellee was only entitled to a verdict of $108. The judgment of the lower court having been for $480, it is evident that the jury allowed her this claim for $108 and erroneously allowed her the claim for board, of $372, in addition thereto.

Wherefore, the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with directions to the lower court to enter judgment for the appellee for the sum of $108, that being the amount allowed her by the jury for washing and nursing him in his last illness, and to dismiss her action as to her claim for board.

LINTHECUM, &c. v. VOWELS' EX'OR.

(Filed May 26, 1904.)

1. Wills—Executor—When to settle estate—Time fixed by testator—The will of Thomas Vowels was probated November 16, 1903; the executor named, qualified and executed bond, and on December 5, made sale of the personal property and filed sale bill in the county clerk's office on December 14. Testator left six children and nine grandchildren, the latter being the children of his daughter, who married J. C. Linthecum. On December 25 Linthecum, as next friend for his infant children, filed this suit against the executor, claiming that he had failed to appraise certain articles of the value of $505.50 and prayed, first, that he should settle his accounts; second, that he be charged with the articles omitted from the appraisement, and, third, that the land devised by the testator be sold and the proceeds divided according to the will. A general demurrer was sustained to the petition. The will directs that the executor "should make a partial settlement with the court at the expiration of one year after entry upon the duties of administration, and that he should be prompt in making final settlement at the end of the second year." Held—That while such a provision in a will would not be enforcible as against the rights of creditors, it is enforcible as between the heirs and devisees, and the demurrer to the petition was properly sustained.

2. Wrongful conversion—Liability on bond—If as alleged the executor has converted property of the estate to his own use, he will be liable therefor on his bond; but this fact would not be sufficient to justify the court at the instance of a devisee under the will, to disregard its provisions as to the time when settlement of the executor's accounts might be enforced.

Sweeney, Ellis & Sweeney for appellants.

Miller & Todd for appellee.

Appeal from Daviess Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The will of Thos. Vowels, a citizen and resident of Daviess county, was probated by the Daviess county court on the 16th of November, 1903, and his son, Tavian Vowels, the named executor thereof, qualified by taking the oath and executing the bond required by law. Appraisers were promptly appointed, and on the 24th of November, 1903, thereafter, filed an inventory and appraisement of the personal estate of decedent in the county court clerk's office, attested by the executor as required by law. On the 14th of December thereafter, the executor filed in the office of the county court clerk, a sale bill of personalty belonging to the estate of decedent sold by him at public auction on the 5th day of the preceding December. Testator was survived by six children and nine grandchildren, who were the children of a daughter who married J. C. Linthecum. On the 25th of December, J. C. Linthecum brought this suit as next friend of his infant children against the appellee as executor, in which he alleged that the defendant had failed to have appraised certain articles of personal property of the value of $505.50, which belonged to the estate of testator, and prayed, first, that the defendant should be required to settle his accounts as executor; second, that he should be charged with the various articles of personal property alleged to have been omitted from the appraisement and sale bill; and, third, that the land devised by testator should be adjudged to be sold and the proceeds divided among the devisees according to the will. To this petition the appellee filed a special demurrer because of a defect of parties defendant, and also a general demurrer, both of which were sustained. Appellant thereafter filed an amended petition, in which he made all the heirs and devisees of testator parties to the proceeding, and alleged that the defendant had fraudulently and with a view of converting to his own use, omitted to have appraised the various articles of personal property recited in his original petition; that he was in the possession of the land devised, and had neither sold nor offered to sell it, and was proposing to use and occupy it for the present year; that there was cash on hand after the payment of the debts of testator of from $150 to $250, which he had failed to divide among the heirs, and prayed as in his original petition. A general demurrer was sustained to the petition, as amended, and plaintiff declining to plead further, the petition, as amended, was dismissed, and he has appealed to this court.

The main question to be decided upon the appeal is, whether a testator can fix a time for the settlement of the accounts of his executor, different from that named in the statute, which will be binding on his devisees. Section 428 of the Civil Code provides who may institute an action for the settlement of the estate of a deceased person. Subsection 2 thereof provides that the representatives of the decedent and all persons having an interest in the property left by the decedent, or any part thereof, and the creditors of the decedent must be made parties to the action, plaintiff or defendant.

Under these provisions of the Code, we think it quite clear that the trial court properly sustained the special demurrer for defect of parties.

Section 3847 of the Kentucky Statutes provides that: "Six months must run after the date of the qualification of the first personal representative of a decedent's estate by a court of this Commonwealth, before an action shall be commenced against any executor or administrator thereof, except to settle an estate, or against an executor de son tort. Any action brought in violation of this section shall be dismissed, with cost."

In construing this section of the statute this court has uniformly held that actions to settle the estates of decedents may be brought within less than six months from the appointment of the personal representative. (Holland v. Lowe, 101 Ky., 98; Brand v. Brand, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 1366.) There is no question of an executor de son tort in the proceeding, and unless controlled by the provision of the will fixing a time for the settlement of the accounts of the executor, appellants having an interest in the property left by the decedent, could maintain their action for a settlement under the statute and decisions quoted, supra. But in this case the will of testator not only disposes of his estate among his children and appoints an executor to execute it, but he has willed and decreed that his administrator "should make a partial settlement with the court at the expiration of one year after entry upon the duties of administration; and that he should be prompt in making final settlement at the end of the second year thereafter."

It is evident from this provision of the will that testator believed that it would be best for his estate that his executor should have at least one year from the date of his qualification to convert his estate into money and to make a partial settlement; and that it would require two years for him to finally settle up the estate. Of course, such a provision in the will of a decedent would not be enforcible as against the rights of creditors, but we know of no rule of law which prohibits a testator from fixing a time for the settlement and distribution of his estate among his devisees. If he has the right to say to whom his estate shall go, he can fix the time and manner for settlement and distribution to his devisees. In Trimble's Ex'or v. Lebus, &c., 94 Ky., 304, it was decided by this court that the statute which provides that no administrator or executor should sell any dividend paying stock, bonds, or other property, which the decedent owned at his death, until so ordered by a court of general equity jurisdiction in the county where the letters of administration were granted, or the will recorded, did not apply where a testator had, by his will, invested his executor with discretionary power to make such sales. The statutes require that an executor or administrator shall execute bond with good security. But a testator has the right, notwithstanding the statute, to provide in his will that his executor shall be permitted to qualify without security, and in this way dispose of the provision of the statute. There is no allegation that the executor has not executed a good bond for the estate which came into his hand. Section 3857 of the statutes provides a way for enforcing the return of an inventory or sale bill. If, as alleged, the executor has converted to his own use property belonging to the estate, he will be liable therefor on his bond. But this fact in our opinion would not be sufficient to justify the court, at the instance of a devisee under the will, to disregard its provision as to the time when settlement of the accounts of the executor might be enforced. Besides, it appears to us that appellee was proceeding with sufficient promptness in the discharge of his duty as executor prior to the institution of the suit.

Perceiving no error in the judgment of the chancellor, it is affirmed.

HENDRICKSON v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed May 27, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Homicide—Deputy sheriff—Arrest—Offense committed in officers presence—One who fires a pistol in a town in the presence of a deputy sheriff, commits a public offense for which he may be arrested by said officer without a warrant.

2. Killing officer in making arrest—Competency of threats made by accused—Where an officer went to the house of defendant to arrest him for a public offense committed in his presence, knowing the desperate character of the defendant, it was his duty to arm himself before going so as to be prepared for an emergency; and in such case where the officer was killed by the defendant, it was competent for the Commonwealth to prove that on the day defendant fired the pistol, for which the officer had gone out to arrest him, he said as he went home "that he had killed one deputy sheriff and that he would kill another." Also just before deceased reached defendant's house defendant was informed that the officer was coming with another deputy to arrest him, he said "let them come, the whole dam posse can't take me." Also that accused told another witness a short time before the killing, "that deceased had arrested him at one time when he was having a difficulty with his wife and that he intended to kill him for it."

3. Jury—Reasonable conclusion—No one being in the room when deceased entered except accused, who swears that deceased fired the first shot, under all the facts proven the jury were authorized to conclude that if deceased fired the first shot, he did so to save his life from the peril which the hostile acts of the accused made imminent.

4. Leading questions—Where the attorney for the Commonwealth had difficulty in eliciting from a witness what accused did and said on his way home from the place where he fired his pistol in the street, the court properly allowed the attorney to refresh the witness' recollection as to what accused said.

B. B. Golden, E. N. Ingram and C. W. Logan for appellant.

N. B. Hays and Loraine Mix for appellee.

Appeal from Bell Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The appellant was indicted for the murder of Tom Stewart. The jury found him guilty of voluntary manslaughter and fixed his punishment at confinement for ten years in the penitentiary. The evidence conduces to show that Tom Stewart was a deputy sheriff; that about 11 o'clock on the day of the homicide appellant was engaged in a conversation at a point in the street of the town of Four Mile, Bell county; that one of the party was Press Hendrickson, a brother of the appellant; that their position and conversation was such as to annoy persons passing along the street, when the deceased appealed to them to change their position and conversation so as to allow ladies to pass; thereupon the appellant fired his pistol once or twice into the ground not far from the deceased; he then moved away a few feet and again fired his pistol. As he went towards his house he said that he had killed one deputy sheriff and that he would kill another. He went on to his home. In the meantime the deceased and another deputy armed themselves and proceeded to appellant's home with the view of arresting him. Just before the deputy sheriffs reached his house, John A. Miller, a friend of Hendrickson, went to his house and informed him that the deputy sheriffs were coming to arrest him, when he said, all right, let them come when they get ready. Ernest Withrow testified that a few minutes before the arrival of the deputy sheriffs, Cal Baker handed the accused a memorandum book with some writing in it. When he read it, he said "let them come, the whole damn posse of them can't take me." The accused admitted in his evidence that he had read the writing in the book, and it apprised him of the fact that parties were coming to arrest him. While Withrow was at the accused's house immediately before the homicide, he saw the deceased and the other deputy sheriff approaching the house, and testified to facts from which the inference might be drawn that Hendrickson saw them approaching it. Another witness testified that a short time before the homicide the accused told her that the deceased had arrested him at one time when he was having a difficulty with his wife, and that he intended to kill him on account of it. When the deputies, Taylor and Stewart, approached the house Taylor carried a Winchester rifle and Stewart a pistol. Taylor did not enter the house. Stewart approached it and the door seems to have been open, and he immediately entered, when the firing began. The evidence tends to show that a number of shots were fired in the house, and there is evidence tending to show that the deceased fired the first shot. After the shots were fired in the house the deceased staggered from it, over the porch, fell on the ground, and soon expired.

The defendant claims that he killed Stewart in self-defense. His evidence tends to show that Stewart, immediately upon entering the house, shot him and was preparing to shoot again, and did so about the time the accused fired the first shot. There are two facts that the evidence establishes: First, that Stewart went to the house for the purpose of arresting the accused; second, that the accused was fully apprised of his purpose, knew that he was approaching the house and was determined to resist arrest, and, if need be, kill him to prevent it. It is a fair inference to be drawn from the evidence of the Commonwealth, that the accused was in a hostile attitude when the deceased entered the house, and was attempting to execute his design. The jury was authorized to draw the conclusion from the evidence introduced by the Commonwealth that if Stewart shot first, that he did so to save his life from the peril which the hostile conduct of the accused made imminent.

Stewart had been duly appointed a deputy sheriff, and the accused had committed a public offense by firing his pistol in the streets of the town. Such an act is declared to be a public offense by section 1817, Kentucky Statutes. So the accused committed a public offense in the presence of the deceased, and the law made it his duty to arrest him therefor, and authorized him to do so without a warrant. The court, therefore, properly told the jury that the deceased was a deputy sheriff, and it was his duty, under the law, to make the arrest. The deceased knew the desperate character of the man he had to arrest, and he knew the admonition he received before going to make the arrest, that he would be killed, was timely. It was the part of wisdom to prepare himself for such an emergency.

It is urged that the court should have given a peremptory instruction to the jury to find the accused not guilty. We are of the opinion that the court properly overruled the motion for such an instruction, for we are thoroughly convinced that it was a case where a public officer was attempting to perform his duty in attempting to arrest one who had committed a public offense in his presence, and in making that effort he was slain by the public offender, who resisted the arrest, pursuant to a predetermination to slay the officer rather than submit to it.

The chief complaint as to instructions is as to instruction No. 5. In that instruction the court told the jury that the deceased was a deputy sheriff and had the right to arrest the accused, if, in the opinion of the officer the accused had committed a public offense in his presence, and if the defendant resisted arrest and shot and killed the deceased to prevent his arrest on the charge, they should find him guilty of murder. It was a question of law for the determination of the court whether the deceased was a deputy sheriff. The uncontradicted testimony shows that the defendant fired his pistol in the streets of Four Mile in the presence of Stewart. The defendant admitted that he fired his pistol, so the court with propriety could have told the jury that the accused did commit a public offense in the presence of the officer. Assuming that the instruction was erroneous in allowing the officer to make the arrest without a warrant, if in his opinion the accused had committed a public offense in his presence, it was not prejudicial to him, because the jury did not find him guilty of murder.

It is claimed that the court erred in its rulings on the questions of the admission of evidence.

C. B. Ricketts was on the stand and the Commonwealth had difficulty in eliciting his knowledge as to what the accused did and said on his way home from the place where he had fired his pistol in the street in the presence of the deceased. Under the circumstances, we are of the opinion that the court properly allowed the Commonwealth's attorney to refresh the witness' memory as to what the accused said. A witness, by the name of Hubbard, testified that he advised the deceased to overlook the conduct of the accused in shooting his pistol at the time herein mentioned, and that the deceased made no response; thereupon the defendant asked the witness if at other times when he spoke to the deceased, if he always paid attention and showed that he heard what the witness said. The court properly refused to allow the witness to answer the question, as the answer could not have thrown any light upon the issues of the case.

While the court erred in allowing the witness, Withrow, to state why he went away from the house of the accused, it was not prejudicial, as the court finally excluded the answer; besides, the witness had testified to facts as to the approach of the officers and the accused's threatened resistance which necessarily made the impression on the jury that the witness, like any one else, would have been glad to have gotten away, so as not to have witnessed the tragedy which was threatened and actually took place.

The judgment is affirmed.

FLETCHER v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed May 27, 1904.)

Indictment—Taking lumber from church—Felonious intent—The taking by defendant of one or two planks of loose lumber from a church in the day time, without any attempt at concealment, the defendant saying at the time that he wanted them because they were well seasoned, and would replace other plank in their place which he afterwards did, was not a felonious taking in the meaning of section 1162, Kentuky Statutes, for "feloniously taking property from a church, meeting house, school house," etc., and under the evidence showing these facts, the defendant was entitled to a peremptory instruction by the court to the jury to find him not guilty.

B. B. Golden for appellant.

N. B. Hays and Loraine Mix for appellee.

Appeal from Clay Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The appellant, John J. Fletcher, was accused by the grand jury of Clay county of violating section 1162 of the Kentucky Statutes, by a felonious taking from the Pleasant Run Meeting house of plank, lumber and other things of value, with the intention of converting same to his own use. Being put upon his trial before a petit jury, he was convicted. It was shown by the testimony for the Commonwealth that he was engaged in the business of blacksmithing and repairing vehicles of all kinds a short distance from the Pleasant Run Church on Raider's Creek, in Clay county, Kentucky; and that during the month of October, 1902, he went to the church and took therefrom a board about ten or twelve feet in length and twelve or fourteen inches wide, carried it to his shop and used it in the construction of a wagon bed for one of his customers; and that on another occasion, near the same time, he took another piece of plank from the church while in company with one Jule Hacker. Both of these boards were taken in the day time without the slightest attempt at concealment, the defendant remarking at the time that he wanted a piece of seasoned lumber and would return other boards in the place of those taken by him. It is also shown that he did return boards of approximately the same size as those taken. It appears that several years before, a lot of lumber had been taken into the church for the purpose of manufacturing seats for the congregation, and that after finishing the number required, several hundred feet of lumber was left over, which was left in the meeting house; and that the boards taken by defendant were a part of this surplus lumber, which had become well seasoned in the meantime. The section of the statute under which appellant is proceeded against reads as follows: "If any person shall feloniously take out of or from a church, chapel, or meeting house, school house, court house, or other public building, any goods or chattels or other thing of value belonging thereto * * * he shall be confined in the penitentiary not less than two nor more than ten years."

Buildings of the kind described in this section of the statute are usually unoccupied, and consequently easily and safely despoiled by trespassers. The purpose of the statute was to prevent the removal from public buildings of appendages and appurtenances belonging to the building itself, and used in connection with the building; for instance, chandeliers, doors, windows, tables, benches, chairs and such like. In our opinion the statute has no application to a pile of loose lumber which did not belong to and was not to be used in any way in connection with the building itself. Besides, in our opinion it is conclusively shown by the testimony in this case, that the appellant did not remove the planks from the building with a felonious intent. There was not the slightest attempt at concealment on his part, and the voluntary restoration by him to the church of other planks of substantially the same kind and value, is wholly inconsistent with any purpose on his part to commit a crime. The inconsiderable value of the plank removed is also material evidence in our opinion of a lack of criminal intent. While the defendant was perhaps technically guilty of illegally appropriating personal property, the evidence wholly fails to make out a criminal intent on his part in so doing. We think the trial court erred in overruling the motion, at the close of the evidence for the Commonwealth, for a peremptory instruction to the jury to find him not guilty.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

VOLLMAN BUGGY BODY CO. v. SPRY, BY, &c.

(Filed May 27, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Damages—Evidence—In an action by appellee, a servant of appellant, against it for damages for injuries sustained while operating a joiner in its manufacturing plant, it was not competent to ask the plaintiff's witness upon the trial, the general question as to whether a boy sixteen years old would have appreciated the increased danger resulting from the absence of the safety board, and it was error for the court to overrule exceptions to this testimony.

2. Instructions—Upon the trial of an action for damages for injuries sustained by operating a joiner at a buggy manufacturing plant, an instruction of the court which assumed the machine to be dangerous, was erroneous. Such question being in issue by the proof, it was the province of the jury to determine from it whether the machine was or was not dangerous.

Miller & Todd for appellant.

James B. Clark for appellees.

Appeal from Daviess Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam

The appellee, John Jackson Spry, a boy sixteen years of age, brought this action in the court below against the appellant, the Vollman Buggy Body Co., to recover damages for an injury sustained by him while operating a joiner in their plant. He alleges, in substance, that he was employed by the defendant to off-bear light strips of lumber and do such other light work as was proper for a boy of his age and experience, under the control and direction of defendant's foreman; that having completed the task assigned to him by the foreman, he was directed to plane some small pieces of wood on a machine called a joiner; that he had had no previous experience with this machine, and that its operation was outside of the line of his employment; that the joiner appeared to be safe, but was in reality a very dangerous machine and could only be safely operated by an experienced person; that among the pieces of wood which he was directed to plane there was a defective piece, hard to plane, and that while attempting to do so his right hand came in contact with the knives of the machine, and his thumb and first finger were cut off; that defendant's foreman failed to warn him of the danger attendant upon the operation of the machine, or to give him any instructions concerning it; that at the time he was directed to do the work, the safety board, an attachment belonging to the machine for the protection of persons operating it, had been taken off, thereby greatly increasing the risk of its operation; that he did not know or appreciate the increased danger of attempting to operate the machine in the absence of this board, but that appellant's foreman knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have known, of the absence of the board from the machine at the time he directed plaintiff to do the work and the increased risk occasioned thereby. The defendant answered in three paragraphs. In the first it traversed all the material averments of the petition. In the second it plead that the plaintiff, on the day and at the time he was injured, was operating the joiner in violation of positive instructions from the foreman not to do so. Third, it relied on a plea of contributory negligence. Issue was joined by reply and the case tried out before a jury, who returned a verdict against the appellant for $700. Motion for a new trial having been overruled, the defendant appeals.

Upon the trial, appellee testified that Mr. Vollman, the superintendent, had directed him to operate the joiner at the time of the accident; and that he was standing only five or six feet from the machine at the time he gave him these orders; that he noticed that the safety board had been taken off of the machine, but that owing to his youth and inexperience, he did not appreciate that its absence rendered the machine extremely dangerous; that in attempting to plane a defective piece of wood, it split, and his hand came in contact with the knives of the joiner, resulting in the injury sued for. He is supported in his statements, as to the direction given him by the superintendent, by his younger brother, Jimmy Spry, who was also in the employ of the company. On the other hand, Mr. Vollman emphatically denies that he told appellee to operate the machine at the time of the accident, but says that plaintiff requested that he should be permitted to plane some small pieces of boards, and that he expressly forbade him from doing so. He also testified that the joiner was perfectly equipped and in good condition, and was not a dangerous machine for any one to operate with the safety board on it; that plaintiff was familiar with the mode in which it was operated, having been in the employ of the company for some time. Mr. Vollman is supported in his statements by the witness Foster, an employe of the defendant, and also by John Martin, who testified that ordinarily he operated this machine, and that he had been engaged in so doing about twenty or thirty minutes before the accident; that when he left the machine the safety board was in its proper place; that just before the accident he asked the plaintiff, who told him to work on the machine, and that appellee replied that no one told him; that he then warned him that he might get hurt, and that appellee responded that he would do as he pleased about it. The testimony of Martin tends to show that the safety board was removed by appellee himself, although this is emphatically denied by the boy.

A number of errors are complained of in the admission and rejection of testimony upon the trial. First, over the objection of the defendant, plaintiff was permitted to prove by Wm. Jorleman, an expert machinist, that a boy of sixteen years of age, without experience in machinery, would not appreciate the hazard and risk of operating such a machine in the absence of a safety board. We think it was competent to prove by this witness the construction of the machine and the effect of attempting to operate it in the absence of the safety board, but we do not think it was competent to have asked him the general question, whether a sixteen-year-old boy would have appreciated the increased danger resulting from the absence of the safety board. There is a great variety in the intelligence, prudence and discretion in boys sixteen years of age, and this was a question upon which expert testimony could throw no light. We think the court erred in overruling the exceptions to this testimony. We think the trial court properly permitted the appellee to read to the jury defendant's answer as testimony, although we are unable to perceive how it could have affected the result of the trial. The first instruction given by the court to the jury is as follows: "The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that plaintiff, while in the employment of the defendant as an off-bearer of light lumber, was ordered or directed by the foreman of the defendant to operate or run the machine described in the petition of plaintiff, which was a dangerous machine and not properly equipped, and hazardous to the operator, which was known to the foreman, or might, by ordinary care, have been known to him, and plaintiff had no knowledge or experience in the operation of said machine, and was ignorant of the danger in operating same, which was known to the said foreman, or might by ordinary care have been discovered by him, and he failed to warn plaintiff of the dangers of operating such machine, or to instruct him in its use and operation, and plaintiff, while in the observance of such ordinary care as he was capable of, was injured in the manner complained of in the petition, the jury should find for the plaintiff the damages sustained, not exceeding the amount claimed in the petition."

By this instruction the jury were expressly told that the joiner was a dangerous machine and not properly equipped and hazardous to the operator, and which was known to the foreman, or might have been known by the exercise of ordinary care; and that the plaintiff had no knowledge or experience in the operation of the machine and was ignorant of the danger in operating same. In other words, the court assumes in the instruction, as established, the facts on which appellant's liability to appellee must depend, and all of which were put in issue by the proof, and were questions which should have been left to the determination of the jury. It is hardly probable that the trial court intended to take these facts from the jury, but there can be no escape from the conclusion that this is the literal meaning of the instruction and is the interpretation which a jury would most likely place upon it.

For reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded for a new trial.

RIDDLE v. RIDDLE, &c.

(Filed May 27, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Decedent's estate—Contracts—Consideration—A contract entered into between the father and his children to rent out the land left by the deceased wife and mother, in order to pay the debts she had incurred, was not without consideration; and while there was perhaps an inequality of consideration, the court will not enter into such inadequacy, the consideration expressed being sufficient to uphold the contract. A part of the land embraced in the rental contract having been owned in fee by the decedent, the father was interested in a speedy settlement of the debts against the estate of his wife, because, when they were fully settled he was to receive his part of the land, and where he had paid a part of the debts he was entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the creditors whose debts he had extinguished.

L. P. Little, Eli H. Brown and Little & Slack for appellant.

J. B. Karn and LaVegas Clements for appellees.

Appeal from Daviess Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

This is a contest between the appellant, who is the father, and the appellees, who are his children, in regard to an estate left by Elizabeth Riddle, the wife of appellant, and the mother of appellees.

In her lifetime, Elizabeth Riddle was empowered to trade as a feme sole. She owned a life estate in four small tracts of land which lay together, and which made up a farm of one hundred and one and one-third acres, with remainder in fee to her children, the appellees; she also owned, in fee simple, a contiguous tract of twenty one acres. After her death, it seems that the father and his children entered into a contract looking to the payment of her debts, which amounted to $500. By this contract, all of the land constituting the farm, with the exception of the house and the ten acres upon which it stood, was put under the management and control of L. W. Riddle, who was to rent it and apply the proceeds to the payment of the debts of his mother.

After the expiration of a number of years, the father married again, and, as a result, an estrangement has crept in between him and his children. This action was instituted for a division of the above-mentioned land between the children; Louis W. Riddle was plaintiff, his father and his brothers and sisters were defendants. The father filed an answer, counterclaim and cross petition, setting up the contract existing between him and his children in reference to the debts of their mother, alleging that, under it, they had taken charge of the farm, with the exception of the house and ten acres of ground occupied by himself, and used it for their own interest; that it was reasonably worth the sum of $200 per year, and that they, therefore, had received in value a sum sufficient to have paid off all the debts of Elizabeth Riddle; that he, himself, in order to avoid being sued, had paid off some of the debts, amounting in the aggregate to $147; and he prayed for a judgment requiring the children to pay all their mother's debts, including the sum of $147 due to himself.

The learned trial judge was of opinion that, inasmuch as the appellees at their mother's death became the owners of the four tracts of land in which she had a life estate, and they, as her children, were not bound for her debts, that, therefore, the contract entered into between appellant and appellees looking to the payment of her debts out of the rents and profits of the land in question, was without consideration and void. In this we think he erred by overlooking the fact that, as part of the consideration of the contract in question, appellant had placed in charge of L. W. Riddle his interest in the tract of twenty-one acres, which constituted a part of his wife's estate; and, while it may be true that there was an inequality in the consideration of the contract moving from the father and children, respectively, the court will not enter into its adequacy, if there was a consideration at all. The trust fund created by the contract for the payment of the debts of Elizabeth Riddle was made up in part of appellant's interest in the twenty-one acres, of which his wife died seized in fee simple, and this was sufficient to uphold the contract. This being true, appellant was interested in the speedy payment of the indebtedness of his wife's estate, because, whenever that was fully discharged, he was to receive back his land; consequently, he was deeply interested in preventing the accumulation of costs of actions instituted by the creditors, and, therefore, had the right to protect himself from this loss by paying off the debts without suit; and having done so, he was subrogated to the rights of the creditors whose debts he had extinguished, and to that extent had a lien upon whatever estate she had left, subject to the payment of her debts. Certainly, appellees' interest in the remainder of the tract of twenty-one acres was liable for the debts of the decedent, and appellant had a right to subject this interest to the payment of whatever just claim he had against the estate by subrogation.

For the reasons indicated the judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent herewith.

DORSEY'S ADM'X v. LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE R. R. CO., &c.

1. Railroads—Damages—Where the evidence shows that shortly before the death of appellant's intestate he said to another "I am drunk this morning and I don't care what I do and I would as soon be dead as alive," and then going in the direction of a railroad where a train going twenty-five or thirty miles an hour soon passed, was found soon thereafter lying against a fence near the track, unconscious and badly injured in the head and shoulder, there can be no recovery against the railroad company for damages for his death. There is nothing in the record to show that he was in such position as to be seen by those in charge of the train. He was evidently drunk and perhaps asleep when the train struck him. A peremptory instruction to find for the defendant was proper.

2. Same—Pleading—In an action against a railroad company for damages, the court properly refused to permit the plaintiff to file an amended petition which charged that the company was without title to the right of way. Whether it had title or not it had possession, and one was no less a trespasser upon its track because it had taken possession of the ground wrongfully.

A. D. Cole for appellant.

W. H. Wadsworth and Benjamin D. Warfield for appellee.

Appeal from Mason Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

George Dorsey was a laborer on the farm of C. D. Russell, in Mason county. On Sunday morning, August 10, 1902, about half past five o'clock, his wife gave him the milk bucket and he left the house with the bucket to milk the cows. He had been to Maysville the night before and was under the influence of liquor, having been out all night. He did not milk the cows, but went to the house of Charley Brown, another laborer on the farm, and had some conversation with Brown's wife in which he said, "I am drunk this morning and I don't care what I do and I would as soon be dead as alive." Soon after this he left Brown's house, walking down the railroad track, and Brown went with him till they got to a bridge. There Brown turned around and went home. Not long after this a train came along running about twenty-five miles an hour. Forty or forty-five minutes afterward, Dorsey was found at the far end of the bridge from Brown's house, unconscious. He was lying against the fence about six feet from the abutment of the bridge, face downward. There was a jagged larceration in the front of his head about an inch and a half in size. There was also a cut all the way across his head at the back at the base of the skull; there were two bruises on his right arm; across his right shoulder there was a bruise about six inches and in the center of it there was a hole about six inches deep, which the witness at first thought was where somebody had shot him. This hole was ragged. Nothing was seen on the track that indicated what made the wounds. The abutment tapers off gradually to the fence; there was blood on it and blood on down to the bottom where the grass was. There was a road crossing some little distance from the bridge which the train passed as it approached it; and the plaintiff introduced some proof that the usual signals were not given for this crossing. Dorsey died of the injuries without regaining consciousness, and this suit was brought to recover for his death. For a quarter of a mile before the train reached the bridge the track was straight, and as it passed Brown's house, which was within this distance of the bridge, he noticed a man in the cab of the engine apparently looking down the track. The plaintiff charged that the men in charge of the train saw the peril of her intestate and could, by ordinary care after perceiving his danger, have averted the injury to him. At the conclusion of the evidence the court instructed the jury peremptorily to find for the defendant.

The plaintiff alleged that her intestate had sat down on the end of the cross ties and fallen asleep. But the proof entirely fails to show what position he was in as the train approached him. There are circumstances in the case apart from the nature of his wounds which would lead at least to a suspicion that he was not killed by the train, but aside from this there is nothing in the proof showing that he was in a position in which he might have been seen by the trainmen as they approached. He was evidently quite drunk and probably asleep when the train approached him. The noise roused him up and whether this was in time for the engineer to have perceived his danger, there is nothing in the record to show. He was a trespasser. The company had no right to expect his presence on the track. The failure to give signals of the approach to the crossing was not negligence as to him. There can be no recovery because a lookout was not kept. The fact that a man was seen in the cab apparently looking down the track as it passed Brown's house, was not proof that he saw Dorsey, because it is not shown where Dorsey was then, or in what position he was. It is as reasonable that he was lying down by the side of the track, as it is that he was sitting upon the end of the ties in the sight of the engineer. The case seems to be on all fours with L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Vittitoe's Adm'r, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 618, with the exception that the person injured there, was a boy twelve years old, and was killed right at a crossing.

The court properly refused to allow the amended petition to be filed in which the plaintiff charged that the railroad company was without title to the right of way; for whether it had title or not it was in possession, and Dorsey was no less a trespasser upon its track because it had taken possession of the ground wrongfully. The cases where railroad tracks have been laid in public highways without right, rest upon a different principle. There the traveler on the highway is not a trespasser, for he is where the traveling public have a right to be.

Judgment affirmed.

PLANTERS BANK AND TRUST CO. v. MAJOR.

(Filed May 27, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Landes & Allensworth and Downer & Russell for appellant.

J. W. Hopkins for appellee.

Appeal from Christian Circuit Court.

Judge Hobson delivered the following response to petition for rehearing:

We have carefully considered the earnest petition for rehearing filed for appellee, but a reconsideration of the case fails to satisfy us the opinion should be modified, without questioning the sincerety of the testimony of Mrs. Major or her father. In view of the way the Girard notes were taken and assigned and the other facts shown, we conclude that the fund is liable for the debts of the husband.

Petition overruled.

LOVITT v. CREEKMORE.

(Filed May 27, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Pleading—A pleading is defective, which, in an action for damages for injuries resulting from a boiler explosion, does not allege that the master could have discovered defects in the boiler by the exercise of ordinary diligence, or that the lessor had fraudulently represented it to be safe; and the court will not anticipate a probable case and, therefore, does not decide what the effect of these averments would have been had they been made.

Sharp & Siler and Tye & Denham for appellant.

O. H. Waddle and R. D. Perkins for appellee.

Appeal from Whitley Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The appellant, Lovitt, was injured by the explosion of the boiler that injured King, who instituted an action against appellee, Creekmore, for damages for the injuries sustained. Both appellant and King were employes of Warren.

This court passed upon King's case in King v. Creekmore, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 1292, and the statement of facts in that opinion and the consideration of the questions of law applicable thereto, obviates the necessity of an elaborate statement of facts and a discussion of the legal questions involved. In the amended petition filed after the decision in the King case, the appellant averred that appellee knew at the time he leased the mill to Warren that the boiler was dangerous and defective and unfit and unsafe for use, until it was inspected, tested and repaired. The appellant did not state a cause of action. If Creekmore had fraudulently represented the boiler to be safe for use and there had been defects in it that Warren could not have discovered by the exercise of ordinary care, and by reason thereof an action could have been maintained against Creekmore by one of Warren's employes who was injured by the explosion of the boiler, the appellant has not shown himself entitled to do so, as no such averments were made. As no such averments are made, the court does not deem it proper to anticipate a possible case and decide it, hence the court does not express any opinion as to what would have been the effect of such averments had they been made.

The judgment is affirmed.

DAVIS, &c. v. J. I. CASE THRESHING MACHINE CO.

HUNDLEY, &c. v. SAME.

(Filed May 27, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Mortgage lien—Equitable defense—Motion to transfer to ordinary docket—The first case is an action to enforce a mortgage on property of the defendant to which defendant pleads fraud in the sale of the machine, and asks a cancellation of the contract or its rescission, and placing the parties in statu quo, which is an equitable defense and asks equitable relief, and the defendant's motion to transfer the action to the ordinary docket was properly overruled.

2. Sale of threshing machine—Breach of warranty—Fraud and misrepresentation—Finding of chancellor—In a defense claiming damages for fraud and misrepresentation in the sale of a threshing machine, and for breach of warranty, where the proof is conflicting, and vague and unsatisfactory as to whether the seller was notified of the alleged defects in the machine, and it was kept and used by the defendant until the notes given therefor were sued on, this court is unwilling to disturb the chancellor's finding on the facts.

3. Common law defense—No consideration—Error not affecting substantial rights of parties—In the second case, while there is a prayer in the answer that the note sued on be cancelled, it is in effect only a plea of want of consideration in the note, and for a judgment for the amount they had paid over and above the value of the property obtained, which is a common law defense, the case should have been transferred to the common law docket on motion of the defendants. But it is provided in the Civil Code, that the court must, at every stage of the proceeding, disregard errors which do not affect the substantial rights of the parties complaining and that no judgment shall be reversed for such errors; and the proof failing to show there was any other warranty except the written one, which the proof shows the defendants themselves did not comply with it, they could not maintain an action on it, and we conclude they were not substantially prejudiced by the form of the trial, for the result must have been the same on either docket.

H. P. Cooper for appellants.

John McChord for appellees.

Appeal from Marion Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

By a written contract of date June 29, 1898, Thomas Hundley and M. Davis bought of the J. I. Case Threshing Machine Co. a twelve-horse engine, separator and stacker, for which they agreed to pay $1,395. They paid all the price but the last note for $465, and the company filed suit on January 17, 1901, to recover judgment on the note and to enforce a mortgage given as security on the machinery and a house and lot. In the meantime, on June 29, 1900, M. Davis and his son, Garrett Davis, had bought of the J. I. Case Threshing Machine Co. a fifteen-horse engine, separator and stacker for $1,435, to secure which they gave a mortgage on that machinery and on M. Davis' half of the outfit which he and Hundley had bought, and also on some personal property of Davis. Suit was filed by the company on January 17th to recover the purchase money for this engine and separator, and enforce the mortgage given to secure it. The two suits were consolidated. This order was proper as a lien was sought in both actions on the same property. On final hearing the court entered judgment in favor of the plaintiff in both cases and the two separate appeals before us are prosecuted by the defendants. As the questions made are different, the appeals will be disposed of separately, the appeal of the two Davises being taken up first. When they filed their answer they moved the court to transfer the action to the ordinary docket. The court overruled the motion, and of this they complain. Whether the court ruled correctly depends upon the defense which they set up. The material allegations of their answer are as follows: "These defendants say that on or about June 19, 1900, they contracted with plaintiff for one J. I. Case fifteen-horse power steam traction engine and separator with weigher, bagger, wind stacker and all appurtenances necessary to make a first class threshing machine and free from defects in all its parts. The machine contracted for was to be new or good as new; it was to do first class work and to be worth $1,435. Under this contract and for such machine which was warranted to be as contracted for, the defendants executed to plaintiff the notes and mortgage sued on, said notes aggregating the sum of $1,435. The machine as contracted for, however, was never delivered to defendants. The machine furnished defendants under the aforesaid contract and described in plaintiffs' petition herein, was not a first class machine, nor was it free from defects. The machine furnished defendants, as aforesaid, was not new or as good as new; it would not do first class work nor was it worth $1,435, or any other sum over $700. Defendants did not know of the condition, value, quality or working qualities of the machine furnished them as aforesaid, until they undertook to fill the contracts which they had made for the threshing season of 1900. After learning of the condition, quality and value of the machine furnished as aforesaid, and before the institution to this action, the defendants tendered said machine back to plaintiff in as good condition as when received, and demanded of plaintiff their notes sued on; and defendants do now and herewith tender plaintiff the said machine in full satisfaction of the several notes herein sued on. Defendants ask the court to cancel each of said notes and mortgage and to require plaintiff to surrender same to defendants and to take back its machine, and ask judgment for their costs herein expended."

Where an equitable defense is pleaded or equitable relief is demanded by the defendant, the court is not required to transfer the action to the ordinary docket.. The cancellation of a contract, or its rescission and the placing of the parties in statu quo, is an undoubted jurisdiction of the chancellor. The common-law court has no power to grant such relief. The answer above quoted plainly sought a rescission of the contract, and when the defendants stood upon their rights to have the contract rescinded they could not, while asking this, also ask a transfer of the case to the ordinary docket, because they were not willing to stand, as shown by their pleadings, and keep the machinery, but desired to have the machinery returned to the seller and the notes and mortgage cancelled. The court, therefore, properly overruled the motion to transfer the action to the ordinary docket, and while the proof is conflicting, in view of the written contract between the parties we are unwilling to disturb the chancellor's conclusion on the facts. The written warranty was as follows: "It is warranted to be of good material, and to do as good work as any made in the United States, of similar style and like amount of use, if properly operated by competent persons, and the printed rules and directions of manufacturers intelligently followed. If purchasers by so doing, after a trial of ten days, are unable to make the same operate well, written notice shall at once be given to J. I. Case T. M. Co.. at Racine, Wis., and also to the agent from whom purchased, stating wherein it fails to satisfy the warranty, and reasonable time shall be given to said company to send a competent person to remedy the difficulty, the purchaser rendering necessary and friendly assistance; said company reserving the right to replace the defective part or parts. and if then the machinery can not be made to fill the warranty, the part that fails is to be returned by the purchaser free of charge to the place where received, and another substituted therefor that shall fill the warranty, or the notes and money for such part immediately returned and no further claim made on the company. Failure to make such trial, or give such notices, in any respect, shall be conclusive evidence of due fulfillment of warranty of the part of said company, and that the machinery is satisfactory to the purchasers; and any assistance rendered by the company, its agents or its servants in operating or in remedying any actual or alleged defect, either before or after the ten days' trial, shall in no case be deemed any waiver of, or excuse for any failure of this warranty."

The written notices referred to were not given. In fact the proof is very vague as to when any notices were given of trouble with the machinery, or of the alleged offer to return the machinery to the Case Co. In cases of this sort, where property is sold under a written warranty, the purchaser must, if he would look to the seller on the warranty, comply with its terms. There is good reason for the rule which requires that the purchaser shall promptly give notice of defects in the machinery and offer to return it if he wishes the contract rescinded. (McCormic Harvesting Machine Co. v. Arnold, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 662.)

The answer of the defendants in the other case is somewhat different. So far as material, it is in these words:

"These defendants say that on or about January 29, 1898, they contracted with plaintiff for one J. I. Case twelve-horse power steam traction engine and separator with trucks, stacker and all appurtenances necessary to make a first class threshing machine of first class make and material. Said machine was to be free from defects in all its parts, and was to be a new machine and worth $1,395. Under this contract for such machine, defendants executed to plaintiff the note and mortgage sued on, together with certain other notes aggregating in all the said sum of $1,395. The machine, as contracted for, however, was never delivered to defendants. The machine that was furnished by plaintiff to defendants and described in the petition and mortgage herein, was not of first class make or material, nor was it free from defects in any of its parts, nor was it a first class machine. The machine furnished, as aforesaid, was not new nor was it worth $1,395, or any sum over $695. The defendants were not machinists and were compelled to and did rely solely upon plaintiff's contract with them, and relying on plaintiff's promises to make good its aforesaid contract, they paid plaintiff on said purchase price the sum of $930, which was $235 more than the machine furnished defendants and described in plaintiff's petition, was worth. Defendants say the machine received from plaintiff, as aforesaid, was not worth more than $695, and these defendants have already paid plaintiff more than the value of the machine furnished them, and defendants now ask that the note herein sued on be cancelled and held for naught. Defendants also ask judgment against plaintiff for the said sum of $235, and for all proper relief.

"Third. Defendants say that a threshing machine as contracted for with plaintiff, as aforesaid, was worth $700 more than the machine furnished defendants as herein stated, and they were damged by plaintiff in the sum of $700 by its failure to furnish them such threshing machine as contracted for and for which the note sued on was executed. And if the court should refuse to cancel the note sued on and give judgment for the defendants as asked for above, then in that event defendants ask judgment against plaintiff for damages in the sum of $700.

"Fourth. These defendants say that they were at all times herein mentioned partners, and as such contracted with plaintiff for a machine and for which the notes and mortgage sued on were executed. Said machine was represented and warranted by plaintiff to be a first class machine in make and material, and free from defects in all its parts, but defendants say the machine furnished them by plaintiff and in controversy was not of first class make or material nor was it free from defects in any of its parts; on the contrary, said machinery was defective in all its parts, particularly in two of its drive wheels and one of its cylinders, and defendants say that as a result of said defects they were deprived of the use of said machinery for threshing and other purposes a great portion of the time during the years 1898 and 1899, and prevented from filling remunerative contracts for the use of said engine and machine during each of said years, and they were thereby damaged in the sum of $700. The defendants say they relied upon plaintiff's aforesaid representations and warranty, and but for which they would not have purchased said machinery, and by plaintiff's breach of said representations and warranty as aforesaid, these defendants were damaged in the sum of $700; and if the court should refuse these defendants the relief asked in the second or third paragraphs of this their answer, set-off and counterclaim, then in that event defendants ask judgment against the plaintiff for damages in the sum of $700 for breach of contract and warranty aforesaid, and pray for all general, special, equitable and porper relief."

While there is a prayer in this answer that the note sued on be cancelled, it is in effect only a plea of want of consideration in the note and for a judgment for the amount they had paid over and above the value of the property received; which is a common law defense. There is also an allegation of a warranty and of $700 damages by reason of the warranty which is pleaded as a counterclaim. This plea is a common-law defense and should regularly have been transferred to the common-law docket on the motion of the defendants. But it is provided in the Code of Practice that the court must, at every stage of the proceeding, disregard errors which do not affect the substantial rights of the parties complaining, and that no judgment shall be reversed by reason of such errors. The plaintiff replied to the answer of the defendant, showing that the property was sold under the written warranty above quoted, and while the defendants attempted in their pleading to rely on an oral warranty, their proof his not sufficient to show that any other warranty was made than that set out in the writing. They gave their own depositions and failed to establish a parol warranty. They did not comply at all with the written warranty and can maintain no action upon it. In fact, it is very plain from the proof that the things of which they now complain, were troubles that did not arise within ten days after they began the operation of the machine. After they had operated the machine a whole season they wrote the company the following letter:

"Lebanon, Ky , November 1, 1898

"We purchased a J. I. Case threshing machine and have run it this season. It has given perfect satisfaction to every one we work for. The J. I. Case beats the world for threshing orchard grass and timothy seed. We made little over an average run with the other machines in this part of the country. I would advise every one that wanted to buy a machine to buy the J. I. Case threshing.

"I am an engineer myself. I have been running different engines for thirteen years. I find this to be the easiest engine to keep up that I ever saw. The J. I. Case compound engine uses less fuel and less water than any other engine on the market today. This engine speaks for itself; all you have got to do is to try it. Any farmer that ever had a J. I. Case to thresh for them will not let any other touch their grain. We threshed a little over 30,000 bushels of wheat. All that we threshed for, want us to thresh again. T. H. HUNDLEY & CO."

This letter was written by appellant Hundley's daughter, in his presence, his engineer, Welsh, who had run the engine that season, assisting her in getting it up. Hundley, from his own testimony, plainly understood at the time the general tenor of the letter. The only trouble alleged was in the engine. The drive wheels became unwelded, there was a sand hole in the cylinder and the pump did not work. The drive wheels are the wheels that run on the ground by which the engine is propelled. When they became unwelded they were first patched at a blacksmith shop, and that proving unsatisfactory, they were sent to the factory and fixed. When the hole came in the cylinder a new one was furnished. A piece of wood had worked into the pump, and this was taken out. These were all the troubles, and from all the evidence we are constrained to the conclusion that there never would have been any complaint about this engine if the second rig had not been purchased. The evidence for the defendant utterly fails to make out a defense under the written warranty as to this engine, and if the case had been referred to a jury, the court would have been required to give the jury a peremptory instruction. We, therefore, conclude that the defendants were not substantially prejudiced by the form of the trial, for the result must inevitably have been the same on either docket

There is more merit in the defense in the other case. The engine there was plainly defective. But it was a second hand engine, bought as such at a reduced price, and sold under a written contract. The purchaser failed to comply with the contract so as to entitle him to relief under it. We can not make a contract for the parties. We can only enforce the contract which they made The writing merged the previous oral negotiations between the parties, and proof of what was said thus in the negotiation is not competent to vary or add to the terms of the written contract with which the trade was closed.

The judgment in each case is, therefore, affirmed.

FIELDS' HEIRS v. NAPIER, &c.

(Filed May 27, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Lands—Resulting trust—Where land belonging to A. F. was sold under a judgment against him in favor of the State and purchased by the State, and subsequently redeemed by him, and, with his consent, conveyed by the State to his son, R. F. F. no use or trust therein results to H. F. under section 2352, Kentucky Statutes, providing that "when a deed shall be made to one person and the consideration shall be paid by another, no use or trust shall result in favor of the latter."

2. Champerty—Adverse possession—H. F. having continued to occupy the land by the consent of his son, and recognized his son's title thereto under said deed, did not acquire adverse possession thereof.

3. Sale and mortgage by son—Father's consent—Estoppel—The son having sold the mineral rights in the land with his father's consent, and in which the father received part of the consideration and having also with such consent mortgaged the land to the bank to secure a debt which he owed it, for which the land was sold and purchased by appellee Napier, the father was estopped to question such acts of his son or the title thus acquired by Napier.

4. Dower—Homestead—The widow of H. F. having never parted with her dower right in the land owned by her husband, is entitled to dower therein, but is not entitled to homestead therein, as homestead can not be claimed against the State.

E. E. Hogg for appellants.

J. J. C. Bach and W. H. Miller for appellee Napier.

Bailey P. Wooten and Jesse Morgan for appellee Virginia Iron, Coal and Coke Co.

Appeal from Perry Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

Henry Fields, now deceased, was sheriff of Perry county, and defaulted. He then owned land, a part of which is in controversy in this suit. The State sued him and recovered a judgment, and in 1874 had an execution levied upon the land and sold, at which sale it became the purchaser. Subsequently the State sold the land to Granville Fields and accepted his notes for the purchase money, with the decedent as surety. Afterwards Henry Fields furnished the money and gave it to his son, R. F. Fields, to pay the State the amounts due under the purchase made by Granville Fields. Henry Fields seems to have been present when the purchase money was paid, although he did not apprise the representative of the State that he was furnishing the money. The auditor of public accounts made R. F. Fields a deed for the land. His father remained in possession of the land until his death, which occurred in 1900. In 1887 R. F. Fields conveyed the mineral rights in the land to Trigg, as trustee. Some time after that he executed a mortgage to the Winchester Bank to secure a note which he owed it. That mortgage was enforced by a judgment of the court, and the land here in controversy was sold to satisfy the debt it secured, at which sale the appellee, S. M. Napier, became the purchaser. The widow and heirs of Henry Fields instituted this action to have the land adjudged to them. Henry Fields died intestate.

They claim, first, that the conveyance of the land to R. F. Fields was procured by fraud; second, that the deed to him and the purchase by Napier were champertous; third, that Henry Fields acquired title to the property by adverse possession. It is denied by the appellees that the deed to R. F. Fields was obtained by fraud or that the conveyances referred to were champertous. They claim further, first, that as Henry Fields paid the money and had the deed made to his son, no trust resulted; second, that he was estopped to question appellees' right to the land. It is evident from this record that Henry Fields was aware that the land had been conveyed to his son, R F. Fields, and that with his knowledge and consent a deed was made to the Olinger negro for part of the tract, and also one to his son in-law for a part of it.

The court also reaches the conclusion that he was aware of the fact that his son had conveyed the mineral rights in the land to Trigg, as trustee, and that he had mortgaged the property to the Winchester Bank. The father had some purpose in furnishing the money to his son to pay for the land. He kept concealed the fact that he had furnished the money. The same reason which induced him to thus conceal the fact that he had furnished the money to his son to pay the State, operated to induce him to have the conveyance made to his son. We reach the conclusion that the conveyance was made by the auditor of public accounts to R. F. Fields with his father's consent.

Section 2352, Kentucky Statutes, provides that: "When a deed shall be made to one person, and the consideration shall be paid by another, no use or trust shall result in favor of the latter; but this shall not result in any case in which the grantee shall have taken a deed in his own name, without the consent of the person paying the consideration; or when the grantee, in violation of some trust, shall purchase the lands deeded, with the effects of another person."

By reaon of this statute no enforcibie trust resulted; however, the son did not deny to his father the existence of a trust, but for a purpose of their own it was the intention of the father and son that it should be understood by other persons that the land belonged to the son; hence there was in no proper sense an adverse claim or possession by the father as against the title of the son. In addition to that, the evidence shows that Henry Fields received part of the money which the son had obtained for the mineral rights which are now claimed by the Virginia Iron, Coal and Coke Co. primarily by virtue of the deed which he executed therefor. It is also shown that Henry Fields said that if his son did not pay the bank, the land would be good for it. In view of the facts of this case, we think Henry Fields was estopped to question the act of his son in conveying the mineral rights and in the execution of the mortgage to the bank, and consequently was estopped to question the sale to Napier under the judgment enforcing the mortgage. His children and grandchildren can have no greater right in the property than he possessed. If he lost his right to the land by his own acts, his children and grandchildren could derive none by inheritance from him.

In view of the conclusion we have reached, that there was no adverse possession by Henry Fields, it is unnecessary to discuss the question of champerty that is raised. Of course if the deed was made to the son with the father's consent, it was not champertous. If he is estopped to question the act of his son in making the conveyance of the mineral rights and the execution of the mortgage, the doctrine of champerty can have no application to the transactions.

The rights of his widow, Louisa Fields, stand upon a different ground from those of his children and grandchildren. She does not seem to have signed any of the deeds to the property, or relinquished her right to dower therein. She is entitled to be assigned dower out of the lands left by her husband, Henry Fields. She never lost her potential right to dower by the sale to the State; hence R. F. Fields never acquired the land as against her right to dower. The homestead act does not apply to the State. (Commonwealth v. Cook, 8 Bush, 220.) She is not entitled to a homestead right in the land, because that right must be derived through her husband. It is a derivative right, and as he could not claim a homestead as against the State, the State acquired title to the property encumbered with the potential right of dower. As the right which the State acquired in the land passed to R. F. Fields, and through him to Napier, the widow is not entitled to a homestead in the land.

The case is affirmed as to all the appellants, except Louisa Fields, and is reversed on her appeal, for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

FARADAY COAL AND COKE CO. v. OWENS, &c.

(Filed May 27, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Agreement to sell land—Agency—An agreement by which B. & Co. undertook to sell certain lands at a named price is not an option, but an agency which may be terminated at any time.

2. Option to sell—Fairly made—Exercised within specified time—Specific performance by grantors—One V. W. was given options by a number of grantors on lands which B. & Co. had been previously authorized by them to sell at a named price, which the said V. W. exercised by giving the grantors notice within the time named in the option and making the payments agreed on. Later, the grantors were induced by B. & Co. and F., to convey their lands to F., who had knowledge of V. W.'s option, and gave the grantors bonds to indemnify them against liability to V. W. Held—That F. was not an innocent purchaser; that V. W. having properly obtained and exercised his option, it operated as a revocation of the contract of B. & Co., and that the grantors should be compelled to perform their contracts under their option to V. W.

3. Homestead—The fact that the vendors lived on the lands and occupied them with their families as homesteads will not excuse them from carrying out their contracts.

4. Reimbursement of purchaser—F. having made payments on his purchase from the grantors, is entitled in equity, to be reimbursed out of the sums which may be ascertained that appellant should pay the appellees respectively.

A. C. Vanwinkle, J. W. Alcorn and Tye & Denham for appellant.

R. C. Crawford for appellees.

Appeal from Whitley Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The appellant instituted actions against the appellees for specific performance of contracts for the sale of land. The cases were heard together as all of them involve the same questions (except the case against Greer), and the questions involved will be considered together, as if there was only one case.

Ballou & Co. entered into contracts with the appellees, other than Greer, which are denominated in this record as options. The appellees had it in their power to produce these contracts, but failed to do so. The appellant sufficiently proved the printed form used by Ballou & Co. in making the contracts with the appellees. The contracts entered into by Ballou & Co. and appellees contained, the same terms as the printed blank, except the names of the parties, the description of the land, and the price at which it was to be sold, were inserted. The printed form reads as follows:

"OPTION AGREEMENT.

"Agreement made this ——— of ———, 1901, by and between ————, party of the first part, and W. R. Ballou & Co., party of the second part,

"Witnesseth: That in consideration of ——— dollars in hand paid, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, and the agreement hereinafter mentioned, said ———— gives to W. R. Ballou & Co. the exclusive privilege for ——— year from date hereof of selling his tract of land in Whitley county, Kentucky, described as follows:

"Said W. R. Ballou & Co., upon their part, agrees with said ————— that they will, to the best of their ability, endeavor to effect a sale of said lands, without charge or expense to said party of the first part, save and except that party of the first part, or assigns, shall have charge, use his best endeavor to aid the said W. R. Ballou & Co. in the sale of the above described lands, by showing all persons sent to view said lands, the lines, corners and improvements of same. Said party of the first part further agrees to furnish abstract of title and make a deed of general warranty for said lands upon demand of said W. R. Ballou & Co., upon sale being made as aforesaid. And all sales or other transfers whatsoever to be made by and through the said W. R. Ballou & Co.

"It is mutually understood and agreed between said parties, that said party of the first part shall retain possession of said lands, and receive all rents and profits from farming or grazing, arising therefrom until sale of said lands as aforesaid. No timber or mineral to be sold from said lands.

"The owner, however, has the right to use all the timber and minerals for his own use."

The contracts with Ballou & Co. were entered into about the 1st of October, 1891, and were to continue in force for one year. The appellee, Finley, was not a party to these contracts, and his connection with the case will be made to appear herein. The appellees owned contiguous tracts of land in Whitley county, Kentucky, and the contracts with Ballou & Co. were with reference to the sale thereof. In April, 1892, John S. VanWinkle, representing the appellant, took options upon the same land, some of which at $9 and some at $8 per acre. By the terms of the options, if he determined to exercise them, he was to give notice to the grantors before a certain date that he would do so, and make certain payments on the land. Before the expiration of the time he notified the parties that he would take the land under the terms of the options, and he made payments of the several sums to the parties respectively, as required by the terms of the options. Thus the matter stood until about the 8th of July, 1892, when the appellees, who had given the options to VanWinkle, were induced by Ballou & Co. and the appellee, Finley, to convey their lands to Finley. The so-called options to Ballou & Co. provided that the parties were to receive $15 per acre for their lands. The appellees were urged to accept from Finley the amount which VanWinkle had agreed to pay them for the land, (except perhaps in one instance where the party received $1 per acre more,) and they did so. The highest amount paid any one of them was $10 per acre, and the lowest $8. Neither Ballou & Co. nor Finley took the land upon the terms prescribed in the so-called options to Ballou & Co. Before the parties would convey their lands to Finley, they were each given bonds by him to save them harmless against any claim or liability growing out of the contracts entered into with VanWinkle. So Ballou & Co. and Finley were fully apprised of the contracts which the grantors had made with VanWinkle. VanWinkle was likewise aware of the contracts that the grantors had made with Ballou & Co.

The principal grounds urged against the specific performance of the Van-Winkle contracts are: First, that VanWinkle practiced a fraud in obtaining them; second, that the Ballou &Co. options were exercised by the conveyance to Finley.

The principal effort which was made to show that VanWinkle was guilty of fraud in obtaining the contracts, was to show that he agreed to take his options subject to the options of Ballou & Co., and as the options did not expressly say that they were subject to the Ballou & Co. options, there was a fraudulent omission to state the terms of the agreement. It is recited in some of the options to VanWinkle that "W. R. Ballou & Co. hold an option upon the land until October 4, 1902." In other options it is recited that "W. R. Ballou & Co. have an option upon the land until October 4, 1902." The court is unable to see any difference in admitting in the options the knowledge of the existence of the options in favor of Ballou & Co., and in saying that they are subject to the options of Ballou & Co. If VanWinkle had notice of the contracts with Ballou & Co., his claim would be subject to their rights. The purpose of embodying into the VanWinkle options the admission of knowledge of the Ballou & Co. options, was intended to obviate the necessity of proving it by oral testimony. Had VanWinkle's options read subject to Ballou & Co.'s options, they would simply have stated legal effect. By the admission of knowledge of Ballou & Co.'s options, he gave his own the effect they would have had with the statement therein that they were subject to their options. This record wholly fails to show that VanWinkle did not act with perfect fairness in obtaining the options.

Ballou & Co. and Finley, as we have said, knew of the VanWinkle options and that he had exercised them and had made payments to the grantors, as required by their terms. Finley is not an innocent purchaser. If Ballou & Co. had the right to take the land under the so-called options, it was at $15 per acre. Instead of taking it at that price, the grantors were induced to convey it at the prices at which VanWinkle had agreed to take the land. If VanWinkle bought subject to the rights of Ballou & Co., he had the right to require them, if they did take the land, to do so at the prices stipulated in the so-called options to them. While the parties went through the form of taking the land under the Ballou & Co. options, it was by new and distinct contracts that Finley obtained the conveyances of the land. The grantors evidently preferred to sell to VanWinkle at the prices he proposed to pay, rather than wait until October 4, 1902, to see the outcome of the Ballou & Co. so-called options. By the options to VanWinkle and his acceptance of them, the appellant, through him, was placed into the shoes of the grantors.

We have considered this case as if the Ballou & Co. contracts were options. They were nothing more than contracts of agencies empowering Ballou & Co. to find purchasers for the land. The authority to sell could have been revoked at any time. The options to VanWinkle and the notice that they were to be exercised, operated as revocations of the contracts of Ballou & Co.

It is urged that it is in the sound discretion of courts of equity to decree specific performance. This is true, but there is no reason why specific performance should not be decreed in this case. The contracts of sale were fairly obtained. The price to be paid was reasonable, and they thought so, because they conveyed to Finley at the same price that VanWinkle agreed to pay for the land. The grantors agreed to furnish abstracts of title and their title papers by which their respective land could be surveyed. This is but a reasonable and fair agreement. The court would not exercise a sound discretion, if it did not require them to carry out their contract with VanWinkle.

Greer had not given Ballou & Co. an option upon his land. He gave one to VanWinkle of the same kind that was given him by the other parties. VanWinkle gave him notice that he would exercise the option and paid him $200 of the purchase money. He insists that he should not be compelled to convey the land, because Van Winkle delayed for an unreasonable time to have the land surveyed. Without going into a discussion of the facts, it is sufficient to say that there was no unreasonable delay upon the part of VanWinkle.

It has been urged that as the vendors lived upon the lands with their families and occupied them as homesteads, they can not be required to carry out their contracts. This court has held that the owner of a homestead can sell and convey it, and that if he sells it and refuses to convey it, the court will compel him to do so. (Brame v. Craig, 12 Bush, 406; Prebble v. Hall, 18 Bush, 67; Gullett v. Arnett, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 1892.)

As Finley has made payments to the appellees on his purchase, in equity he is entitled to be reimbursed out of the sums which may be ascertained the appellant should pay the appellees respectively.

The judgments are reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

UNITED STATES FIDELITY AND GUARANTY CO. v. BOARD OF EDUCATION OF SOMERSET PUBLIC GRADED SCHOOLS.

(Filed May 27, 1904.)

1. Taxation—Graded schools—Repeal of special acts of incorporation—The appellant is surety on the official bond of the tax collector for the years 1899, 1900 and 1901 for the district including the city of Somerset (fourth class) and certain additional boundary embraced in special acts of the Kentucky Legislature of 1888, 1889 and 1890, incorporating the appellee "Board of Education of Somerset Public Graded Schools," who brought this suit on said bond for money not collected and accounted for by said collector. The surety claims, first, that the levy for the year 1899 is void, because the order does not state for what purpose it was made; second, that the levies are all invalid because the special acts under which the appellee was organized, were repealed by the present charter of said city. Held—

First. Order should recite purpose of levy—That the order for the levy of the tax for the year 1899, which is as follows: "On motion, the levy for 1899 was fixed at $1 on every $100 worth of property and $2 for each poll," failing to recite for what purpose the levy was made, not even that it was made for school purposes, is void, and the surety is not liable for any of the taxes for the year 1899.

Second. Special acts in force—Under numerous similar cases cited, the court holds that the special acts under which the appellee, board, was organized are still in force, and the levy for the years 1900 and 1901, made in pursuance of said acts, are valid, and appellant, as surety on the tax collector's bond for said years is liable, not only for the taxes collected, but for that which could have been collected for the years 1900 and 1901.

Bodley, Baskin & Flexner for appellant.

Virgil P. Smith and O. H. Waddle for appellee.

Appeal from Pulaski Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The appellee, Board of Education of Somerset Public Graded Schools, was created by a special act of the legislature in 1888 (Vol 3, Acts 1888, page 500), which act was amended (Vol. 1, page 446, Acts of 1889-1890). By virtue of these acts of the legislature it levied an advalorem tax of $1 upon each $100 of property in the school district and a poll tax of $2. The district is comprised of the territory within, some outside of the corporate limits of the city of Somerset. The levies were made for the years 1899, 1900 and 1901. Hiram H. Gragg was appointed tax collector and was required to give a bond each year as such, which he did, with the appellant as surety. He failed to account to the appellee for all the taxes for the years in question, and made settlements showing the amount due for each year. On his failing to pay over these sums this action was instituted on the several bonds to recover the balances shown to be due from him. The appellant admits the execution of the bonds, but seeks to avoid liability thereon for several reasons, some of which will be made to appear in this opinion.

It is urged that the levy for the year of 1899 is invalid, because it does not state the purpose for which it was made, and that under the doctrine of Greenwell v. Commonwealth, 78, Ky. 322; Whalley v. Commonwealth, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1292, and Commonwealth v. Stone, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1297, it is not liable for the taxes collected and such as were not collected. There is no serious objection to the levies except for the year of 1899. The order making the levy for the year of 1899 is as follows: "On motion, the levy for 1899 was fixed at $1 on every $100 worth of property, and $2 for each poll." The order does not state the purpose for which the levy is made, not even that it is for school purposes. Section 108 of the Constitution provides: * * * "Every act enacted by the general assembly, and every ordinance and resolution passed by any county, city, town, or municipal board or local legislative body, levying a tax, shall specify distinctly the purpose for which said tax is levied." * * *

The appellee was a local legislative body authorized to levy the tax. The court in the City of Somerset v. Somerset Banking Co., 22 Ky. Law Rep., 1132, had under consideration orders making levies substantially the same as the one here under consideration, and held them void. The order in question is void, because it is in disregard of section 180 of the Constitution. In the case of Pulaski County v. Watson, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 61, the order stated the purpose for which the tax was levied, hence that case does not support the position of counsel for appellee. If the order is void, then the collector had no authority to collect the tax, neither had the board the right to accept the bond in question, and for that reason no recovery can be had thereon (bond for 1899.) This conclusion is supported by Greenwell v. Commonwealth; Commonwealth v. Stone, and Whalley v. Commonwealth.

By section 3, volume 1, page 446 of the Acts of 1889-1890, the board has the power to adopt the assessment of the assessor of the city of Somerset as to the property in the city limits belonging to all white persons, and it is made the duty of the assessor of the district to assess the property in the district outside of the city of Somerset. There is a board of equalization of the city to supervise the work of its assessor. By section 14, volume 3, Acts of 1887-1888, page 509, the board of education is authorized to sit as a board of supervisors for the purpose of supervising the tax list. No tax payer is here complaining that the property was not properly assessed, or that the assessment was not properly supervised or equalized. The record fails to show that the law was not fully complied with.

Section 14 of the acts of 1888 provides that "the collector shall be under the same responsibility as sheriffs in the collection of the State revenue," and that his surety shall be liable on his bond "for all money so collected." These two clauses must be construed together to determine the liability of the collector and his surety. The bond which he gave and which the appellant signed as surety does not impose any greater liability upon the surety than is contemplated, by law. It is not only the duty of the sheriff to pay over the money which he collects, but to collect all valid tax receipts placed in his hands for collection. We, therefore, are of the opinion that the bonds executed by the appellant did not purport to impose any greater burden upon the appellant than is authorized by the statute. The appellant is liable not only for the taxes collected, but those which could have been.

It is insisted that the special acts under which the graded school was organized were repealed by the charters of cities of the fourth class. In this view, we do not concur. We have examined the cases of Mayor of Eminence v. Wilson, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 29; Roberts v. Clay City, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 1047; Hickman College v. Trustees, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1272; Trustees v. Vanceburg, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 869; Board of Education of Elizabethtown v. Morris, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1422, and Board of Education of Somerset v. Trustees, 18 Ky. Law Rep., 103, and find they do not support a different conclusion. In some of the cases the court held that the charters of cities of the fifth class did not repeal the provisions of the special acts giving the graded schools the money collected for liquor licenses, because the charter provided that such sums should go into the general fund of the municipalities; hence there was a conflict. The court recognized that special acts establishing graded schools in cities of the fifth class were still in force. The other cases referred to hold that the special acts are still in force. Somerset is a city of the fourth class. Under the charters of cities of the fourth class, it is optional with the cities of that class to maintain a system of public schools. The city of Somerset does not seem to have attempted to establish a system of public schools.

The appellee is entitled to recover on the bonds for the years of 1900 and 1901, and if there is no order except the one in question making the levy for 1899, it is not entitled to recover on the bond executed for that year.

The judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

REUSCH, &c. v. LICKING ROLLING MILL CO.

(Filed May 31, 1904.)

Coasting—Public street—Contact with wagon—Liability of owner—Coasting on a heavy sled on a down grade street in a city is per se, a nuisance, and one who is injured while so engaged by contact with a wagon left standing in the street on a dark night, can not recover damages from the owner of the wagon, on a charge in the petition that such owner, by ordinary care, might have known that the street was used for coasting.

M. L. Harbeson and Pence & Williams for appellants.

S. D. Rouse for appellee.

Appeal from Kenton Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Eleventh street in Covington, Ky., from Girard street eastward to the Licking river is a down grade and is sometimes used for coasting when there is enough snow or ice to permit. On January 5, 1904, the plaintiff was upon a large sled with several other persons coasting down the street about half past eight o'clock, it being then dark. The defendant had left a large four-horse wagon upon the street a short distance east of the crossing, to which no team was hitched, and which was left there to stand over night. The sled ran under the wagon and plaintiff was struck by it, her teeth were knocked out, her chin was shattered, her nose, brow and upper lip were cut, her back was sprained and she received large and ugly scars upon her face, permanently disfiguring her. The street had been used for coasting for many evenings immediately preceding that upon which she was hurt and was so used by a large number of persons that night. The plaintiff alleged in her petition the foregoing facts and sought to recover of the defendant for her injuries.

She also alleged that the defendant well knew and could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have known of the use of the street for coasting on the previous evenings, and on that evening, and that it negligently left the wagon in the street thereby causing her injuries. The court sustained a demurrer to her petition, and she appeals. A city street is constructed for public travel. Any use of the street which renders it unsafe to the traveling public is a nuisance, for the traveling public have a right to pass back and forth upon it and have a right to presume thlat it wil be reasonably safe for this purpose. The large sled loaded with several persons, rushing rapidly over the ice down the declivity in the dark, endangered the safety of every traveler upon the highway in its course. The purposes for which the street was made and for which it was used were incocsistent with such use. The sled loaded as it was, and run over the ice down the declivity, gathering momentum as it went, was per se a nuisance. One who creates a nuisance and is himself injured thereby can not recover. But it is insisted that the defendant is liable because of the allegation that it knew, and by the exercise of ordinary care could have known of the use of the street for coasting. A pleading must be taken against the pleader, and taken all together the allegations of the petition amount only to a charge that the defendant, by ordinary care, might have known the facts. In other words the meaning is that defendant could, by ordinary care, have known the facts and, therefore, knowledge of them is to be imputed to it; for if actual knowledge of the facts was meant to be charged, the allegation that the defendant could by ordinary care have known, was meaningless. Some force must be given all parts of the sentence and it is a fair presumption that a pleading is sworn to in its milder sense; for the pleader selects his own language and will naturally make it as strong as he can, truthfully. The petition as a whole is bottomed on negligence, or the defendants failure to exercise ordinary care to know the facts and remove the wagon from the street. But the defendant was under no obligation to the plaintiff to exercise care for her protection. It is not charged that the wagon was placed at a point at which the defendant knew the street was used by those coasting on it, or that the defendant knew that to leave the wagon where it was, would endanger the safety o those coasting on the street.

The petition is rested on the idea that the defendant negligently placed the obstruction in the street, and while it would be liable for this to those using the street for a proper purpose and in the proper way, it is not liable to one improperly using the street. We are referred to a number of authorities holding that if a man knows that trespassers are using his property, yet if with such knowledge he places a dangerous obstruction in their path, he is liable for an injury to them when they pass along in the dark and are injured without knowledge of the danger. But these cases are not in point, for the reason that it is not averred that the defendant knew that the wagon was standing where it would endanger those coasting on the street, nor is it sufficiently averred that the defendant knew in fact of the use of the street for coasting, at the time the plaintiff was injured. No opinion is, therefore, intimated as to whether the line of authorities referred to would apply to a case like this.

Judgment affirmed.

MONROE, &c. v. PRICE.

(Filed May 31, 1904.)

Homestead—Sale subject to right of homestead—Title thereby acquired—Death of occupant—B. executed a mortgage on 115 acres of land on which he resided with his wife, and in which she did not join. Suit was brought to enforce the mortgage lien, in which B. claimed his homestead exemption, which was conceded, and 64 acres of the land was laid off to him as exempt. The land was all sold for the mortgage debt, but the 64 acres was sold subject to B.'s homestead right therein, and purchased by P., and deed made to P. subject to B.'s homestead in the 64 acres. Upon the death of B. in 1902, leaving no widow or children, the purchaser, P., brought suit for the 64 acres. Held—That under the mortgage in which the wife did not join, no lien was created on the homestead. The judgment in the action to enforce the lien was an adjudication that the mortgage creditor had no lien upon it or right to have it sold, and as B. owned the fee in the 64 acres allotted to him as a homestead, there was no estate in it which could be sold or vested in a purchaser, and no title or interest was acquired therein by the purchaser.

Pendleton & Bush for appellants.

J. Smith Hays for appellee.

Appeal from Clark Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

Eli Bruce owned 115 acres of land in Clark county. In September, 1873, to secure the payment of a debt to James Winn he executed a mortgage on the land. Thereafter he executed a mortgage to Butler Robinson on the same land to secure a debt. Bruce's wife did not join in either mortgage. The appellee, Price, was the owner of the Robinson debt. In 1876 an action was instituted to enforce the mortgage liens. Bruce filed an answer, claiming that he was entitled to land of the value of $1,000 as a homestead. Winn and Price conceded that he was entitled to it. In that action the court adjudged that Bruce was entitled to a homestead in the land and appointed commissioners to allot and set it apart to him. They made the allotment and particularly described it by metes and bounds. The court confirmed their report. After adjudging that Bruce was entitled to the homestead the court ordered the 115-acre tract sold "subject to the homestead right of the defendant, Bruce," to pay the mortgage debt. The commissioner sold it subject to Bruce's homestead right, and the appellee, Price, became the purchaser, and it was conveyed to him subject to Bruce's homestead right. Bruce died in 1902 and did not leave a widow or infant children. The appellee, Price, instituted this action in ejectment to recover the 64 acres which had been allotted to Bruce as a homestead, claiming that he had title to it by virtue of the judgment and sale to which we have referred.

If a debtor executes a mortgage on his homestead in which his wife does not join, no lien is created on it. The creditor acquires no right in it by virtue of the mortgage. (Lear, &c. v. Totten, &c., 14 Bush, 101; Tong, &c. v. Elfort, &c., 80 Ky., 152.) The homestead law does not give the debtor a new estate in the land; it permits him to hold it in fee, that title being protected from coercive sale by his creditors. The owner can sell and convey the land which the law gives him as a homestead. The homestead is not a substantive right that may be granted separate from the fee. No such right exists. These observations are not applicable to the homestead right which the widow and children take, because that is derivative, and the statute authorizes the land to be sold subject to their right of occupancy. Their homestead right does not partake of the nature of a fee simple estate.

The pleadings show that Bruce's wife did not join in the mortgages. Bruce made averments in his answer which shows that he was entitled to a homestead, and the mortgagees conceded his right to it. There was no issue on the question of his right to hold land of the value of $1,000 as a homestead. The court in express terms adjudged that he was entitled to do so. When the court adjudged him the homestead he was not vested with a new estate in it, but it was an adjudication that he was entitled to enjoy that which he possessed. The judgment that he was entitled to the homestead right was an adjudication that the mortgage creditors had no lien upon it, or a right to have it sold. When the court ordered that the 115 acres should be sold subject to the debtor's homestead rights, it did not thereby intend to take from him that which the law allowed him to retain and which the court had adjudged him. When the court ordered that the land should be sold, subject to the homestead right, it did not thereby intend to diminish any right which the debtor had in the property. It was a recognition of whatever right the law allowed him to retain in the land allotted to him as a homestead. It would be a perversion of the meaning of terms to say that, when the court ordered the 115 acres of land sold subject to the debtor's homestead right, that it intended to qualify or limit that right. While the expression was not necessary to preserve the right of the debtor to his homestead, that fact can not justify the court in ascribing a meaning to it which it does not import. There was no claim in the pleadings that the debtor was only entitled to occupy the land during life, as a homestead, as against the right of the mortgagees. Hence if the language employed in the judgment created a doubt as to what the court intended by the expression, we should hold that, as no claim was made in the pleadings that the debtor's homestead right should be qualified by only allowing him the right of occupancy, that the court did not intend to so limit it. However, we have no doubt upon the question. When the court adjudged that he was entitled to a homestead exemption, it adjudged that he was entitled to retain all the rights which, by law, he was vested in the land allotted to him as a homestead. When the court ordered a sale of the land subject to that right, it was a recognition of it, and in effect a declaration that the purchaser of the land could not acquire any interest therein, except one subordinate to that of the debtor. As he owned the fee to that part which was allotted to him as a homestead, there was no estate or interest in it which could be sold or vested in a purchaser; therefore, appellee acquired no title or interest in the land by his purchase. The court has held that where a debtor executed a mortgage in which his wife did not join, that after the enforcement of the mortgage and a sale of the property, the debtor could recover his homestead, the question of his right thereto never having been adjudged.

In Wing, &c. v. Hayden, &c., 10 Bush, 276, the court said: "As to all persons entitled to the benefit of the act its effect is to take away from all courts the power to sell the homestead under a judgment for the sale of land in which the owner has a right to a homestead exemption; and a sale under it can not divest the homestead unless the right to exemption has been waived in the mode pointed out by the statute. The sale simply invests the purchaser with the title, subject to the exemption; and as this is all he buys, the fact that the debtor may subsequently cease to be a housekeeper, or to be entitled to the exemption, will not inure to the benefit of the prior purchaser; he must be presumed to have purchased subject to the exemption; and whether he did or not, he can not enlarge his purchase by subsequent events. He gets what he purchased; but if he be allowed to hold the whole land because the facts which at the time of his purchase exempted the homestead have ceased to exist then he will get what he never purchased, what never was sold, and what was not at the time subject to sale."

The judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

NALL v. WRIGHT'S EX'ORS.

(Filed May 31, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Wills—Advancements—Equalization—Riley Wright having three daughters, by his will, made August 17, 1900, directed that the proceeds of his estate, real and personal, should be equally divided between them; and thereafter, on December 25, 1900, delivered to one of them notes of the value of $4,000, for which said daughter gave him a receipt as follows: '$4,000. Received of Riley Wright four thousand dollars, being part of my interest in his estate. This December 25, 1900. (Signed) Mrs. M. D. Nall. Witness, W. L. Nall." Held—That in the distribution of the testator's estate, the executors should first pay to each of the other two daughters $4,000 out of the estate, and then if there was any balance left, after payment of costs, such balance should be equally divided between the three daughters.

2. Variance—Waiver—The allegation in the petition that $4,000 in money was paid to the appellant which was denied in the answer, and the proof showed that it was not money, but notes, while it may be a variance, which, whether applicable to a case like this or not, we are sure comes within the provisions of section 129 of the Civil Code, that "no variance between pleading and proof is material, which does not mislead a party to his prejudice, in maintaining his action or defense upon its merits."

Lane & Harrison for appellant.

J. W. Lewis and J. Morgan Richardson for appellees.

Appeal from Meade Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

Riley Wright died domiciled in Meade county, Kentucky, leaving a last will and testament, which was admitted to probate, and by which he appointed S. T. Howey and C. A. Montgomery, executors. The decedent left three daughters, Eliza Jane Brown, Margaret Delilah Nall and Adeline Melinda French, who were his only heirs at law. By the second section of his will, he provided as follows:

"I hereby devise and bequeath to my executors, C. A. Montgomery and S. T. Howey, all of my property, real, personal and mixed, and of every kind and description, to be held and disposed of by them as herein provided, and the surplus proceeds of all my property to be equally divided between my three daughters, Eliza Jane Brown, Margaret Delilah Nall and Adeline Melinda French. My executors shall have, and are hereby given, the power to sell and convey any or all of the land I may own at my death, or they may partition and divide the land between my three daughters, setting apart and conveying to each daughter a fair equal one-third thereof. It shall be left to the discretion of my executors whether they sell the land or partition and divide it, my three daughters to share equally in the land, or the proceeds thereof, if the land be sold. * * * During Christmas week of each year after the qualification of my executors, they shall divide equally between and pay over to my three daughters, any surplus money they may have in their hands from my estate. * * *

"I have heretofore given to each of my three daughters a ten dollar gold piece, and I request each of them to keep said gold piece as long as they may live. My three daughters are to share equally in the division of my estate, and none of them is to be charged with, or required to account for, anything received from me."

This will was dated on the 17th day of August, 1900. Afterwards, on December 25, 1900, the testator delivered over to his daughter, Mrs. M. D. Nall, notes due to him aggregating $4,000, and took from her the following receipt:

"$4,000. Received of Riley Wright four thousand dollars, being part of my interest in his estate. This December 25, 1900.

(Signed) "MRS. M. D. NALL.

"Witnessed: W. L. NALL."

After the death of Riley Wright, his executors converted all of his estate into cash, or lien notes equal to cash, and found that it amounted to about $9,000; but before dividing it between the daughters, they ascertained that Mrs. Nall was denying their right to equalize her sisters with her out of the estate of her father before she was allowed to participate in the division; whereupon they instituted this action, setting up the foregoing facts with regard to the advancements to Mrs. Nall, and asking the advice of the chancellor on the subject of their duty in the premises; and this is the sole question involved upon this appeal.

The chancellor decreed that the executors should first make Mrs. French and Mrs. Brown equal to their sister, considering the sum received by her from her father during his lifetime, before she was allowed to participate in the estate, and, after this equality was reached, the balance of the estate, if any, should be divided equally between the three sisters. The material part of the judgment is as follows: * * * "It is ordered and adjudged that in the division and distribution of the estate of Riley Wright, deceased, by the plaintiffs as his executors, the defendant, Margaret D. Nall, shall be charged with the $4,000 advanced to her by Wiley Wright on the 25th of December, 1900, and for which she executed and gave the receipt set out in and filed with plaintiffs' petition, and that it was the intention of said Riley Wright that said Margaret D. Nall should be charged with said $4,000 in the distribution of his property and estate by his executors; and it further appearing to the court that said advancement of $4,000 to Margaret D. Nall was made and paid in notes, and that one of the notes she received was against J. M. Williams and P. T. Noell, who were insolvent at the time she received said note, and are both still insolvent, and that she was unable to collect said note or any part thereof, which note on December 25, 1900, the day she received it, amounted to $494.87 It is now adjudged that the executors pay to Mrs. Margaret D. Nall said sum of $494.87, the amount of said note, upon condition that she return and deliver back said note to the executors as an asset of the estate of Riley Wright, deceased; then the executors are ordered and directed to pay to Eliza Jane Brown and Adeline Melinda French each the sum of $4,000, and then if there is any balance left after payment of costs, etc., they will distribute such balance or surplus equally between all three of the defendants."

From this judgment appellant, Margaret D. Nall, has appealed, executing a supersedeas bond.

The first question by appellant is one of parctice. Appellees, in their petition for the advice of the chancellor, described the advancement made to appellant as the sum of $4,000 in the language of the receipt which she executed and delivered to her father. The allegation of the advancement of $4,000 in money was denied by appellant, and the proof showed that it was not money, but notes instead, which was advanced by the testator to his daughter, and it is claimed that this is a fatal variance for which this court should reverse. Waiving the question as to whether or not the doctrine of variance is applicable to a case like this, we are quite sure that it comes within the provisions of section 129 of the Code, which is as follows: "No variance between pleading and proof is material, which does not mislead a party to his prejudice, in maintaining his action or defense upon the merits. A party who claims to have been so mislead, must show that fact to the satisfaction of the court, and thereupon the court may order the pleadings to be amended, upon such terms as may be just." (Gaines v. Deposit Bank of Frankfort, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 171; Woodcock v. Farrell, 1 Met., 437.)

Section 4840 of the Kentucky Statutes is as follows: "A provision for or advancement to any person shall be deemed a satisfaction in whole or in part of a devise or bequest to such person, contained in a previous will, if it would be so deemed in case the devisee or legatee were the child of the testator; and whether he is a child or not, it shall be so deemed in all cases in which it shall appear from parol or other evidence to have been so intended."

We do not see how it could have been made more clearly to appear that it was the intention of the testator that the notes turned over to his daughter should be deemed an advancement in satisfaction of the devise to her contained in his will, than by taking her receipt declaring such to have been the fact, was as done in this instance; but, if such other evidence was necessary, it sufficiently appears from the provisions of his will with reference to the equality of his daughters in the division of his estate. A perusal of this instrument shows that this equality is its dominant idea. In a short instrument covering two pages of typewritten matter, the testator provided for equality of division of his estate between his three daughters, five separate and distinct times; in no instance does he allude to a division of his estate without setting forth in unmistakable terms, that this division shall be equal. If appellant's contention be correct, she will receive of her father's estate a little more than double the portion allotted each of her sisters. It is true, that the testator provided in his will that none of his children are to be charged with or required to account for anything received from him, but this is in a sentence which recites that he had theretofore given to each of his three daughters a ten dollar gold piece, which he requested they should keep as long as they lived, and in the same sentence he reiterates again "my three daughters are to share equally in the division of my estate." The provisions of the will itself, and the terms of the receipt, conclusively refute the claim of appellant, that her father did not intend the notes given her as an ademption pro tanto of the estate devised to her; in addition, however, the record contains overwhelming evidence of the intention of the testator that his daughter should be charged, in the division of his estate, with the notes received.

It is true, that by the terms of section 4859, "a will shall be construed with reference to the real and personal estate comprised in it, to speak and take effect as if it had been executed immediately before the death of the testator, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will;" but this section must be construed in connection with section 4840, and made to harmonize with the dominant idea of equality, which was the manifest intention of the testator; and, moreover, we think it plain that the equality between the devisees so clearly set forth in the language of the testator, shows that the advancements with which his children were not to be chargeable, were such as he had made prior to the execution of his will.

The record shows that after the advancements to Mrs. Nall of the $4,000 in notes, the testator executed a deed for certain lands belonging to each of his other daughters, at the recited valuation of $4,000, thus making his intention of equality keep even pace with his gifts to his daughters. These deeds Mrs. French and Mrs. Brown declined to accept, on the ground that the land was not worth the sum of $4,000, as recited; whereupon the testator declared his intention to sell the land, and deliver to them the proceeds, but died before carrying out his intention. This fact, alone, shows that the testator did not intend that Mrs. Nall should receive double the portion of his estate received by her sisters.

Upon the whole case, it is manifest that the chancellor correctly adjudged appellant to be chargeable with the advancement received by her from her father, less the value of the worthless note of Williams and Noell.

Whereupon, the judgment is affirmed.

PARSONS v. PARSONS.

(Filed May 31, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Divorce and alimony—Where, in an action for divorce, a judgment was rendered on an agreement entered into between the parties by which the husband was to pay two-thirds of his annual income for the support of his wife and their four children, upon the husband's failure to pay and in response to a rule against him requiring him to do so, where it appeared that he had lost his position; had been unable to obtain any regular employment; that he had suffered a broken leg; had been in an infirmary and that he had no property or means; that one daughter was married, another of age having a government position paying her $40 a month, the third of age and making her living and the fourth a son over fifteen years of age, able to work, it was error for the chancellor to require him to pay two-thirds of his net income. The children are better off than he, and, moreover, a contract on his part to provide for his adult children out of his future earnings will be without consideration. In such case the ends of justice require a reasonable allowance for the wife, taking into consideration the present and probable future earning capacity of the husband.

W. W. Thum and Robt. L. Greene for appellant.

Percy N. Booth for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

On June 2, 1902, appellee, Mary Isabella Parsons, filed suit against appellant, Clarence W. Parsons, on the ground of abandonment.. Proof was taken sustaining the allegations of the petition and on the 12th of June a written contract was made between them, by which he agreed to apply two-thirds of his annual income, not exceeding $2,400 per annum, for the support of his wife and their four children, and to pay the amount to the Louisville Trust Co., as trustee for them. On July 5, a judgment was entered divorcing the parties, to which this is added: "It appearing to the court that an agreement as to future support of plaintiff and the children of plaintiff and defendant has been entered into between the parties to this action and a trustee, which agreement is to be filed herein, this cause is retained for that purpose, and for all such orders as may be necessary and proper in reference thereto."

On October 28, 1902, the plaintiff filed her affidavit and asked a rule against the defendant for not complying with his agreement. He responded to the rule, and on hearing, the court discharged the rule at plaintiff's cost. Again, on November 10, 1903, she filed a like affidavit and obtained another rule against him. To this rule the defendant responded that before the time of the making of the contract referred to, he was in the employment of the city of Louisville as its chief engineer, but had lost his position, and had been unable to obtain any other regular employment; that in January, 1903, he accidentally slipped on the ice and fell, breaking his left leg, and was taken to an infirmary where he remained for a month, and for three months afterwards he was confined to his room; that after he left his room he was on crutches for a month, and was unable to work until the middle of June; that thereafter he had taken two small jobs for which he received gross $580, and had also received $70 for witness fees, making a total of $650 in all; that he had no property or means, and was in debt for his doctor's bills and other things; that out of the $650 received he had paid something over $300 for assistance, tools, and other expenses; that one of his daughters was married and living with her husband; that another was of age and had a government position which paid her $40 a month; that the third was over twenty years of age and earning about $20 a month, and the son, the fourth child, was over fifteen years of age, and had been working with him in the jobs referred to. The third daughter was married pending this proceeding. In view of the changed circumstances of the parties he asked to be relieved from the written contract, and that the court make a reasonable allowance to his wife for alimony. The three unmarried children filed a statement that they did not wish a rule taken against their father; were interested in no way in the case, and desired no action taken on their account, as they expected to support themselves. Notwithstanding this, the court, on final hearing, entered a judgment requiring C. W. Parsons to pay to the trustee $307.32 to be distributed by the trustee in accordance with the agreement of June 12, 1902, this sum being two-thirds of his net income as shown by the record.

The agreement of June 12, 1902, is not by its terms, limited as to time; but it is hard to conceive that the parties contemplated that the husband was to continue to pay two-thirds of his income for the purposes indicated as long as he lived, without regard to the changes of circumstances which might come to the parties in the meantime. It is perfectly apparent that the children are better off than their father, and as able to take care of themselves as he is. He turned over to his wife all the visible property he had. A contract on his part to provide for his adult children out of his future earnings, would be without consideration, and we do not think this is the fair meaning of the contract. So far as the children are concerned, he should not be required now, under his changed circumstances, to make any further provision for them. The proof shows that the wife at the time was keeping a boarding house and the children were boarding with her.

The contract seems to have been made in view of this condition of the family, and not as a permanent arrangement; for the mother's one-fifth of two-thirds of the income might be a very inadequate allowance for her, without the benefit which the contract evidently contemplated she was to receive from the allowance to the children. In view of all the facts, and considering the changed circumstances of the parties, the end of justice requires that a reasonable allowance should be made the wife in lieu of the provision made for her by the contract. In making such an allowance the court will take into consideration the present and probable future earning capacity of the husband, what the wife has received from him, and his financial circumstances.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for further proceedings as herein indicated. The husband will pay the costs in this court, as it appears that the wife is without means.

The judgment on the cross appeal is affirmed.

SCHNABEL, &c. v. WAGGENER.

(Filed May 31, 1904.)

1. Practice—Where money is received under a judgment which was subsequently reversed, it is a well settled rule that restitution can be compelled only from parties to the record, their assignees or personal representatives, and only to the extent that such parties have actually profited by the erroneous judgment.

2. Same—This court not having seen fit heretofore sua sponte to enforce rule three, no motion by appellant in this case having been made either before or after its submission to impose payment of costs upon appellee for failure to file brief, it does not feel warranted in imposing costs upon appellee.

C. B. Seymour and Fred Forcht for appellants.

Gordon & Gordon for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, Second Division.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

This is an appeal from a judgment discharging a rule which sought restitution of money received under a judgment of the Jefferson Circuit Court which was subsequently reversed by this court. The facts of the case are fully recited in the opinion of the court, upon the former appeal, by Judge DuRelle, and in the separate opinion of Judge Guffy, reported in 23 Ky. Law Rep., 234. Upon the return of the case to the lower court it was decided that the infant defendants were entitled to $534, with interest from the 9th of July, 1898, as the value of the homestead adjudged them upon the former appeal. It was also shown that there had been paid to the appellee,

R. C. Waggener, $514.60 from the funds on hand at the date of the former judgment, and upon motion of the infant defendants a rule was awarded against him to show cause why he should not repay into court the full amount of the money which he had withdrawn under the reversed judgment. In his response to this rule, he claimed that he had only received as his pro rata of the fund finally adjudged the infants in lieu of homestead, $158, and that he ought not to be held liable for any greater amount, and paid the sum which he admitted to be due into court. The action having been submitted on the response of Waggener to the rule against him, it was discharged, and a judgment awarding appellants $158 was entered. The defendants excepted to the judgment, and have again appealed, and insist that they should not be driven to collect the full amount allowed to them as a homestead exemption, from the insolvent creditors, but are entitled to have restitution to the full extent of the pro rata received by appellee from the estate of their father upon his debt, upon the ground that their claim for the homestead was a preferred one.

The rule is well settled that restitution on reversal of a judgment can be compelled from only parties to the record, their assignees or personal representatives, and only to the extent that such parties have actually profited by the erroneous judgment. (Gregory v. Litzy, 48 Ky., 489; Morgan v. Hart, 48 Ky., 79; Ball v. Lively, 84 Ky., 371; Outter v. Palmetter, 80 Ky., 241.) We think the trial court properly limited the amount to be paid by appellee to the amount actually received by him as his pro rata of the fund finally adjudged appellants.

It is insisted in the brief of counsel representing appellants, that as appellees delayed from the date of the submission of this case on the 13th of November, 1903, until the 26th of May, 1904, to file their brief, that they should be required to pay the cost up to the latter date. Rule 8 provides that: "In all cases or appeals hereafter filed, or now filed and not submitted, it shall be the duty of the appellant to file his brief twenty days prior to the day the case is set for hearing, and the appellee to file his brief ten days prior to that time; and a failure to do so by the appellant shall cause a dismissal of the appeal without prejudice, and upon the part of the appellee, he will, if in default, be required to pay the costs up to the date of filing his brief."

This court has not seen fit heretofore sua sponte to enforce rule three, and has uniformly refused to dismiss an appeal for failure of appellant to file brief when the motion came for the first time after the submission of the case, and they have also for the same reason refused to impose the payment of cost upon appellee for the failure to file brief, unless motion to this effect was made by the appellant prior to the submission of the cause. As no motion was made by appellant in this case, either before or after the submission of the case, the court does not feel warranted in following the suggestion of counsel for appellant as to cost.

For reasons indicated the judgment is affirmed.

HARRISON, JR. v. WILKERSON, &c.

(Filed May 31, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Taxes—Collection of—Delinquent taxpayer—Where a sheriff, pursuant to section 4241, Kentucky Statutes, seeks to collect by suit delinquent taxes, he is entitled to prosecute such suit without any intervention on the part of the auditor's agent; and where the latter also institutes a proceeding to collect the taxes such action should be dismissed.

2. Same—Where a sheriff had instituted a proceeding for the collection of delinquent taxes, the fact that the clerk failed to issue the summons upon the statement within five days after it was filed, was not material where the delinquent taxpayer had substantially agreed to enter its appearance to the proceeding.

L. J. Moore for appellant.

J. D. & G. R. Hunt for appellees.

Appeal from Fayette Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

Section 4241, Kentucky Statutes, reads as follows: "It shall be the duty of the sheriff or auditor's agent to cause to be listed for taxation all property omitted, or any portion of property omitted by the assessor, board of supervisors, board of valuation and assessment, or railroad commission, for any year or years. The officer proposing to have such property assessed, shall file in the clerk's office of the county in which the property may be liable to assessment, a statement containing a description and value of the property proposed to be assessed, and the value of the corporate franchise, if any, and the name and place of residence of the owner, his agent or attorney, or person in possession of the property, and the year or years for which the property is proposed to be assessed. Within five days after the filing of such statement, the clerk of the court shall issue a summons against the owner to show cause, before the next regular term of the county court, which does not commence within five days after service of such summons, why such property or corporate franchise, if any, shall not be assessed at the value named in the statement filed. The summons shall be executed by the sheriff of the county by delivering a copy thereof to the owner, if in the county, if not, then to his agent, attorney or person in possession of the property. * * * As compensation for his services in causing such property to be assessed, the officer filing the statement shall be entitled to the penalty, which shall be paid to him after the full amount of the taxes shall have been collected." * * *

On November 18, 1902, the appellee, Wilkerson, sheriff of Fayette county, through an attorney, filed in the clerk's office of the Fayette County Court a statement, in which it is in substance alleged that the Lexington Cemetery Co. was the owner of personal property of the value of $43,000, which had not been listed for taxation by the county and State for the year of 1899 and subsequent years. On December 24, 1902, the appellant, J. H. Harrison, Jr., auditor's agent, examined the statement filed by the sheriff, and with knowledge of its contents and purpose, filed in the clerk's office of the Fayette County Court a statement for back taxes against the same company for the years covered by the statement of appellee on the same property, but he stated that the omitted property was of the value of $60,000. Both cases were passed, by an arrangement with the company, until March 20, 1903, when they were consolidated, and a judgment was rendered by the Fayette County Court and the property was assessed at $43,000 for the years mentioned. The taxes and penalty were paid to the sheriff. The appellee refused to pay the penalty to the appellant and this action was instituted to recover it. The question to be determined is, which of the parties is entitled to the penalty?

This question arises from the fact that the auditors' agent sought to supersede the sheriff in his effort to compel the cemetery company to pay the taxes and obtain the penalty which would be his duty, if he succeeded in compelling the cemetery company to list its property for taxation. When the statement was filed by the sheriff, an interview was had with the attorney and president of the cemetery company, and an arrangement was made to allow the proceeding to be postponed until this court disposed of a petition for rehearing in an action in which it had delivered an opinion holding the personal property of the cemetery liable for taxes. The statement filed by the sheriff was a substantial compliance with the statute. The cemetery company entered its appearance thereto and made no question as to its sufficiency. There can be no doubt that the appellee would have been entitled to the penalty, if the appellant had not instituted a proceeding. The statute does not contemplate that both the sheriff and the auditor's agent shall institute proceedings against a delinquent taxpayer. To allow it to be done unnecessarily would harass a delinquent taxpayer and cause unseemly conflict in efforts to collect penalties. If the auditor's agent or sheriff files a statement, he is entitled to prosecute it, and he can not be deprived of his right to collect the penalty by the interference of the officer who might have taken the initiative, but did not do so. The conclusion which we have reached is supported by the reasoning of the court in Butler, Sheriff v Watkins' Ex'ors, 16 Ky. Law Rep., 302.

It is urged that the appellant had the right to institute the proceeding, because the clerk had failed to issue the summons upon the statement filed by the sheriff. The statute made it the duty of the clerk to issue a summons within five days after it was filed, but this he failed to do. This was immaterial, because the cemetery company had substantially agreed to enter its appearance to the proceeding, if the Court of Appeals adhered to its opinion, and as the court did adhere to its opinion, the cemetery company entered its appearance to the proceeding. Because the sheriff was not prosecuting the proceeding with as much vigor as appellant believed he should, did not give him the right to supersede the sheriff by instituting another and similar proceeding.

It is urged that the sheriff had no right to execute the summons, because he filed the statement and was to have the penalty under the law. It is difficult to see what bearing this has on the issue between the appellant and appellee. The proceeding instituted by the sheriff was sustained and the value of the property was fixed at the amount alleged in the statement filed by him. Independent of all this, the statute expressly provides that a summons issued upon such a statement shall be executed by the sheriff.

In argument it was stated that the sheriff could not file this statement through an attorney. It was done by appellee's direction, and was prosecuted to a successful determination. If he chose to employ an attorney to assist him, and pay the fee himself, he had the right to do so. The principle of law invoked by the appellant, that an officer can not delegate to another the performance of a duty requiring the exercise of a discretion, has no application to the facts of this case.

The conclusion we have reached obviates the necessity of determining whether the summons which was issued December 24, 1902, was upon the statement filed by the sheriff, or that filed by the auditor's agent. The mere fact that the two proceedings were consolidated, did not deprive the sheriff of the right which he had acquired to prosecute the proceeding. Instead of consolidating them, the court should have dismissed the one instituted by the appellant.

The judgment is affirmed.

BURKHART v. VINE GROVE COMMON SCHOOL DISTRICT TRUSTEES.

(Filed May 31, 1904.)

Schools — Furnishing fuel for school — Enforcing payment therefor — Where one has furnished coal for use of a common school district for several years, under section 4444, Kentucky Statutes, part of common school law, providing that the "trustees shall assess, and the treasurer collect, a capitation tax of $1.50, or less, on all persons having children attending the school, to pay for fuel, etc.," he is entitled to have a sufficient sum to pay for the coal furnished by him to the school for each year, levied and collected from the patrons of the school for that year, provided the levy for that year did not reach a maximum tax of $1.50. If the full tax has been levied, and there are still debts in excess of it, there is no statutory authority for the payment thereof.

R. L. Stith for appellant.

L. A. Faurest for appellees.

Appeal from Hardin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The appellant, Wm. A. Burkhart, recovered a judgment against the trustee of common school district No. 63 of Hardin county for $68.40, with interest and cost, for coal furnished and used in the school house of the district, on which execution was issued and returned no property found. After notice to the trustee, he brought this action for a mandamus to compel the trustees of the common school district to levy and collect a capitation tax under section 4444 of the Kentucky Statutes, on all persons having children attending the common school of the district, which would be sufficient to realize a sum sufficient to pay off his judgment. The defendants, in their answer, allege that the account upon which plaintiff's judgment was rendered was for coal furnished to the district in separate amounts for each of the years from 1892 to 1902, inclusive, and should have been paid as incidental expenses by a levy of a capitation tax upon the patrons of the school, for the amount furnished during each successive year; that there was a poll tax levied and collected by the trustees from the patrons of the school for each of these years, for incidental expenses; and that no funds arising from such levy and collection for this purpose came into the hands of the present trustees of school district No. 63; that the patrons of the school were not the same as they were for the years in which the coal was actually furnished; and that they had no right or power to levy a tax upon the present patrons of the school to discharge indebtedness incurred in former years. They allege that plaintiff was a trustee for several of the years in which the coal was furnished by him; and that it was his duty to have seen that a sufficient tax was levied to pay the incidental expenses of the school during such years; and that no indebtedness was incurred in excess of the levy for such purpose; and that by his failure and negligence to do so he was estopped from calling upon them as his successors to do so. A general demurrer was filed to the answer by the plaintiff, which was overruled. He thereupon filed a reply, denying the alleged estoppel. A demurrer was sustained to the reply, and declining to plead further, his petition was dismissed.

Trustees of a school district have no power to levy or collect taxes unless expressly authorized to do so by statute. Section 4440 of the Statutes, authorizes them to levy and collect a tax for the erection and equipment of a schoolhouse and for repairs thereto. Section 4441 to pay indebtedness previously incurred in the erection and furnishing of a schoolhouse. But neither of these sections authorize the levy of a tax to pay incidental expenses. The only other section of the school law, which authorizes the levy of a tax, is section 4444, which reads: "Unless there are sufficient funds on hand which may be used to pay the contingent expenses, incident to conducting the school comfortably, the trustees shall assess, and the treasurer of the district shall collect, a capitation tax of $1.50, or less, on all persons having children attending the school of the district, the same to be collected as provided in section 4443, and used to pay for fuel and other things needful to keep warm, clean and comfortable the house where the school is conducted."

Under this section, the cost of keeping the schoolhouse warm, clean and comfortable must be paid by persons having children attending the school at the time. The answer filed in this case does not allege that the capitation tax of $1. 50 was levied and collected for each of the years in which the plaintiff furnished the coal to the district, but only that a capitation tax was levied for that purpose. It was plainly the duty of the trustees to have levied and collected a sufficient tax upon persons having children attending the schools for each year, sufficient to have defrayed the necessary expenses, and if as a matter of fact, they failed to do this, then plaintiff is entitled to have a sum sufficient to pay for the coal furnished by him each year to the school, levied and collected from the patrons of the school for that year, provided the levy for that year did not reach a maximum tax of $1.50. Of course, if the full tax was levied, and there was still debts in excess of it, there is no statutory authority for its payment. But appellant is entitled to be paid for his coal by the patrons of the school at the time it was furnished, if it is practicable to do so under the statute.

For reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with instructions to allow plaintiff to amend his petition, setting out definitely the amount of coal furnished each year, and the persons having children attending the school for such year, and for other proceedings consistent with this opinion.

BURCH v. NICHOLAS, &c.

(Filed May 31, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. In this action seeking to have a deed declared a mortgage, the judgment of the chancellor decreeing the relief sought will not be disturbed, where the proof shows the parties executing the paper were ignorant negroes who thought the relation of attorney and client existed between them and the person who drew the paper; and it appearing from the proof that the property was worth considerably in excess of the consideration named in the paper.

2. Same—It is the policy of the law to relieve against contracts made by a person with an attorney, where the confidence induced by the relation of attorney and client, probably threw such person off his guard.

W. T. Burch for appellant.

Gardner & Moxley for appellees.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, Second Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

On August 25, 1900, Emma Nicholas and her husband conveyed to Virginia Burch, in consideration, as recited in the deed, of $110, cash in hand paid, and $850 to be thereafter paid to Rosa Ostreicher, a house and lot in Louisville conveyed to Emma Nicholas by Rosa Ostreicher on December 2, 1899. Nicholas and wife on November 8, 1901, filed this suit against Virginia Burch to have the deed declared a mortgage, and the court having so adjudged, she appeals.

The proof shows that W. T. Burch, the husband of appellant, is an attorney-at-law, and as such had represented the husband of Emma Nicholas in some legal proceedings previous to her purchase of the property in contest from Rosa Ostreicher, and he was the attorney of Emma Nicholas in the purchase of the property and in the making of a payment on it after the purchase. She contends that he continued her attorney throughout. He contends that the relation of attorney and client had ceased before the deed to his wife was made, and that the transaction with her was deliberately had and fully understood. While we do not doubt the sincerity of the testimony of Burch or his wife, we think the chancellor properly, under all the facts and circumstances, adjudged the deed to be a mortgage. Emma Nicholas and her husband are negroes; neither of them can read nor write; neither of them appears really to have understood in fact, the transaction. They had bought the property for $650, and it was worth something more than that; they evidently regarded Mr. Burch as their attorney, although he thought the relationship had ended, and in view of all the circumstances and the ignorance of Nicholas and his wife, the chancellor properly refused to hold the deed an absolute conveyance of the property. It is the policy of the court to relieve against contracts made by a person with an attorney, where the confidence induced by the relation of attorney and client probably threw a party off his guard, and thus induced him to make a contract which he did not really understand, and would not otherwise have made. The law justly holds the attorney to a strict standard in his dealings with his client, and this rule must be applied where the person dealing with the attorney acts under the impression that the relation of attorney and client exists between them, although the attorney may not so understand, and may intend no wrong. The judgment protects appellant in the money she paid out, and under all the evidence, the chancellor's conclusions on the facts will not be disturbed.

Judgment affirmed.

SMITH, &c. v. CORNETT, &c.

(Filed June 1, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Conveyances—Construction of deed—Where the heirs of one dying intestate, conveyed their interests in the land left by him, designated as that "being in Harlan county on the Poor fork of Cumberland river," such conveyance does not include their interests in decedent's land on Clover fork, which was owned by decedent, but which fact was unknown at the time to them and the grantee. The general rule of construction being that the general description in a deed must be controlled and limited by the specific description, and where a deed is limited to a specific description, land not embraced therein can not be included, although those conveying own land in another boundary belonging to their decedent's estate.

Clay & Hardin and J. G. & J. S. Forrester for Leonard Smith, &c.

W. F. Hall and R. L. Greene for Jonathan Cornett.

Appeal from Harlan Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

In 1862, John H. Smith, then a resident of Harlan county, Kentucky, died intestate, the owner of two tracts of land in that county; one tract of about 800 acres lying on the waters of Poor fork, which was improved land, and known as the home farm; the other track of about 1,000 acres, lying on the waters of Clover fork, and was then wild and unimproved land. These tracts were divided by the crest of what is known as Big Black Mountain, and also separated by a survey of 2,800 acres, known as the John Lewis survey. All this land lies within a patent of 17,200 acres, patented to Boyd Dickerson, but the deceased held a patent to himself for 500 acres which was also inside of the boundary of the tract on Poor fork. The title to the 500 acres was superior to the Dickerson patent. He purchased from Dickerson land on Poor fork to square up his farm, which made up the 800 acres, Dickerson at the time executing to him a bond for the title. It was afterwards ascertained that this title bond covered and included the 1,000 acres of land on Clover fork. Smith left surviving him eight heirs—seven children and one grandchild. Jonathan Cornett married one of the daughters, and Ambrose Powell married another. Cornett and Powell administered on his estate, Cornett taking charge of the papers belonging to the decedent, and transacted most of the business in the settlement of the estate. Soon after they administered, Cornett began to purchase the interests of the children in the real and personal estate of the decedent, taking from them writings showing that fact. In the year 1885, the appellants, Leonard Smith, Clarinda McDaniel and her husband, Wm. McDaniel, James B. Smith and Jonathan L. Smith, conveyed their interest by deed to appellee, Jonathan Cornett. The appellee on cross appeal, Leonard Smith, conveyed his interest to Jonathan Cornett on the 27th day of December, 1867. Appellee in the cross appeal, Emily Hoskins, who was Emily Short, an only child of a daughter of the decedent, never did convey her interest to Cornett, but Cornett claimed her interest by an alleged purchase from her father when she was an infant.

The appellants on the original appeal and appellees on the cross appeal, brought this action against Jonathan Cornett for the recovery of their interests in the 1,000 acres survey of land lying on the waters of Clover fork, alleging that the deeds made by them to Cornett only covered and included their interests in the 800-acre survey on the waters of Poor fork.

Cornett answered, traversing the allegations of their petition, claiming that the conveyances to him covered and included all their interests in both surveys, and also pleaded adverse possession and the statute of limitation.

The deed of Leonard Smith of date 1867, describes the land in which he conveys his interest, as follows: "All of the interest in the land owned by John Smith, deceased, with all the appurtenances to the same belonging, situated in Kentucky in said county, on the Poor fork of Cumberland river adjoining the land of John Lewis."

The deed of appellants on the original appeal describes the interest which they conveyed as follows: "All their interests in the real estate of John H. Smith, deceased, for and in consideration of the sums respectively named, etc., it lying and being in Harlan county on the Poor fork of Cumberland river, and bounded with the line of said tract of land."

The general rule of construction is, that the general description given in a deed must be controlled and limited by the specific description. This deed specifically describes the survey of Poor fork and shows of itself that the intention was to convey all their interest in this particular survey to Cornett. If they had intended to convey more, the words "on Poor fork of Cumberland river" would have been omitted, or the words "on Clover fork" would have been added.

It appears from the record, without consideration, that the agent or attorney in fact of Dickerson, had conveyed to the decedent, John H. Smith the land described in the title bond of Dickerson to Smith, but this fact was not known to any of the children or heirs of decedent until long after Cornett had bought their interests in what they all understood to be their interest in the home or Poor fork farm. The land on Clover fork was separated from the Poor fork farm by the crest of the Big Black mountain and the John Lewis 2,800 acre survey, and was in the woods and wild land. Appellee Jonathan Cornett did not know that the children and heirs of John H. Smith owned an interest in any land on Clover fork, as shown by his own testimony, until after he had purchased all their interests.

We are of the opinion that the language contained in the deeds only conveys to Cornett their interest in the Poor fork survey, and it was certainly not their intention to sell and convey their interests in lands they knew nothing of; and Cornett surely did not intend to buy or think he was purchasing interests in lands which he did not know his vendors owned. These facts make our construction of the deeds certain, if it needed any evidence other than the language used.

After Cornett obtained these conveyances, he found among the papers of the deceased the title bond of Dickerson which covered the Clover fork 1,000 acres, and he instituted an action in the Harlan Circuit Court against the heirs of Dickerson for the purpose of getting title to himself. The court granted his prayer and caused the commissioner to convey to him the title to the Dickerson survey. He now claims that this having occurred more than ten years prior to the bringing of this action that it is a bar to their claim. We can not agree with him in this. The children and heirs of deceased Smith were not parties in any way to that action, and they are not bound thereby. His obtaining the title from Dickerson to himself must be regarded as his holding it in trust for the heirs of Smith. His claim of adverse possession and the plea of limitation is without any foundation, as this survey of 1,000 acres has never been in the adverse possession of any one, it being wild and unenclosed land.

Wherefore, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed on the cross appeal and reversed on the original appeal, and the cause remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

GILL v. LANE.

(Filed June 1, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Partition of land—Joint owners—Indivisible without impairing value of the whole tract—It appearing from the pleadings and proof that the tract of land jointly owned by appellant and appellee, containing 578 acres, on which is located a popular summer resort known as Olympian Springs, with the buildings attached thereto; that the land is unproductive for agricultural purposes and can not be divided into two equal parts without injury to the whole tract, the chancellor properly adjudged a sale of the entire tract upon the petition and prayer of the appellee, and an equal division of the proceeds of the sale.

Reuben Gudgell & Son and Hazelrigg & Chenault for appellant.

C. W. Goodpastor for appellee.

Appeal from Bath Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

The appellant, George C. Gill, and the appellee, James W. Lane, are the joint and equal owners and in possession of a tract of land lying in Bath county containing 578 acres. Upon one side of this tract is situated the celebrated "Olympian Springs," a popular watering place and summer resort.

The most celebrated of the mineral waters on this land is the well-known salt sulphur well, which is said to contain an inexhaustible supply of water, possessed of great medicinal properties. Upon the grounds contiguous to the salt sulphur well is a hotel building, also cottages, and other improvements suitable for a summer resort. The well is the most valuable thing belonging to the land; in fact, the soil itself is sterile and unproductive,

Since appellant and appellee have been the owners of this property, they have been renting it to parties engaged in keeping hotels, and such places of public resort for health and recreation. But having come to the conclusion that the property was not yielding sufficient profits on the amount invested therein, and failing to agree upon a satisfactory division thereof, this action was instituted by appellee in the Bath Circuit Court to obtain a decree for the sale of the property, and an equal division of the proceeds.

It is alleged in the petition "that said tracts of land are very valuable and worth a large sum of money; that the chief sources of their value are the numerous mineral springs distributed over them; that without said mineral springs said tracts of land would be of little value; that the land is not productive, and, therefore, not well qualified for agricultural purposes; that said property has been used as a summer resort because of the healthful mineral springs aforesaid, for more than fifty years, and is now so used, and can not be divided without materially impairing its value; that the plaintiff desires a sale of the whole thereof because a division thereof would render the interest of each joint owner of little value."

In his answer the appellant, Gill, admits that the property is very valuable, chiefly because of the numerous mineral springs distributed over the same, but denies that without the mineral springs the land would be of little value. It is also denied in the answer that the land is indivisible, or that such division can not be made without materially impairing its value; for which alleged reason appellant resisted any sale of his one half interest, and asked that the land be partitioned between him and appellee by commissioners of the court. A number of depositions were taken by each of the parties as to the value of the property, and whether or not it could be divided between the owners into two equal parts in value.

The lower court appointed three commissioners to make the partition, and by its order gave them directions as follows: "They will proceed to make partition and allotment of the real estate mentioned and described in the petition and exhibits of this case, if the same can be made into two lots or parcels of equal value, and allot one to the plaintiff, J. W. Lane, and the other to the defendant, George C. Gill; that in making such partition and allotment, the commissioners shall take into consideration the facts as to whether the said property can be partitioned without materially impairing its value as a whole, or whether or not the interest of one of the joint owners will thereby be rendered of less value than the interest of such joint owner in the whole tract; that if such partition can not be made, they will so report, with their reasons therefor."

Thereafter the commissioners filed their report, which, omitting the formal parts as to having been sworn, the time of their meeting, etc., is as follows: "That they had carefully examined the property described in the petition and find that it is impossible to divide same between its joint owners without materially impairing its value, and hence we did not divide it. The chief value of the property is due to the salt sulphur well, or spring, near which all the buildings are located. Were it not for the salt sulphur well, the buildings would add but little value to said property. The land is unfertile and unproductive. If a portion of said land which could be sold for one-half as much as the whole tract could be sold for, were allotted to one of the joint owners, the other portion could not be sold for a sum anything near as much as one-half of what the whole tract could be sold for. Or, if we had allotted to one of the joint owners a portion of said land equal in value to one-half the value of the whole thereof, the remainder would be of far less value than the value of one-half of the whole."

To this report a number of exceptions were filed by appellant, all of which were overruled by the court, and the report confirmed. Thereupon, a decree was entered directing a sale of the whole property, and a division of its proceeds equally between the owners, the court being of opinion that the property could not be divided without materially impairing its value. The appellant insists that the property could have been divided without materially impairing its value, and that it was error for the lower court to adjudge its sale. It appears from the evidence that the property in controversy is worth not less than $16,000, but independently of the salt sulphur well it is worth from $5 to $7 per acre. The land is of little value for agricultural purposes; in fact, nearly all of the witnesses testified that it is unproductive. R. E. Hazelrigg, one of the witnesses introduced in the case, and who now lives upon the property in question, testified that he had lived there and kept the springs as a watering place since 1897, and that outside of thirty acres, including the springs with improvements, the value of the land would not exceed $6 an acre; that the land is very unproductive; that he had cultivated it for the last five years and had been unable to get an average of three barrels of corn per acre therefrom; that it would not produce wheat, tobacco, or oats, but he had known it to produce a fair crop of millet. Of the eleven witnesses introduced by appellee, all testified that the property in question could not be divided without materially impairing its value.

The appellant took the depositions of four witnesses as to the value of the property, but none of them were asked, or testified, as to whether the property could or could not be divided without materially impairing its value. They merely testified that the property could be divided into two parcels of equal value. If the whole property is worth $16,000, of which there can be no doubt from the evidence, and its chief value is due to the salt sulphur well and the improvements near it, and the outlying portion if sold alone is worth from $5 to $7 an acre, it would seem impossible to so divide it between its joint owners that the portion of each would be worth $8,000, or could be sold for that sum.

Section 490, Civil Code, provides that "a vested estate in real property jointly owned by two or more persons may be sold by order of a court of equity, in an action brought by either of them, though the plaintiff or defendant be of unsound mind or an infant, first, if the share of each owner be worth less than $100; second, if the estate be in possession and the property can not be divided without materially impairing its value, or the value of the plaintiff's interest therein."

We are of opinion that the appellee has brought his case up to the requirement of the section of the Code supra, in that he has alleged and proved that the property in controversy can not be divided without materially impairing its value. It follows, therefore, that the court below did not err in adjudging that it be sold as a whole.

In the case of Tolbert v. Campbell, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 2199, this court, speaking through Judge O'Rear, said: "We hold, that unless it is made to affirmatively appear that the property is indivisible without materially impairing its value, it would be error to adjudge its sale as an entirety. The owner of each share is entitled to hold his property subject only to the rights of his co-tenants. If indivisible, it would be unjust to the other tenants to compel them to suffer sacrifices to gratify one joint owner's whim or claim to personal use of the identical property."

In Kean v. Tilford, 81 Ky., 606, it was also said by this court: "Under this provision of the Code (section 490), it is insisted by counsel that an objection by any one of the joint owners will prevent the sale of his share, regardless of the rights of the other parties in interest. The objection can only prevail, as we construe this provision of the Code, when a division can be had without materially impairing the value of the property, or of the plaintiff's interest in it."

We see no reason why the chancellor has not full power to adjudge a sale when the proof, as in this case, brings it within the provision of the Code.

Wherefore, the judgment is affirmed.

STEINWENDER-STOFFREGEN COFFEE CO. v. F. T. GUENTHER GROCERY CO.

(Filed June 1, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Contracts—In a contract entered into between appellant and appellee by which the former was to ship its coffees to the latter and canvass the latter's territory with a resident salesman so long as it is to the mutual interest of the parties to do so, such contract was not binding, because by its terms the appellee could have given up the sale of the coffees, nor was the appellant compelled to furnish any specified amount of coffees; and in an action by the appellant for coffee which the appellee had sold on commission, it was error to award damages upon a counterclaim on the ground that appellant had refused to ship appellee a certain brand of coffee.

Powers & Anderson for appellant.

J. D. Atchison for appellee.

Appeal from Daviess Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

The appellant instituted this action against appellee for $160, the price of coffee furnished appellee for sale on commission and which it had sold. Appellee answered, admitting this indebtedness, but made its answer a counterclaim and asked for $850 damages for the breach of an alleged written contract which it claimed had been made and entered into between it and appellant for the sale and delivery of coffee to it from time to time by appellant. The alleged written contract is as follows:

"Owensboro, Ky., July 16, 1902.

"We have arranged with the F. T. Guenther Grocery Co. to handle our line of coffees over the territory traveled by them from Owensboro, Ky.

"We will fully canvass their territory on arrival of shipment, and will continue a resident salesman in said territory so long as it is to our mutual interest that special work should be done in order to keep the goods in the hands of our customers, and said salesman is to work exclusively on our roasted coffees, through the F. T. Guenther Grocery Co. It is understood that the F. T. Guenther Grocery Co. are to co-operate with our salesman to the best of their ability. We will ship a line of our coffees of our selection, and it is further understood that should any of this, or after shipment of several grades, prove unsalable, we will transfer them to other territory for our account, same to be placed to the credit of the F. T. Guenther Grocery Co., or should any become unmerchantable through age, or any cause, we will replace the same with similar perfect goods, or goods suited to their market, or credit the same to their account at the net cost to them, and should the F. T. Guenther Grocery Co. desire giving up our line, we will relieve them of the same at the net cost of all coffees they may have in stock and order disposal.

"Terms, 10 per cent. trade discount and 2 per cent. ten days."

This was signed by the agents of the parties.

A trial was had and the jury returned a verdict for $200, deducting appellant's claim, and the court gave the appellee a judgment for the difference, and appellant has appealed. Appellee alleged that appellant had violated this contract in this: That about fifteen months after the date of it, appellant, without any cause, refused to ship it any more coffee of a brand known as "Old Glory;" that it had spent considerable time and means in advertising and introducing this brand to the trade, and had established a good trade for it, and introduced evidence to the effect that, in the opinion of the witnesses, they could have sold enough of this brand of coffee within the next twelve months after the alleged violation of the contract, the profit on which would have netted them the sum sued for.

Appellant controverted the claim of appellee, and contends that the paper or writing referred to was not a contract and not binding upon either of the parties, that it was simply an agreement between the parties for the conduct of business, to be terminated at the will of either party. And even if it amounted to a contract and had been binding upon the parties, that the evidence produced by the appellee did not authorize a recovery; that the mere opinion of witnesses that what they believed they could have made in the way of profits for a succeeding or ensuing twelve months from the sale of coffee, if the same had been furnished, was too uncertain and indefinite to authorize a recovery.

Contracts which are valid must be mutual and binding upon both parties. We have examined this paper with care, and have been unable to find anything binding upon the appellee. It was not compelled to perform any stipulation, and by the writing, the appellee could at any time have given up, without hurt or injury to itself, the sale of these coffees, and it was not compelled to make the first or any subsequent orders for coffee. Nor was the appellant compelled to furnish any specified amount of coffee, nor was there any specified length of time during which it offered or proposed to furnish appellee coffee. As we have said, it is a fundamental principle of law that there must be mutuality in every contract. If one of the parties is not bound, then the other is not. It is true that prior to the withdrawal by appellant of its offer to furnish coffee to appellee, every time appellee sent to appellant an order for coffee, appellant was bound to fill that order; because by sending in an order the appellee accepted the standing proposition of appellant and the proposition or offer was turned into a contract to ship and deliver the specific amount of coffee thus ordered.

On the 19th of October, 1903, appellant notified appellee that it would not furnish it any more coffee, and thereafter did not; and though appellee did, after that time, request appellant to furnish it coffee, and was ready, able and willing to pay therefor, yet, as appellant had never agreed to furnish appellee any definite amount of coffee, in any definite time, nor at any definite price, and as the appellee on its part had never agreed to accept any definite amount of coffee in any definite time at any definite price, but had expressly reserved the right to refuse to take coffee, or order it whenever it pleased to do so, it was clearly the right of appellant to refuse to furnish any more coffee to appellee, after notice of its withdrawal of the proposition to further furnish appellee. To hold that appellant was liable on such an arrangement as the appellee calls a contract, would be to hold that there can be such a thing as a contract although it is lacking in mutuality. (Bishop on Contracts, Enlarged Edition, sections 78, 80; 24 L. R. A., 857; 105 Fed. Rep., 869; 114 Same, 77; and 57 L. R. A., 696; Cyc. Law and Proc., volume 9, 248 and 327.) On page 327 of the reference last named, it is said: "There are many cases in which the offer is definite enough, yet the accepter, by merely accepting, has really himself promised nothing in return, has not made himself liable for anything, so, that, although one is bound, the other is not, and the engagement lacks what is called mutuality; in such a case there is not an enforceable agreement. The most frequent example of this principle is when one offers to supply another with such goods of a certain kind as he may choose to order or may wish during a certain time, and the other accepts the offer. Here there is no consideration for the promise or offer, for the promisee has not bound himself to anything, and has incurred no legal liability at all."

We are of the opinion that the principles as stated herein are peculiarly applicable to the case at bar, and the appellant was not liable for failing to furnish coffees, at least after it had notified the appellee that it declined to furnish other coffee under this proposition. If the appellant's profits on the coffees furnished him for the fourteen or fifteen months in which he sold it, did not remunerate him for the trouble and expense he was put to in advertising and introducing it to the trade, and he sustained a loss, it was occasioned by his own neglect in his failure to obtain a valid contract. Entertaining these views, we deem it unnecessary to discuss the other questions presented on this appeal.

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

COURT OF APPEALS OF KENTUCKY.

GEDGE v. CITY OF COVINGTON.

(Filed June 1, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Street improvements—In an action by a city of the second class to enforce a lien for street improvement which was made at the instance of more than two-thirds of the abutting property owners, the ordinance directing the work, letting the contracts, accepting the work, having been regularly passed, the fact that the city exceeded its authority in attempting to guarantee the payment of the bonds by pledging its faith and credit, can not operate to relieve the lot owner of the cost of the improvement. The city acts as a sort of trustee for the collection of the assessments and can not apply this money to any other purpose than the payment of the debt.

Myers & Howard for appellant.

M. H. McLean and Wm. McD. Shaw for appellee.

Appeal from Kenton Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

This suit was brought by appellee, a city of the second class, to enforce a lien for a street improvement, which was made at the instance and upon the petition of more than two thirds of the abutting property owners. The ordinance directing the improvement and letting the contracts and accepting and approving the work are conceded to have been regularly passed.

Upon the petition of the property owners the city adopted, under section 3101 of Kentucky Statutes, what is known as the ten-year plan of paying for the improvement, that is, one-tenth of the cost of the improvement was to be paid each year by such of the property holders as did not pay in cash. The installments were to continue for ten years, with interest until the total cost was paid. The city issued its bonds and sold them for a sum sufficient to pay the total cost of the improvement, pledging the faith and credit of the city as well as the sums raised by the special assessments provided for in the ordinance under the section of the statute above named, to pay the bonds at their maturity. The money so raised was used in paying the contractors who did the work. It is admitted that the improvement was not.

ordered as the result of a vote at an election at which the proposition was submitted, and it is claimed that the liability, being one in excess of the revenues of the year in which it was contracted, was, under section 157 of the Constitution, the city's undertaking, and was invalid and void; that the property holder is not liable to the city because the city is not liable to its bondholders; that the contractor has been paid by funds realized by the sale of void bonds, and that thereby his lien has been discharged; that, as the holders of the bonds can not enforce the obligations against the city, the city has no lien upon the lots, for the improvement has not cost the city anything. It is also claimed that the city does not intend to pay the bondholders the liability incurred for this improvement, and that it will use the money collected from these assessments for general purposes, and that this would be and is an unauthorized collection of taxes against the lot owners.

In City of Covington v. McKenna, 99 Ky., 508, relied on by appellant, it was decided that such an obligation is void so far as it purports to impose a personal liability upon the city; that was the only point before the court for decision, or that was decided in that case. In the later case of City of Covington v. Nadaud, 103 Ky., 455, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 151, it was held that after such an improvement had been made, although the city was not personally liable for it, the lot owner was. To the same effect is the more recent case of City of Catlettsburg v. Self, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 164.

The attitude of the parties may be summed up thus: The city has regularly, and in pursuance of the power conferred by statute, authorized the improvement of the street at the proper cost of the abutting lots. The owners of the lots have asked that under a favorable provision of the statute they be permitted to pay this cost in ten annual installments instead of one, and that the city issue such an obligation representing this cost, as would procure the extended time of payments. The city has done what it was requested to do by the persons most directly concerned, and what by statute it was authorized to do. In addition the city undertook by guaranteeing the payment of the bonds and pledging its faith and credit, a personal liability, which, under the Constitution, it was prohibited from doing in the manner in which it was done. This last undertaking is admittedly void, but how that can operate so as to relieve the lot owner or his property of its charge for the cost of the improvement, we are unable to see. The city, in collecting these assessments, acts as a sort of trustee for the person to whom they are ultimately payable. The fund so collected is in reality, by the terms of the statute, a trust fund, set apart solely to the discharge of the debt made for that improvement. The city can not legally apply this money to any other purpose than the payment of that debt. The city's creditors can not be affected in their legal rights by any contrary purpose or intention of the city administrators.

The judgment is affirmed.

RUBY CARRIAGE CO. v. KREMER.

(Filed June 3, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Sales of personal property—Damages—In an action by the purchaser of a vehicle against the seller for damages, it being alleged in the petition that the seller represented the vehicle to be of high grade and excellent workmanship, the answer failing to traverse that allegation and the evidence showing the vehicle to be so defective in material and workmanship as to be totally unfit for the purposes for which it was purchased, a judgment for the purchase price of the article will be upheld.

2. Pleading—It was not error to overrule a motion for a judgment non obstante veridicto on the ground that no reply was filed controverting an amended answer which only sets out matters of defense with greater particularity than was done in the original answer, all of which were denied by the reply.

John Barret and Chas. L. Taylor for appellant.

Chatterson & Blitz for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

This is an appeal from a judgment for $215 recovered by appellee of appellant in the court below for the purchase price of a buggy which the latter had sold him, but which was alleged to have been worthless.

It was in substance alleged in the petition that appellee is a physician, and that appellant at the time of the sale to him of the buggy represented it to be of high grade, first class as to material and workmanship, and especially adapted and desirable for the use of a practicing physician of the city of Louisville; that appellee, being ignorant as to the material and workmanship of the buggy, relied upon and was induced by the representatives of appellant to purchase it, but that it was in fact defective and worthless at the time of its sale, in material and workmanship, and unsuitable for his use as a physician, which was then known to appellant, but unknown to him; that in a short time the buggy got out of repair, and later, one, and then the other, of its axles broke, and it otherwise gave down, and became useless, and was by appellee returned to appellant, who yet has it, but it refused to return to appellee the purchase price thereof, for which reason this action was instituted to recover the sum paid by him for the buggy.

The answer of appellant does not deny that it represented the buggy to be of the character alleged in the petition, but avers that it only undertook to keep it in repair for a year free of cost to appellee, and denies a return of the buggy "complete," or that it was returned at all except for repairs. Also avers that the injuries resulting to it were caused by the negligence of appellee, his servants and agents in the handling and use of the buggy. The affirmative matter in the answer was denied by the reply, and upon the issues thus made there followed two trials of the case, each resulting in no verdict. Upon the third trial, however, the jury returned a verdict in appellee's favor for the sum above indicated, upon which judgment was duly entered. Thereupon appellant entered motion for a judgment non obstante veridicto, and also for a new trial, both of which motions were overruled.

As according to the weight of evidence the buggy was so defective in material and workmanship as to be totally unfit for the purposes for which it was purchased by appellee, he had the right upon returning it, or offering to do so, to sue for and recover the purchase price, instead of suing to recover damages for the breach of the warranty as he might have done. In Cook v. Gray, 2 Bush, 121, it is said: "There is a material distinction between a warranty of a chattel on an executed sale and a warranty that the article to be manufactured and delivered in the future shall be of a particular quality. In the former case the purchaser has the right to rely upon the warranty without examination or explanation of the article, and, therefore, may return the article, or sue for the breach of warranty, or use it as a defense by way of recoupment." (Dana v. Boyd, 2 J. J. Marshall, 593-4; Leas Manufacturing Co. v. Waller, 18 Ky. Law Rep., 846.)

In Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 1st edition, 28th volume, 19, under the head of "Warranty," it is said: "Another exception to the general rule has been made in cases where the breach of warranty is such as to amount to a total failure, as where the article delivered proves to be absolutely worthless, or entirely different from what the contract calls for; in such cases the vendee may return the article and recover the purchase money paid."

The instructions given by the trial judge properly presented this view of the law, which we think applicable to the facts of this case, as well as the law covering other aspects thereof, and there was no error in the refusal of the court to disturb the verdict of the jury, or set it aside. We are also of opinion that the court did not err in overruling the appellants' motion for a judgment notwithstanding the verdict. The motion was based upon the ground that as no reply was filed controverting the amended answer, appellant was entitled to a judgment upon the face of the pleadings. We do not think so. The amended answer was filed just before the last trial. It appears to contain no new matter, but only sets out with greater particularity matters of defense relied on in the original answer, all of which was denied substantially by the reply. The issues were not materially changed by the amended answer, and the proof upon the last trial seems to have been practically the same adduced upon the two former trials, and we are not prepared to say that the verdict and judgment are not supported by the evidence.

For the reasons indicated the judgment is affirmed.

McFARLAND, &c. v. HATCHETT, &c.

(Filed June 1, 1904.)

Deeds—Construction—Conveyance to married woman and her children—Interest of husband—A deed to Sarah Hatchett for a house and lot contained the following: "The party of the first part sells and hereby conveys to Sarah Hatchett and her children a certain lot of ground (describing it). To have and to hold to her the said Sarah Hatchett and her children, with covenant of general warranty." Held—That Sarah Hatchett, under said deed, took a life estate in the property, with remainder to her children, the words "to her children," being used in the deed as words of purchase rather than as word of inheritance, and her husband, Roland Hatchett, to whom she was married before the husband and wife act of 1894, had no curtesy in said land.

W. P. McClain for appellants.

Lockett & Lockett for appellees.

Appeal from Henderson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

The appellants sued Roland Hatchett, alleging that Sarah Hatchett, who was the mother of appellant, Julia McFarland, and appellee, Madison Hatchett, owned a house and lot in Henderson, Ky., for life, and that her children owned the fee in remainder; that Sarah Hatchett died some two years before the institution of this action, and that appellee, Roland Hatchett, had been in possession of this property and owed her and her brother rent from the date of her mother's death to the institution of this action; that the property was not susceptible of division, and prayed judgment for rent against Roland Hatchett and for a sale of the property and for a division of the proceeds.

Appellee, Roland Hatchett, demurred to the petition; his demurrer was sustained; appellant declined to amend, and the petition was dismissed, with costs. The circuit court decided that Sarah Hatchett had a fee simple in the property, and that appellee, her husband, Roland Hatchett, had an estate by the curtesy in it for life. The deed to Sarah Hatchett was made prior to the passage of the married woman's act in 1894, and their marriage occurred long prior to the passage of this act, and if, under the deed, Sarah Hatchett took a fee-simple title, then the court was right in adjudging Roland Hatchett an estate by the curtesy. (Rose v. Rose, 104 Ky., 48, Mitchell v. Violett, 104 Ky., 77.)

The question to be determined is, whether under the deed to Sarah Hatchett for this land she took a fee-simple title or only a life estate. If she took the fee, the judgment must be affirmed; if only a life estate, a reversal must follow. The deed to Sarah Hatchett for this lot was filed with and made a part of appellants' petition, and such parts of it as are necessary to elucidate the question involved are as follows: "This indenture made and entered into this 20th day of October, 1883, by and between W. P. Robinson and Jennie Robinson, his wife, of the first part, and Sarah Hatchett (colored), wife of Roland Hatchett (colored) of the second part, and all of Henderson county, Ky., witnesseth: That for and in consideration of the sum of $60 in hand paid, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, and the note of the party of the second part executed and delivered to the party of the first part for the sum of $65, due six months after date and bearing 6 per cent. interest, the party of the first part sells and hereby conveys to said Sarah Hatchett and her children, a certain lot of ground situated in the city of Henderson (here describing the property). To have and to hold to her, the said Sarah Hatchett and her children, with covenant of general warranty."

The word "children," is a word of purchase, and not of limitation, and, therefore, where property is devised or conveyed to a woman and her children, the children take as joint tenants with the mother, where there is nothing to show a contrary intention. (Turner v. Patterson, 5 Dana, 295; Cessna v. Cessna, 4 Bush, 516; Powell v. Powell, 5 Bush, 620, Bell v. Kenneer, 101 Ky., 271.) But where there are other words in the will or deed showing that the word children was used in the sense of heirs, as where they are followed by the word forever, and in other parts of the instrument the words children and heirs are used interchangeably, the term children will be read as meaning heirs, and construed as a word of limitation and not of purchase. This construction is adopted only to effecutate the intention of the maker when there is enough on the face of the instrument to show that he used the word children in the sense of heirs. (Moran v. Dillehay, 8 Bush, 434; Hood v. Dawson, 98 Ky., 285; Lackland v. Downing, 11 B. M., 32; Williams v. Duncan, 92 Ky., 125.)

On the other hand, the word heirs will be read as synonymous with children and construed as a word of purchase, when necessary to effectuate the intention of the grantor in the deed. (Tucker v. Tucker, 78 Ky., 503; Harper v. Wilson, 2 A. K. M., 256.) An exception to the above rule has been made in the case of a deed or will from the husband to his wife and children. These cases are held to constitute a peculiar class, and in such cases it is held that the wife takes the property for life, with remainder to the children. (Fletcher v. Tyler, 92 Ky., 145; Smith v. Upton, 12 Ky. Law Rep., 28; Davis v. Hardin, 80 Ky., 672.)

Where the woman has no children when the deed or will is made, and it is made to her and her children, she takes the life estate, with remainder to her afterborn children. (Parr v. Estill, 16 B. M., 245; Bodine's Adm'r v. Arthur, 91 Ky., 55.)

This court, in the case of Webb & Harris v. Holmes, 3 B. M., 404, construed a deed similar to the one before us. The children in that case were not named as parties to the deed, but were named in the granting and habendum clauses. The court said: "This is a deed inter parties in which Crist and wife are named parties on the one side, and Sarah Thomas and her husband on the other; the children are not parties, nor are they named as such in the caption of the deed, which, by the designation of the parties, is intended to confine the deed to those who are named, in exclusion of all others as contracting parties. And as a stranger who is not a party to a deed, can derive no legal interest under it, or maintain covenant on it, so it is well established that those who are not parties to a deed can take no present interest under it; * * * but those who are not parties may take, by way of remainder. So to give to the deed operation at all, as to the children, they must be construed to take in remainder only, as they can not take a present joint interest with their mother. And surely such a construction should be given to the deed as to give some beneficial interest to the children, as they were clearly intended to be provided for. By giving to them an estate in remainder in fee to take effect after the life of their mother, they all may be provided for, not only those who are born before, but those who are born after the date of the deed, * * * and it may be fairly presumed that it was as much the object of the donor to provide for afterborn children as those that were born before the date of the deed." To the same effect are the cases of Foster v. Shreve, 6 Bush, 521, and Basket v. Sellars, 93 Ky., 8.

In the case of Viley, &c. v. Frankfort & Cincinnati Ry. Co., 21 Ky. Law Rep., 255, it was held that a deed in form like the one under consideration in this case, passed the fee-simple title to the grantee named in the caption. We have the original record in that case before us. Samuel Viley was the father of J. M. Viley, and the caption of the deed was as follows: "This indenture made and entered into this, the —— day of ——, 18—, between Samuel Viley of the first part, and John Viley of the second part." The consideration was love and affection which the father bore to the son. Both in the granting and habendum clauses the language was to "John Viley and his children." The court in that case, in construing the fee to John Viley, was in conflict with the foregoing authorities, and we are inclined to adhere to the construction given to the deed in the former opinions.

In the case under consideration, Sarah Hatchett, the grantee in the deed, named in the caption, paid for the land, and she had the right to control the form of it and especially the parties who should take under it, and it is presumed that she intended that her children should take the remainder in fee, reserving to herself the life estate, and we are constrained to hold that the words "and her children," as used in the granting and habendum clauses, were used as words of purchase rather than as words of inheritance.

Wherefore, the judgment of the lower court is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

Whole court sitting.

SOHAN v. GIBSON, &c.

(Filed June 1, 1904.)

1. Sale of land—Inadequacy of price—Rescission of contract—Province of chancellor—Inadequacy of price alone, or the payment of a greater price by the purchaser than the thing is worth, will not authorize the rescission of the contract. It must appear that the vendor in making the sale was guilty of actual fraud, or of such unfair conduct as to put the vendee at a disadvantage. It is not the province of the chancellor to modify a contract between parties merely because in his opinion it was to the undue advantage of one or to the disadvantage of the other.

2. False representations—Opportunity for inspection of property—If the purchaser had time and opportunity to examine the land, or have it examined, and did so, she was not entitled to relief, although the vendor may have made false representations as to its quantity or value.

Barker & Wood for appellant.

C. H. Moorman and O'Meara & James for appellees.

Appeal from Hardin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

The appellant, George W. Sohan, sold and conveyed to appellee, Annie M. Gibson 31¼ acres of land in Hardin county, and a lot of personal property consisting of two horses, one surrey and harness, sixteen head of hogs and shoats, two cows and calves, all the fowls on hand, one range, child bed, and a set of dining chairs. The consideration for the sale of the land and personal property mentioned was $2,000, $1,400 of which appellee paid in cash upon receiving the deed, and for the remaining $600 she executed to the appellant her three several notes of $200 each, with interest from date, payable in one, two and three years, respectively, secured by lien upon the land.

The deed contained a provision to the effect that if appellee failed to pay the first note when due, the remaining two notes were to become due and payable. After the maturity of the first note and the failure of appellee to pay it, this action was instituted by appellant upon all three of the notes, and to enforce the lien retained in the deed to secure their payment. Ap-pellee, Annie M. Gibson, resisted the payment of the notes, and by answer and counterclaim, asked a rescission of the contract upon the ground that at and before the purchase of the land, and for the purpose of inducing her to make the same, the appellant falsely and knowingly represented to her that the land was fertile and very productive; that it would produce, during an ordinary season, 50 bushels of corn per acre; that there were 35 acres in the survey; that the land did not wash, and that the cellar under the house on the premises was healthy, all of which representations were alleged to be false and known by appellant at the time to be false, but were then unknown to appellee to be false.

The answer further avers that the appellee, Annie M. Gibson, and her husband, were not familiar with farming lands, and were unable to judge of the quality of the land sold them by appellant, and for that reason that she relied upon, and was induced by his alleged false representations, to purchase the land of him. The affirmative averment of the answer and counterclaim were denied by reply, and upon the submission of the case the chancellor rendered judgment cancelling the notes sued on, and dismissing the action at appellant's cost. Of that judgment he complains, hence this appeal. Appellee does not seriously rely upon the alleged shortness in acreage. Indeed, it is apparent that there is no merit in this part of her defense, for it is not likely that appellant represented that the farm contained 35 acres when the deed from his vendor stated that it contained only 31¼ acres, and moreover appellee offered no objection to the deed made her by appellant which also gives the number of acres of the land conveyed as 31¼, and thereby informed her of that fact.

Appellee's proof seems to have been directed more particularly to the other alleged misrepresentations set forth in her answer. We think the evidence tends to prove the following state of facts: First, That appellant advertised his land through his Louisville agent, W. H. Pipes, whose deposition appears in the record, in which it is denied that any misrepresentations were made by him as to the land, or through the advertisement; upon the contrary, it appears from his deposition that after appellee and her husband looked at the land, they told him they thought it exactly as represented by him, and that it was the only place they had seen advertised that came up to the advertisement. Second, It also appears from the evidence that before appellee, who lived in Louisville, purchased the land of appellant, she went with her brother-in-law, Britt, to look at it, and did in fact with him inspect it, or have ample opportunity to do so, and that Britt later and before her purchase of the farm, went with appellee's husband to see it. Britt testified that the place, in his opinion, came up to the representations contained in the advertisement; that being a contractor and builder, he at appellee's request, estimated the value of the buildings on the land, which he found to be worth $1,000. This witness further testified that before the consummation of the trade between appellee and appellant, he talked with and drew the check of the former for the $1,400, which she paid for the land when the deed was received by her from appellant, and he then advised her, that if she was not thoroughly satisfied with the farm, the time to make her objections was before and not after the trade was made, but she was then satisfied, and the witness also testified that appellant made; no such representations as claimed by appellee. The appellant himself states with great positiveness, in his deposition, that no such misrepresentations were made by him. Third. It further appears that appellant himself had paid $1,785 for the land when he purchased it, and that the personal property which he sold appellee with the land was worth $300.

As against these facts, we find the testimony of the appellee to the effect that appellant did represent the land to be productive, and that it would produce fifty bushels of corn per acre, that it did not wash, and that the cellar of the house was dry.

Three or four other witnesses introduced by appellee, testified that the land was poor and unproductive, and not worth, buildings included, exceeding $600. Taking the evidence all together, however, we are of opinion it conduces to prove that whatever representations were made to appellee by appellant with reference to the quality and value of the land, were mere expressions of opinion, not intended to defraud or deceive, nor calculated to do so, and that appellee had every opportunity and means at hand to discover their truth or falsity. Moreover, the circumspection manifested by her in looking at the land herself, having her husband and brother-in-law, Britt, to inspect it, the latter the second time, demonstrates that she was not misled by any misrepresentations of appellant, and that she did not rely thereon.

Inadequacy of price alone, or the payment by the purchaser of a greater price than the thing purchased is worth, will not authorize a rescission of the contract, and did not justify the cancellation of the notes sued on. It must further and satisfactorily appear that appellant, in making the sale, was guilty of actual fraud, or at least of such unfair conduct as put appellee at a disadvantage. It is manifest that the chancellor in deciding this case proceeded upon the sole theory that appellant had, exclusive of the notes sued on, received as much as, in the chancellor's opinion, the farm was worth. This in our opinion was not a proper ground upon which to base the judgment. It was not the province of the chancellor to modify or change the contract between the parties merely because it was to the undue advantage of one, or the disadvantage of the other.

In Livermore v. Middlesboro Town and Land Co., 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1704, in discussing this subject, this court said: "To establish actionable fraud, or fraud against which equity will relieve * * * it must appear that the misrepresentation was of a matter of material fact (as distinguished from opinion) at the time or previously existing (and not a mere promise for the future); must be relied on by the person whose action is intended to be influenced, and must be made with knowledge of its falsity, or under circumstances which did not justify a belief in its truth. This is the doctrine deducible from the Kentucky decisions. There are some modifications of this doctrine, but they are chiefly by way of substitution of an equivalent, for some one of the essentials necessary to constitute fraudulent misrepresentations, as in the cases where it is held that a fraudulent concealment of a material matter of fact, is the equivalent of an actual misrepresentation, and in cases in which a statement made as of personal knowledge, but without knowledge, was held to be equivalent to a statement whose falsity was proven."

If, as appears from the evidence to be the case, the land sold by appellant to appellee cost him $1,735, and he put with it in the sale to appellee personal property of the value of $300, it made the total cost of it to him $2,035, or $35 more than he received from appellee for it. It would seem, therefore, that he had some reason for declaring to appellee that the land was worth $2,000, and for putting forth such claims as would make it appear to be worth that sum. At any rate, it has not been shown by the evidence that he made any statement as to the value of the land which he knew at the time to be false. If the appellee had time and opportunity to examine the land, or cause it to be examined by another in her behalf, and such examination was made, she was not entitled to a rescission, or to the relief granted, although appellant may have made false representations as to its quality or value.

The case of Peak v. Gore, 94 Ky., 533, seems to us to be decisive of this case. The circumstances of that case worked a much greater hardship upon the purchaser than will result in this case. In that case, as in this, the purchaser was a woman. In that case the woman was a widow, in this case she has a husband who made for her an examination of the property, and otherwise assisted in its purchase. In Peak v. Gore the price paid for the property was more than twice its value, and the vendor, according to the evidence, admitted that he made statements which he knew to be false. In the case at bar the evidence is conflicting as to the value of the property, but no such discrepancy exists between the price for which the property was sold and that appellant claims it is worth, and appellant positively denies making any false representations. In Peak v. Gore, it is said: "The evidence makes it too plain for controversy that the hotel property for which appellants agreed to pay $10,000 was not at the time, nor is now, worth half that sum. Indeed, only one of nine witnesses who, having knowledge on the subject, testify as to its value, say it was or is worth as much as $5,000; the value fixed by the others being from $2,000 to $4,000, so that in view of the fact her son-in-law and co-purchaser, E. C. Montgomery, is insolvent and unable to pay any part of the purchase price, the bargain is a very hard one for Mrs. Peak, who is a widow. But the relief prayed for could not be granted for that reason alone. It is stated in the petition, and also sworn to by Mrs. Peak and Montgomery as witnesses, that pending negotiation about the trade and also at the time the contract was reduced to writing, Gore, as an inducement for them to purchase the property, stated it was worth, and he had been offered for it, $10,000, and that its earning capacity was from $25 to $50 per day. He practically admits making the statement as to its value, and though not as distinctly confessing he made the other alleged statement, it is evident to us from the manner in which his testimony is given, that he did do so. And as Mrs. Peak had at the time no experience or knowledge in regard to the value or earning capacity of hotel property, and Montgomery very little, if any, more, it is manifest the representations of Gore unduly influenced them to make the purchase, which they both testify neither had previously any intention to do. This, therefore, seems to us from all the circumstances, to be the case of persons without practical knowledge or experience of the value or management of particular property, being allowed to buy and pay an exorbitant price for it by representations of the owner, known by him to be untrue. But as they purchased after having time and opportunity to ascertain for themselves the value of the property, and did in fact examine it, commendation or even false representations of its value by Gore, can not, according to a settled rule, afford ground for a rescission."

We think it is reasonably plain from the evidence that appellee, in the matter of the land trade, relied in part upon her own judgment and that of her husband, but more especially upon that of her brother-in-law, and that at least one visit to and inspection of the land by the latter occurred after she had talked with appellant about the land. Manifestly she purchased the land after having time and opportunity to ascertain herself, and through others, the quality and value of the land and buildings, and did in fact examine it. If, therefore, appellant made any false or fraudulent representations in regard thereto, such representations can not, according to a settled rule, afford ground for a rescission, or abatement in the purchase price.

What is here said in reference to the trade as to the land applies with equal force to appellee's complaint about the corn, her contention on that score being that appellant represented that there were a hundred bushels of corn on the land, that would go to her in the trade, when in fact there were only twelve bushels. The corn is not mentioned in the deed, and does not appear to have been a part of the personal property intended to pass to appellee with the land, and there is no allegation in the answer, of fraud or mistake in the drafting of the deed, whereby it was omitted to be mentioned therein. In any event, the corn was standing on the land at the time of the trade, and was as much subject to the inspection of appellee, her husband and brother-in-law as was the land, and in view of the opportunity afforded them to examine it and ascertain its quality, it is but fair to presume that such examination was duly made, and that in accepting the corn, the appellee relied upon her own judgment and that of her husband and brother-in-law, as in the matter of the land.

The view of the case herein expressed makes it unnecessary for us to consider the question as to whether it was necessary for appellee to offer to return the personal property received by her of appellant under the deed, to entitle her to a rescission of the contract.

For the reasons herein indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with directions to the lower court to set aside the judgment appealed from, and in lieu thereof enter judgment in appellant's behalf for the amount of the notes sued on, and the enforcement of the lien retained in the deed to secure their payment, and for such further proceedings as may be consistent with the opinion herein.

KENTUCKY LAND AND IMMIGRATION CO. v. CRABTREE.

(Filed June 1, 1904.)

1. Delivery bond—Action thereon—Extent of recovery—Attorney's fees and other expenses—Legal costs—Where a plaintiff in an action for the immediate delivery of personal property executed bond under section 180, Civil Code, and obtained possession thereof, and then dismissed his action and effect to the words, 'such other costs and damages as he may show himself entitled to,' unless they are construed to mean, all such costs over and above the legal costs of the present suit, as he was necessarily subject to by reason of the suing forth and executing the writ of replevin. Neither is there any kind of cost which the defendant would be thereby made to incur, that would fall more naturally within such a description, than that extra compensation which he would necessarily have to pay attorneys for defending the suit, over and above the taxed fee. It is a cost or damage to which he was subjected exclusively by reason of the institution of the replevin suit, and would seem, therefore, to present the strongest claim for being embraced by the legislative description of such other costs and damages as he might show himself entitled to, over and above the legal cost of that suit."

The allowance of the attorneys' fee in this case was, by the peculiar language of the statute as it then existed, and the wording of the bond, permitted. It is clearly shown that if the bond had only contained the words "all legal costs," the attorneys' fee would not have been allowed. But by reason of the fact that, in addition of these words, the bond contained "and such other costs," he was entitled to recover the attorneys' fee. This was unlike the bond in this action. It only provided for the recovery for the costs in that action in which it was executed; that is to say, only the legal and ordinary costs. To the same effect was the case of Kenley, &c. v. Commonwealth for Henderson, 6 B. M., 588.

We are of the opinion that the lower court erred in submitting these items of damage to the jury.

If appellee was entitled to recover in this action for anything, he was entitled to recover for the value of the logs at the time taken from him and the interest on that amount from that date, and on this question the court erred to the prejudice of appellee, by not submitting the question of interest to the jury. The appellee in his petition does not allege any breach of the bond, except a failure to return to him the logs or pay him the value thereof, and it is shown by the order of the court in that action that the court did not adjudge that the appellant should do either of these things, and under the pleadings, as they exist, he is not entitled to recover in this action. From the record in this case it appears that there was a condition of the bond broken and violated by appellant. The appellants obligated themselves that they would duly prosecute that action, and, after getting possession of the logs by virtue of the bond, they then dismissed the action without prejudice, and failed to prosecute, as they had bound themselves to do. If appellee had alleged this stipulation in the bond and the breach thereof, he could have recovered the value of the logs with the interest thereon. In volume 24, 2d edition, Am. and Eng. Cyc., 540, it is said: "For breach of the condition duly to prosecute the action or prosecute the action to effect, the defendant has been held entitled to recover, in an action on the bond, all the damages he had sustained by reason of the institution of the replevin action and the taking of the property from his possession, such as the costs awarded to the defendant in the replevin action, and damages for the detention of the property. And on breach of such a condition, a recovery for the value of the property in the case of its non-return, has been permitted, though in some cases the courts have denied the right to recover the value of the property."

And again, on the same page: "The condition to prosecute the action to effect or with effect requires a successful prosecution of the action, and extends to one continued prosecution from the commencement to the termination of the action; thus, if on appeal by the defendant from a judgment in the lower court for the plaintiff, the judgment is reversed and no venire de novo is awarded, the condition is broken. The condition is likewise broken when judgment passes against the plaintiff, or when the plaintiff suffers a voluntary or involuntary nonsuit, dismissal, or discontinuance of the action."

Again on page 539, it is said: "The condition that the plaintiff shall duly prosecute has been held not to require that the plaintiff should be successful, but merely to require that the action be prosecuted to final judgment. Such condition, however, would be broken by the plaintiff suffering a dismissal of the action, or by unnecessary delay to prosecute with good cause, although no judgment was entered."

The author refers to authorities in many States and to two in Kentucky to support this doctrine. The Kentucky cases are 2 Bibb., 199, Roman, &c. v. Stratton, and 2 Dana, 256, Yantiss v. Burditt.

This condition in the bond is as valuable to the defendant as any other. It would be unjust to allow a party to obtain possession of property by the execution of such a bond, and then fail to duly prosecute his action, and then upon his own motion to dismiss it without prejudice and hold the property from the defendant. This appears to be the situation of the case before us.

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is reversed and the cause remanded, with directions that the plaintiff be allowed to amend his pleadings, if desired, and for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

MOSELEY v. STROUD.

(Filed June 1, 1904.)

Execution—Transcript from the quarterly court—Duty of circuit clerk—Failure to perform—Validity—The requirements of Civil Code, section 723, that the clerk of the circuit court, when a certified copy of an execution from the quarterly court is filed in his office, indorsed in whole or in part no property found, to record same in a book kept in his office for that purpose, are mandatory; and such clerk has no authority in law to issue an execution thereon, until he has recorded the judgment, execution and return of the quarterly court in such transcript book; and such execution is void and a sale of land thereunder invalid.

Hays & Wells for appellant.

Powers & Anderson for appellee.

Appeal form Daviess Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

Appellant brought this action under section 499 of the Civil Code to have allotted to him an undivided one-sixth interest in a tract of 100 acres of land. He alleges in his petition that the other five-sixths interest in the land was owned and held by defendants as heirs at law of one Charles Wilhite; that he had acquired title to the one-sixth interest claimed by him, by purchase thereof on the 16th of March, 1896, at an execution sale made by the sheriff of Daviess county, under an execution which issued from the clerk's office of the Daviess Circuit Court on the 25th of February, 1896, in favor of Martin Yewell against the defendant, Mary Stroud, who was a daughter and heir at law of Charles Wilhite; that he had paid the full amount of the purchase money, and in consideration thereof the sheriff had, by deed dated March 18, 1897, conveyed to him the interest of the defendant, Mary Stroud, and prayed that this interest might be allotted to him in fee. The deed to him from the sheriff was filed as an exhibit with his petition. The appellee, Mary Stroud, who was made a party defendant to appellant's suit, answered, and denied that appellant was the owner of her one undivided one-sixth interest in the land by virtue of his purchase at the execution sale; and alleged that the judgment on which the execution purports to have been issued was not recovered in the Daviess Circuit Court, but in the Daviess Quarterly Court; and that plaintiff had not filed a certified copy of the judgment obtained by him in the quarterly court, or the execution and return thereon, in the office of the clerk of the Daviess Circuit Court, and that no such judgment, execution or return had ever been recorded by the clerk of the Daviess Circuit Court in a book kept for that purpose, prior to the issual and sale of her land thereunder; and that the execution was issued without authority of law by the clerk of the Daviess Circuit Court, and conferred no right or authority on the sheriff of Daviess county to levy the execution upon her interest in the property mentioned and described in plaintiff's petition; that the attempted sale was illegal and void, and passed no interest or title to the purchaser, and prayed that the sale and purchase by plaintiff be held void and the deed to him by the sheriff cancelled. Plaintiff, in his reply, admitted that the judgment in favor of Yewell against defendant was recovered in the Daviess Quarterly Court, but alleged that execution issued thereon from the Daviess Quarterly Court, which was directed to the sheriff of Daviess county, and returned by him no property found; that subsequently there was filed in the office of the clerk of the Daviess Circuit Court a copy of the judgment, execution and return, but that they were not recorded by the clerk of the Daviess Circuit Court in the book kept for that purpose, and that the certified copy of the execution and return had been misplaced or lost, and could not be found among the records of the circuit court clerk's office; but denied that the omission by the clerk of the circuit court to record the judgment, execution and return as required by section 728 of the Civil Code, rendered the execution which issued thereon or the sale thereunder, void. The deposition of Martin Yewell was taken by the plaintiff, and he testified that he had recovered a judgment against Mary Stroud for $25, with interest and cost, in the Daviess Quarterly Court, on which execution was issued and which was returned by the sheriff no property found; that subsequently he filed a transcript of the judgment, execution and return in the Daviess Circuit Court upon which an execution issued, which was levied by the sheriff upon the one undivided one-sixth interest of defendant in the land in controversy; that this interest was appraised at $400 and was bought by the appellant, Moseley, for $38.22, the amount of the execution, sheriff's commission and cost; and that he had subsequently been paid the full amount of his judgment by the sheriff. S. W. Bedford, the clerk of the Daviess Circuit Court, testified that he had made a careful examination of the records of his office for a copy of the judgment, execution and sheriff's return taken from the quarterly court, in the case of Yewell against appellee, and had found a copy of the judgment, but no copy of the execution or sheriff's return which issued from the quarterly court, and no evidence that any execution ever issued from the office of the circuit court thereon; that a transcript judgment book was kept in his office, as required by section 723 of the Civil Code, but no copy of the alleged judgment, execution and return in favor of Yewell against defendant was ever copied therein.

Sections 722 and 723 of the Civil Code provide:

"Section 722. Land shall not be sold, nor levied on under execution from the quarterly court, or justices court, or in any court of similar jurisdiction.

"Section 723. When an execution upon a judgment of a court mentioned in section 722 is returned by a proper officer, in whole or in part, in substance no property found to satisfy it, the judge of the justices court shall, upon the application of the plaintiff or his attorney, furnish a certified copy of the judgment, execution and return, which on being filed in the office of the clerk of the circuit court of the county in which the judgment was rendered, shall be recorded by him in a book kept in the office of the circuit court clerk for that purpose, and thereupon the plaintiff shall be entitled to the same remedies for the amount of his judgment and cost, including the cost of said copy and recording it, as if the judgment had been rendered in the circuit court."

It is conceded by appellant that section 729 of the Civil Code and so much of section 723 as requires the filing in the office of the clerk of the circuit court of a certified copy of the judgment, execution and sheriff's return thereon from the quarterly court, are mandatory provisions, but that so much of section 723 as requires the clerk of the circuit court to record the transcript filed in his office from the inferior court in a book kept for that purpose, is purely directory; and that a failure to do so does not deprive him of any remedies for the enforcement of the quarterly court judgment, which he would have enjoyed if the judgment had been rendered in the circuit court. It seems to us that this contention is illogical and in conflict with the plain language of the statute. It requires that plaintiff shall file a copy of the judgment, execution and return thereon from the lower court, in the office of the circuit court clerk of the county in which the judgment was rendered; and that when so filed, they shall be recorded by the circuit court clerk in a book kept in his office for that purpose. There is no suggestion in the statute that the recording in the book kept for that purpose is of less consequence than the filing in the office of the transcript of the lower court. They stand upon identically the same footing. After both of these requirements have been complied with, the statute provides that the plaintiff shall be entitled to the same remedies for the collection of his judgment, as if it had been rendered in the circuit court. Both, in our judgment, are conditions precedent to giving to the judgment of the lower court the effectiveness of a judgment of the circuit court.

Statutory prescriptions in regard to the time, form and mode of proceeding by public functionaries, are usually directory, as they usually are not of the essence of the thing to be done, but are given only to secure system, uniformity and dispatch in the conduct of public business.

"But where authority to proceed in courts is conferred by statute, and where the manner of obtaining jurisdiction is prescribed by the statute, the mode of proceeding is mandatory and must be strictly conformed to, otherwise the proceeding will be void." (26 A. & E. En. of Law, 692, and authorities there cited.)

In Freeman on Executions, 2d edition, section 14, the law is stated in these words: "It is not unusual for statutes to be enacted authorizing the filing with the county clerk of transcripts of judgments rendered and entered by justices of the peace, and providing that executions may issue on such transcripts in the same manner and by the same person or officer as though the judgment were rendered in the court where the transcript is filed. This does not transform the original judgment into a judgment of the higher court, except for the purpose of issuing execution. * * * When the county clerk issues execution to enforce a judgment of a justice of the peace, his authority to do so rests upon the filing of the transcript and upon the existence of such other facts as the statute has prescribed, and unless it can be shown that the law was substantially complied with, the act of the clerk is regarded as without authority, and, therefore, void. So there are statutes authorizing transcripts of judgments to be sent to other counties, some times for the purpose of making such judgments liens in the counties to which the transcripts are sent, and sometimes to authorize the issuing of execution in such counties. Where the latter is the object, the authority to issue execution depends on compliance with the provisions of the statute, and if issued in the absence of such statutes, the execution is void."

In Kelber's Void Judicial and Execution Sales, 260, where the author is discussing the necessity for the rendering of the judgment before execution can issue, he says: "When the only evidence of judgment is embodied in the minutes or memoranda entered upon books not intended for preservation of the record of judgment, these do not constitute a judgment, and the issue and levy of an execution before the rendition of a judgment is wholly void, and the subsequent rendition of the judgment, and its entry in due form of law, will not validate the writ and the proceedings had thereunder."

In Freeman on Void Judicial Sales, section 24, the author says: "In some States execution may issue by the clerk of a superior court upon transcripts of judgments of justices of the peace. The substantial performance of the various acts described by the statute with respect to the transcript and the filing thereof, appear to be essential to the issuing of the writ and the maintenance of titles founded upon it."

Without reference to further authorities, we have reached the conclusion that the clerk of the Daviess Circuit Court had no authority in law to issue the execution until he had recorded the judgment, execution and return of the quarterly court in the transcript book kept by him for that purpose; and that the execution issued by him conferred no authority upon the sheriff to levy and sell the property of appellee.

Judgment affirmed.

BEAVERS, &c. v. BOWEN.

(Filed June 1, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Stenographer's report of examining trial—Agreement that it may be read to impeach witnesses—On the trial of an action in the circuit court to recover damages for assault and battery, the report of the evidence on the examining trial, taken in shorthand by a stenographer, is not competent evidence to impeach a witness who testified on such examining trial, although the parties to the action may have agreed that such report should be read to the jury as the testimony of the stenographer if he were present.

2. Instructions—Wrongful assault—In an action to recover damages for assault and battery where several are jointly sued, it is error in the court to instruct the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the defendants, or either of them, "wrongfully assaulted and beat the plaintiff with fists or rocks, they should find for the plaintiff against all or such of them as in the opinion of the jury are guilty if either is guilty," as nowhere was the jury told what would have been a "wrongful" assault.

O'Meara & James for appellants.

Weed S. Chelf, J. S. Sprigg and L. A. Faurest for appellee.

Appeal from Hardin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

This is an action by appellee against appellants for assault and battery. The affray was first engaged in between appellee and B. G. Beavers. At a time when the former had thrown the latter to the gorund and was striking him, the other appellants, sons of B. G. Beavers, appeared on the scene, and took part in behalf of their father. At least, one of them did (Wilber Beavers,) and it is claimed that the other did also. After Wilbur Beavers got there, he soon had overcome appellee, and had him down on the ground. His theory of the case is, that at the instance of some bystanders he desisted from the fight and let appellee up, when appellee resumed the fight and recommenced attacks upon B. G. Beavers and Wilber. Appellee's version is that Wilber attacked him violently and took him unawares, throwing him to the ground and beating him into insensibility, while B. G. Beavers stood by aiding and encouraging the assault. The origin of the trouble seems to have been because appellant, B. G. Beavers, refused to move a hitching rack for horses that was on his ground and near his store, because it was near appellees' house and offensive to him. An altercation of words over the subject of the hitching rack brought on this fight.

The verdict of the jury in this case was an assessment of substantial damages against all the appellants.

Appellants were arraigned, charged with a felonious assault. An examining trial was had before a magistrate. On that trial in the examining court, notes of the evidence were taken in shorthand by one Eskridge. On this trial these notes were used as evidence of what appellants then testified to. It was used to contradict or impeach appellants' testimony on certain points in this trial. Eskridge was not introduced as a witness. His notes were introduced as evidence under this agreement: "It is agreed by the parties that R. H. Eskridge, the stenographer who reported the evidence on the examining trial, would state if here, that the transcript of his notes is incomplete and does not contain all that was testified to by the witnesses, but that all contained in it was said by the witnesses and is correct as far as the testimony is written."

We do not construe this agreement to waive the relevancy of the contents of Eskridge's notes taken at the examining trial, but only to waive their production and proof by Eskridge. They had, under this agreement, just such value as evidence as if Eskridge had been present and testified concerning them as the agreement recites. There are at least two grounds why, in our opinion, the stenographer's notes are not relevant in this trial.

First, they are admittedly incomplete. For aught that is shown the statements omitted would, if presented, have reconciled the other statements with the witness' present testimony. A witness can not be contradicted by proof of a mere fragment of a statement which may, standing alone, appear to be inconsistent with a full statement; second, by section 64, Criminal Code of Practice, the minutes of an examining trial are, by express provision, made incompetent as evidence for any purpose. But if they were not part of the minutes of the examining trial and were only the stenographer's work, they are likewise incompetent as evidence. The act providing for official stenographic reporters applies only to the circuit courts (sections 4637-4645, Kentucky Statutes,) and proceedings therein. But even there the stenographer's notes are made evidence only in case the witness whose testimony they represent is not present at the trial, and his testimony can not be procured. But when the purpose is to impeach a witness by proving that on another occasion he has made a different statement from his testimony at the trial, the mere introduction of the notes by the shorthand reporter who took down the evidence of the witness on the other trial, is not enough for that purpose. The extended notes of the reporter are evidence in one event only, and that is the one alluded to. The main purpose of such notes, in circuit courts, is to supply a part of what would otherwise be in the bill of exceptions, made up for use solely of the appellate court. If they be taken and used in examining courts, and made a part of the minutes of the proceeding, their only purpose is to furnish the grand jury a clue to the witnesses and to what they will probably testify as an aid in the investigation before that body. But, where they are proposed in subsequent trials as impeaching evidence, they can be used only as memoranda to refresh the recollection of the witness testifying to such statements. (Wilson v. Commonwealth, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1888.) And he must be able, after having his memory so refreshed, to testify to the matter as of his own recollection. The extended notes, even then, are not themselves evidence.

Considerable stress is laid in argument upon the incorrectness of the instructions given to the jury by the trial court. Some question is made that the instructions are not properly incorporated in the bill of exceptions, and are not made part of the record. If the instructions brought up were the ones given to the jury, they are all erroneous. But whether they are or not the ones given, we deem it not improper to lay down the law that should govern on the retrial of this case, particularly as there appears to have been already three mistrials.

The instructions told the jury that if they believe that the defendants or either of them "wrongfully assaulted and beat the plaintiff with fists or rocks, they should find for the plaintiff against all or such of them as in the opinion of the jury are guilty, if either is guilty."

All the instructions were moulded upon that same form, namely, that if the defendants, or either of them, "wrongfully" assaulted the plaintiff, but nowhere were the jury told what would have been a "wrongful" assault. The matter was left entirely to them without a guidance by the law, so far as the instructions went, as to what would be right or wrong in making the assault. We are of the opinion that the court should have instructed the jury so as to cover the following points:

1st. If the defendants, or any of them, assaulted, beat and bruised the plaintiff, the jury ought to find against the guilty ones, unless they were justifiable under these instructions.

2d. The measure of damages, if the jury find for the plaintiff, is such sum as will, under the proof, compensate him for loss of time sustained by reason of his injuries, not exceeding $1,500, the sum claimed, and such further sum as will, under the proof, compensate plaintiff for injuries to his person by defendant or any of them, and his physician, and mental pain suffered therefrom, not exceeding $20,000, the sum sued for.

3d. If the jury believe from the evidence that at the time B. G. Beavers assaulted the plaintiff, he in good faith believed and had reasonable grounds to believe that he was then in danger of an assault about to be inflicted on him by plaintiff, he had the right to use such force as was necessary, or as appeared to him in the exercise of a reasonable judgment to be necessary, to repel the assault and save himself. Nor is it necessary that the jury should believe that such danger to B. G. Beavers was actual or real. It was enough if it appeared to him, in the exercise of good faith, to be real.

4th. The other defendants had the right to do for their father what he had the right to do for his own self-defense.

5th. Wilber Beavers' right of self-defense was dependent upon B. G. Beavers having the same right, under the instructions, except, that if Wilber, after having begun the assault on plaintiff, in good faith quit it, and thereupon plaintiff assaulted him, then Wilber had the same right to defend himself from the attack that he would have had had he not first assaulted plaintiff.

6th. If plaintiff was first assaulted by B. G. Beavers, and in his own self-defense knocked his assailant down, yet if thereafter he used more force than was necessary, or more force than to him, in the exercise of a reasonable judgment, appeared to be necessary against the said B. G. Beavers to avert the assault then and there about to be inflicted on him by B. G. Beavers, plaintiff thereby became the aggressor, and the right of B. G. Beavers and of his sons, the other appellants, to use apparently necessary force in defending him, attached.

7th. If defendants, or any of them, used more force than was necessary, or than reasonably appeared to them to be necessary under the circumstances and surroundings to save themselves, or any of them, from an assault then about to be inflicted on them by plaintiff and others aiding him, the defendants are liable to plaintiff therefor, although they were acting in their self-defense or under apparent necessity as defined in the instructions.

The evidence should have been restricted within closer bounds. It should have been confined to what occurred at the time, and between the parties to the fight; that certain people had complained of the presence of the horse rack; and as to why certain persons did or did not interfere and endeavor to separate the combatants; as to what one of them said afterwards as to not being sorry that the other, coupled with certain oaths, got what he deserved, do not appear to illustrate anything at issue in this trial. They were better calculated to mislead than to aid the jury in reaching a proper verdict.

Another ground of complaint is that one of the attorneys for appellee in the closing argument to the jury went outside of the record, and indulged in personal abuse of opposing counsel, and otherwise sought to inflame the prejudices of the jury. It was shown in opposition to this contention that counsel upon the other side had previously committed a similar breach in his argument to the jury. Such discursions are discourteous to the court, wasteful of its time, and not calculated to do any good. The court ought, even without objection, have interfered and stopped it, when it was begun by either side.

For the reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded for a new trial consistent herewith.

CRUTCHER v. RODMAN, TRUSTEE, &c.

(Filed June 3, 1904.)

Infant's real estate—Sales for reinvestment—Control of funds—Bonds—In an action under Civil Code, section 491, for the sale of unproductive real estate and a reinvestment of the proceeds, in which infants own a contingent remainder dependent upon their surviving the life tenants, it was error in the court to make the purchase-money bonds payable to the testamentary trustee who is a nonresident of the State; but under the provisions of subsection 5 of section 493 of the Code, the sale bonds should have been made payable to the court's commissioner, and the control of the fund reserved by the court until it was paid out in the purchase of other property.

Frank Chinn for appellant.

T. L. Edelen for appellees.

Appeal from Franklin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

This suit was brought originally for a construction of the will of Thomas Rodman, deceased, and to confirm the sale by the executors of the will and the testamentary trustee thereunder, of a certain house and lot in Frankfort, devised by the testator to his three daughters. The nature of the estate created in this property was the fee to an undivided one-third to Elizabeth; life estates in the remaining two-thirds to Johanna and Sue, one-third to each, with remainder to their surviving children. Their children now living are infants. (Murray v. Rodman, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 978.)

The lot is unproductive, owing to the expense of maintaining repairs, and taxes and other charges. It was, therefore, adjudged under the proof that it be sold for reinvestment of the proceeds of each parcener in other property. Appellant became the purchaser at the decretal sale at $4,250, more than two-thirds of its appraised value. She appeals from the judgment of the court overruling her exceptions and confirming the sale. The exceptions are that the judgment of sale is erroneous, if not void, because the suit was not brought by the person authorized by statute to bring it; also, because the judgment permitted and directed the purchase-money bonds to be payable to the testamentary trustee, instead of to the court's commissioner; and because the bond required by section 498, Civil Code, was not executed.

It was intimated on the former appeal, though the question was not then presented, and its decision appears to have been dictum, that the proceedings to sell the lot must be under subsection 5 of section 489, Civil Code; that this expression was regarded by the parties as not binding on them is shown from the fact that they do not appear to have attempted to conform to the practice necessary in proceedings under that section. Before the former appeal it was the contention of appellees that the three daughters named, took the fee-simple title to the lot; or, if that was not so, then Elizabeth, as testamentary trustee for the others, took the fee, with power to sell and convey, and to reinvest the proceeds. Both of these positions having been denied, appellees have proceeded for a decretal sale of the property for purposes of reinvestment as above stated. The question is now presented whether they have pursued the proper course. To decide this, it is first necessary to determine the exact nature of the estate owned by the devisees, measured by the provisions of the Code governing sales for reinvestment of such estates of persons under disability.

Section 489, Civil Code, relates to sales of vested estates of infants and persons of unsound mind. These infants have not a vested estate in this lot. On the contrary, it is a contingent remainder, dependent upon the event of their surviving the life tenants. Nor can the proceeding be under section 490, Civil Code, because it relates to the sale of a "vested estate in real property owned jointly by two or more persons." The term "vested estate," as used in these sections "includes all estates which are not contingent." (Ward v. Edge, 100 Ky., 771.) Section 491, Civil Code, is the only statutory provision authorizing a proceeding in court to sell a contingent remainder interest in lands of persons under disability. It provides: "In an equitable action by the owner of a particular estate or freehold in possession, or by his guardian or committee if he be an infant or of unsound mind, against the owner of the reversion or remainder, though he be an infant or of unsound mind, and against the owner of the particular estate if he be an infant or of unsound mind or, if the remainder be contingent, against the person, if in being, in whom it would have vested if the contingency had happened before commencement of the action, though he be an infant or of unsound mind, and against the owner of the particular estate if he be an infant or of unsound mind, real property may be sold for investment of the proceeds in other real property."

In certain sales, under sections 489 and 490, particularly where the purpose is for re-investment, and "subject to the provisions of section 491" and other sections (not applicable to this case), before a sale of the land can be ordered, the guardian of the infant must execute bond, with approved sureties worth double the value of the estate to be sold, that the guardian will faithfully discharge all his duties, and will comply with the judgments and orders of the court in the action, and will account for and pay to the infant all money or property due or belonging to him when required.

The third subsection reads: "If the bond be not given, any order of sale, and any sale or conveyance made under such order, shall be absolutely void and of no effect."

But susbection 5 of section 498, reads as follows: "In the case mentioned in section 491, the court ordering the sale shall, by its commissioner, retain the custody and control of the fund realized by the sale, until the same is reinvested in real estate, or in such other property as the funds of persons under disability may be invested by authority of law, and the court shall order the money to be paid, by its commissioner, directly to the person from whom the purchase for reinvestment is made, and to no other person, and in which case no bond shall be required."

This subsection was an amendment to the section passed in 1892. Its purpose was to obviate the necessity of the execution of the bond. The procedure required by it was to be in lieu of the bond. The necessity for a strict conformity with the requirements of this subsection are as important to the persons intended to be protected by it, as is the execution of the bond mentioned in the other subsection. It is a jurisdictional prerequisite, the strict observance of which can not be too punctilliously enforced. (Elliott v. Fowler's Gd'n, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 676.)

As indicated, the judgment of the circuit court made the purchase-money bonds payable to the testamentary trustee, who is a nonresident of this State. This was error. The purchase-money bonds should have been made payable to the court's commissioner, and control of the fund should have been reserved by the court until it was paid out in purchase of other property, title to which is to be taken and held in the same manner as that sold. The circuit court must not only retain the custody and control of the fund, but must approve its reinvestment before it is parted with. The argument that the will gives to the testamentary trustee the control of the trust estate, including the interests in the lot in litigation, as well as the control of its investment, is unavailing; that she did not have the power of selling the lot under the terms of the will, was the point decided in the former appeal. Therefore, its sale, if sold at all during the infancy of the contingent remaindermen, must be under and by virtue of section 491, supra. The court can not exercise the jurisdiction conferred by that section, except it be done in the manner directed by the section. Consent of parties can not confer, nor can it dispense with conditions of jurisdiction of the subject matter. Rodman's will did not provide that the testamentary trustee could sell the lot, nor did it give her the right to reinvest its proceeds if sold by the court. So far as the trust over that property applied, it did not go beyond the control of it, and the custody of the title. Her authority in investing trust funds given by the will was over the other trust property devised. The testator does not appear to have contemplated its sale for reinvestment of the proceeds in more profitable property. While the testator might have given his executors or the trustee authority to sell the lot and reinvest its proceeds without resort to any court, leaving the whole matter to the wisdom and discretion of the persons so selected, yet he did not do it. Upon that point the will is silent. The statutory authority is, therefore, the only authority for the sale.

This suit is brought by one of the owners of the particular estate, and all the other owners are parties. It is not necessary under section 491 that the guardian of the infant owner should be the party plaintiff, as is required under other conditions.

But for the reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded for proceedings consistent herewith.

FULWILER, &c. v. ROBERTS.

(Filed June 8, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Contract—Construction—Conditional sale or mortgage—Appellants owned a house and lot in Henderson worth $2,000, which was sold for a lien debt thereon and purchased by one of the appellants, Mrs. Graves, for $500, the amount of the debt, and being unable to execute a bond for the price, made the following contract with appellee Roberts: "Whereas a certain lot (describing it) was sold in May, 1903, and purchased by Mrs. Belle E. Graves at the price of $500, who, in consideration of the premises hereinafter stated and of $20 in hand paid, has this day transferred and assigned her bid to A. G. Roberts, who receives the same and assumes to pay said bid and all taxes for 1902 and 1903, water rent for 1902 and half of 1903, and keep the property insured for $800, and to have $50 worth of repairs done on the house and to reconvey same (to appellants) upon the payment to him of $800 at any time prior to —— day of May, 1903." Under this contract Roberts advanced, in all, $637.34. He claims the writing is a conditional sale and the appellants failing to comply with the conditions within the time named, he thereby became the owner of the property. Appellants claim the writing to be a mortgage, and offer to pay the amount advanced by Roberts, which he declines to accept. Held—That the contract is a mortgage, and appellee Roberts is entitled to a lien on the property for $637.34, and no more.

M. C. & G. D. Givens for appellants

Yeaman & Yeaman for appellee.

Appeal from Henderson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

W. F. Fulwiler, a bachelor, was the owner during his life of a house and lot in the city of Henderson, fronting ninety-one feet and eight inches on the south side of Seventh street between Elm and Green, and running back in parallel lines two hundred and ten feet to the "Clore" line, on which he resided with his mother, the appellant, Elizabeth Fulwiler, and his two sisters, Kate Fulwiler and Mrs. Belle E. Graves, which, at his death in 1901, was incumbered by a mortgage lien in favor of the estate of Mrs. S. W. Lambert for about $500. He devised all of his estate to his mother, and shortly after his death, a suit was brought by his executors to settle his estate. The executor of Mrs. Lambert was made a party defendant to this suit, and by cross petition asked an enforcement of the mortgage lien to secure the debt due his testatrix. He alleged that the whole lot would have to be sold, as it was indivisible, and judgment was entered in conformity with the prayer of his petition. The house and lot was apprised at $2,000, and at the sale made by the commissioner, on the 28th of April, 1902, it was knocked off to the appellant, Mrs. Belle E. Graves, at $500, the amount of the mortgage debt. Mrs. Graves was unable to execute a bond for the purchase money, and on the 24th of May, 1902, assigned her bid to the appellee, A. G. Roberts, who paid the amount thereof, and a commissioner's deed was made to him for the property. Contemporaneously with the assignment of Mrs. Graves of her bid to the appellee, the following written contract was entered into between the parties: "This contract this day made and entered into between Mrs. Belle E. Graves, Mrs. Elizabeth Fulwiler, Miss Kate Fulwiler and A. G. Roberts, Witnesseth: That, whereas, a certain piece of property fronting ninety-one feet, eight inches, on the south side of Seventh street, between Elm and Green streets, and running back that width two hundred and ten feet to Clore's line, and belonging to the estate of W. F. Fulwiler, deceased, was, on the 5th day of May, 1902, sold under a judgment rendered in the suit of W. F. Fulwiler's Ex'or v. W. F. Fulwiler's heirs and creditors, and purchased by Mrs. Belle E. Graves, at the price of $500; who, in consideration of the premises hereinafter stated, and of $20 to her in hand paid, has this day transferred and assigned her bid to A. G. Roberts, who receives the same and assumes to pay said bid, and to pay all taxes for 1902 and 1903; water rents for the year 1903 and first half of 1903; and to keep the house on said property insured for at least $800; also to have $50 worth of repairs done on the house, and to reconvey the same as hereinafter directed, upon the payment to him of $800 at any time on or before the —— day of May, 1903.

"It is further agreed that upon the redemption of said property it shall be conveyed as follows: One-half interest therein to Miss Kate Fulwiler, who is to have the right and authority to rent, lease, sell and convey the same; but if she shall die without exercising this right, then said one-half interest is to descend to the children of Mrs. Belle E. Graves, jointly, as in the case of the other half. The other half interest is to be conveyed to Mrs. Belle E. Graves and her children jointly, to have and to hold during their lives, with remainder to the survivors of them in fee simple.

"But it is expressly agreed and understood that Mrs. Elizabeth Fulwiler shall have the custody and absolute control of said premises during her life, and to be the head of the family just as she has always been.

"It is agreed that the transfer be completed at once. Signed this 24th day of May, 1902.

"KATE FULWILER,
"ELIZABETH FULWILER,
"BELLE E. GRAVES,
"A. G. ROBERTS."

Under this contract, Roberts advanced in all $637.34. On the 21st of July, 1903, the appellee served the following notice upon the appellants:

"Mrs. Belle E. Graves, Mrs. E. Fulwiler, Miss Kate Fulwiler: You are hereby notified to vacate and deliver to me the possession of the land and lot you now occupy, located at 824 Seventh street, Henderson, Ky., on or before the 31st of January, 1903.

"Very respectfully,

"A. G. ROBERTS."

Thereupon appellants brought this action against the appellee, setting out the facts recited, supra, and alleged that the arrangement entered into with the defendant, Roberts, was for the purpose of borrowing the money advanced to them by him, and which they had offered to repay to him after the 24th of May, 1903, but he refused to accept it, claiming to be the owner of the property under the contract. Defendant, in his answer, averred a willingness to reconvey the property to the defendants upon the payment to him of the $800 stipulated for in the contract and $4 paid for insurance, which he asked should be adjudged a lien upon the property, and that it should be sold to pay the same. The circuit court held the contract of May 24, 1902, a conditional sale by the defendant to the plaintiff of the property, and gave them until the 3d of May, 1904, to pay the defendant $804, with interest and cost of this action, and in default of payment directed a sale of the property to pay these various sums. Plaintiffs have appealed, insisting that appellee only held the property in mortgage to secure the repayment to him of the $637.34, the amount actually admitted by him to have been advanced under the contract.

The question for decision is, whether the arrangement between the parties is to be regarded as a mortgage or conditional sale. Story's Equity Jurisprudence, section 1018, says: "The particular form and words of the conveyance are unimportant, and it may be laid down as a general rule subject to few exceptions, that whenever a conveyance, assignment, or other instrument transferring an estate, is originally intended between the parties as a security for money or for any other incumbrance, whether the intention appear from the same instrument or from any other, it is always considered in equity a mortgage."

And the rule is well settled that where the nature of the conveyance is doubtful, it will be considered a mortgage, and not a conditional sale, because this construction is most favorable to the debtor. (Tigert v. Potter, 97 Ky., 54.) We think it clear from all the facts and circumstances developed in this record, that the object of the arrangement entered into between the parties on the 24th of May, 1902, was to secure the payment to the appellee of the various sums of money which he assumed to advance for plaintiff, to enable them to pay off the mortgage to Lambert's executor. The property was appraised at $2,000, and we can not for a moment believe that it was ever contemplated that plaintiff should become the owner thereof for $637.34, less than one-third of its real value. Appellee was entitled to a judgment for the several sums of money advanced by him to appellants under the contract, with interest from the date of such advancement, and a lien on the property conveyed to him to secure their payment, and no more.

For reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

LOCKETT v. LOCKETT.

(Filed June 8, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Life insurance—Beneficiary—Where one, while a bachelor, obtained an insurance upon his life, naming his father as the beneficiary, thereafter marrying and living three months, but before his death he declared to his wife and others in her presence that the insurance was for her benefit that he gave it to her, was such a change in the beneficiary and an assignment of the policy, as to vest the title of it in the wife. The fact that the father of the insured, who was made the beneficiary in the policy, got possession of the policy and collected the money, did not affect her rights to it because he took the policy under promise to collect the proceeds and pay them over to her, and moreover, during the lifetime of the son and after his marriage, the father suggested to him the change in the beneficiary.

2. Same—By provision of section 670, Kentucky Statutes, the insured has the right to change the beneficiary in the policy, and where the insured clearly indicates his purpose to do so, and does such acts as in law amount to a transfer or an assignment of a chose, and where the person named as beneficiary has an insurable interest in the life of the insured, if the insured intends in what he says or does to change the beneficiary of a policy, the law will recognize such change without the application of the insured and the consent of the company to such change.

J. P. O'Meara, J. R. Layman and J. F. Reid for appellant.

Duff & Hutcherson for appellee.

Appeal from Metcalfe Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

William Lockett, while a bachelor, effected an insurance upon his life in a benevolent life insurance company, known as "The Woodmen of the World," in the sum of $2,000. His father was named in the policy of insurance as the beneficiary. Thereafter the insured married appellant. He died about three months after his marriage. His father (appellee) got possession of the policy of insurance from appellant, promising her that he would collect the money and pay it over to her. He did collect, but paid her only one-half of it, after defraying the expenses of the funeral and the last illness of his son.

Appellant sues to recover the balance of the money collected by appellee on the policy, alleging that the insured, in his lifetime, and after his marriage with her, had assigned the policy to her: that is, had changed the beneficiary by substituting his wife for his father. It is conceded that there was no transfer, as required by the rules of the order, nor was it attempted, so far as bringing it to the notice of the order. As to what did occur, the proof clearly shows this: After William Lockett had married appellant, his father suggested to him that he then ought to change the beneficiary of his insurance policy. What response William made to his father is not proven. But shortly afterward he declared to his wife, and to others in her presence, that the insurance was for her benefit, that he gave it to her. He did deliver the policy to her, and she retained it until after his death. He, in his last sickness, which lasted only nine days, mentioned that he wanted to write the secretary of the order and enclose him the fee for making the transfer on their books, and he did attempt to write the letter, but was too weak, and said that he would be better in a day or so, and would then attend to it. Instead, he grew rapidly worse, and died. The principal question is, whether there was a transfer or assignment of this policy by the insured to his wife, so as to defeat the claim of the beneficiary named in the policy.

By statute in this State (section 670, Kentucky Statutes), as well as by the terms of the policy, the insured had the right to change the beneficiary. The beneficiary named originally had no right to prevent the change, nor could the company do so, if the person sought to be substituted by the insured was one of the class permitted by its charter and the terms of the policy. There were but two things necessary to effect a valid assignment or transfer of the policy: First, that the insured should clearly indicate his purpose to do so, and do such acts as would in law amount to a transfer or assignment of a chose; second, the person named as beneficiary or assignee, must have had an insurable interest in the life of the insured under the charter of the company, and in law; that his wife stood in that relation there is no manner of doubt. So, the only question left for determination is, did the insured intend, by what he said and did, to change the beneficiary of the policy and to give it to his wife?

The insured had no other estate whatever, save a few dollars worth of mechanic's tools. He was about twenty-seven years old. His wife was about twenty-two. They were living with her father and mother. It does not appear that she had any estate either. It is clearly proven that the insured recognized his duty to his wife, and her superior claim to his support, by declaring on numerous occasions that this insurance of $2,000 would be a protection for "the little woman" if he should die. He had delivered her the policy with that declaration; that he intended her to have it is quite evident. Nothing in the record shows that he knew how, or what to do, to change the beneficiary in the policy until a few days after his last illness had begun. Then he had a note from the secretary of the lodge to which he paid his dues, suggesting to him that he should make the change by making a written application for it, and sending 50 cents to pay for the transfer on the books of the order. It was then the insured declared his purpose of doing so, but was too sick to attend to it that day.

A life policy is a chose in action. It may be assigned or otherwise disposed of as other choses, subject to the condition that the assignee must have an insurable interest in the life of the insured; must be related by blood or marriage, and be so situated that the assignee or beneficiary has a pecuniary interest in the prolongation of the life of the insured, rather than in its early termination. Conditions annexed to life policies requiring that notice of assignment be given to the insurer, are for the latter's protection. They are not meant to lessen the estate of the insured, or to curtail his right to change the beneficiary of the policy, or to assign it to a person having a legal right to take it. The right to change the beneficiary in, and the right to assign, such life policy are privileges that belong to the insured. They are of equal value to him, and are quite similar, if not substantially the same, in their nature. It is generally conceded and held that the insured may, by parol, assign his life policy to any one having an insurable interest in his life. (Chapman v. McIlwrath, 77 Mo., 88, 46 Am. Rep., 1; May on Insurance, section 889; New York Life Ins. Co. v. Flock, 8 Md., 341, 56 Am. Dec., 742; Maderia Appeal (Pa.), 4 Atl. Rep., 908; Guenther v. Cary, &c., 17 Ky. Law Rep., 1262; Lord v. New York Life Ins. Co., 56 L. R. A., 597.) We are of opinion that the facts show there was a valid and sufficient transfer of the policy to his wife to operate as a change of beneficiary by him.

Appellee not only advised the assignment, and, therefore, consented to it, but after his son's death he ratified it. His change of position after having gotten possession of the policy by his assurances to his daughter-in-law, and having collected the money upon it, takes nothing from the strength of her claim.

The judgment of the circuit court dismissing appellant's petition is reversed and the cause is remanded, with directions to render judgment in her favor for the sum sued for, with interest from the filing of her suit.

YOKLEY, BY, &c. v. SUPERIOR DRILL CO., &c.

(Filed June 8, 1904—Not to be reported).

Lands—Conveyances—Where the wife, who owned one-half interest in a tract of land, caused her interest to be conveyed to herself and her husband, a mortgage upon the land by the husband after the wife's death, can not be defeated on the idea that the wife's mother owned the land and that it descended to her children. By the wife's own act she placed the title to one-half interest in the land in her husband, upon the faith of which he obtained credit and afterwards executed the mortgage; and if she were alive she would be estopped to defeat this mortgage lien, and her children stand in no better attitude than she would stand in were she alive. They took the land by descent from her and they can make no defense to a mortgage that she could not make if living.

G. M. Miller and Spear & Miller for appellants.

Baird & Richardson and V. H. Baird for appellees.

Appeal from Monroe Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

On the 5th of November, 1868, L. A. Smithwick and his wife conveyed by deed 237 acres of land to John Emberton and Ceretha E. Emberton, their daughter. By this deed they conveyed to these parties the life estate, and it was expressly stated that at their death the land was to descend to the bodily heirs of C. E. Emberton. Construing this, it is evident that the grantors, in the use of the words "bodily heirs," meant the children of C. E. Emberton. She died, leaving only two children; a daughter, Lemon, and a son, L. A. Emberton. Their father, John, and these children, after arriving at age, agreed among themselves as to a division of this land, the father taking eighty-seven acres, and the children 150 between them. Conveyances were executed in accordance with this division. At the time of the division, Lemon had married Elmore Yokley, and at her request the conveyance of seventy-five acres, her part, was made jointly to herself and her husband. Afterwards she died, leaving the appellants, her children and her husband, surviving her.

On May 5, 1900, Elmore Yokley becoming indebted to the appellee, Superior Drill Co., in near the sum of $300, executed a mortgage to it to secure the payment of this indebtedness, on his interest in this land. This mortgage lien was enforced, the land sold, and the appellants, his and Lemon Yokley's children, by their guardian ad litem seek to have this sale set aside and have the mortgage declared void, claiming that their father, Elmore Yokley, never owned any interest whatever in this land; that it all belonged to their mother, and that they are the owners of it by descent from her. It is true as contended by appellants, that Ceretha Emberton only owned a life estate and at her death it descended in remainder to her children, Lemon and L. A. Emberton, and that the mother of these children, Lemon, owned one-half thereof in her own right. But in the division and partition thereof it is shown without contradiction that their mother, Lemon, directed the conveyance of her interest to be made to her and her husband jointly. By her own act she placed the title in one-half of her interest in this land in the name of her husband, upon the faith of which it is presumed he obtained credit and afterwards executed this mortgage. If Lemon Yokley were alive she would be estopped to defeat this mortgage lien, and the appellants, as her children, stand in no better attitude. They took the land by descent from her, and they can make no defense to this mortgage that she could not make if living.

Wherefore, the judgment is affirmed.

EMMETT v. MITCHELL-TRANTER CO.

(Filed June 3, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Former appeal—Evidence—Upon a second appeal where the same facts were in evidence except that where labor performed by appellant is not shown to have been within the scope of his employment, or that prior to his injury he had performed this labor except by the direction of his superiors and under their supervision, the judgment will not be disturbed.

M. L. Harbeson for appellant.

W. H. Mackoy and Barker & Woods for appellee.

Appeal from Kenton Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

This cause was before this court on a former appeal and the opinion of the court is in 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1788. After a return of the case to the lower court, and at the conclusion of the plaintiff's testimony, upon the retrial of the case, the court gave a peremptory instruction to find for the appellee and dismissed the petition. From that judgment this appeal is prosecuted. We deem it unnecessary to reiterate the facts, as they are stated in the former opinion. On the last trial the appellant introduced evidence in addition to that presented on the first trial, to the effect that he performed labor at this mill other than as a helper to Weatherwax. But this evidence does not show that the labor he performed when injured, was within the scope of his employment, or that he had, prior to his injury, performed labor on the roof of the mill except by the direction of his superiors and under their supervision. The principles of law as stated in the former opinion apply to this case on the facts as now presented, and the law as expounded in that opinion, must govern this case.

Wherefore, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

MICHAELS, &c. v. CENTRAL KENTUCKY ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE, &c.

(Filed June 7, 1904.)

Inquest—Notice—Compensation—Services of lunatic—Where an inquest of lunacy is held upon a person without notice to him or his presence at the proceeding, it is void, but where he was sent to and kept in the asylum, and was in fact insane, the asylum may receive for necessaries furnished him on a quantum meruit, but in such case where it appears that such inmate was able to labor and was required to and did labor for the asylum, and that his services were worth as much as his keep, there can be no recovery.

Jas. T. Ford for appellants.

Holt & Alexander for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Henry Michaels was found a person of unsound mind by an inquest in the Jefferson Circuit Court without notice to him or his presence at the proceeding. He was committed to the Central Kentucky Asylum for the insane and this suit was filed by it to recover compensation for taking care of him. The proof shows that he was in fact insane and that it was necessary for him to be in an insane asylum. The inquest, being held without notice to him or his presence at the trial, was void. Still, as he was in fact insane, the asylum may recover for necessaries furnished him on a quantum meruit, just as a recovery may be had for necessaries furnished an infant. But it appears in this case that Michaels, while an inmate of the asylum, except for the first few months of his confinement, worked for it, driving a cart, digging a ditch, and doing other such work on the farm run by it, he being a stout man and able to work. When the asylum claims under a quantum meruit for necessaries furnished one who has not legally been found of unsound mind, its claim rests upon the idea that it should be allowed compensation in justice and right for that which it is out on account of the lunatic. If the lunatic's services have been worth to it as much as his keep was worth, it is in fact out nothing. A man who takes care of an infant and seeks compensation on a quantum meruit for necessaries furnished him, would not be allowed anything if it appeared that the infant's services, while being so kept, were of as much value as what he received. The same principle must be applied to the asylum when it comes to claim for keeping one who has not legally been found of unsound mind and committed to it for safe keeping. Where the inquest is legal, then the statute regulates the rights of the asylum. The State in that event requires that the patient be received in the asylum and has regulated by statute on what terms he shall be kept. When the asylum claims in such a case for the keeping of a patient, its claim rests upon the statute, and no allowance can then be made for the labor of the patient, as the statute provides for none. But when the inquest is illegal and void, a different rule must apply, for then the claim of the asylum against the lunatic must be determined wholly on common law principles, and while it may recover for necessaries furnished the lunatic on a quantum meruit, it must credit him on the claim by what it has received from him in labor or otherwise. On all the evidence in this case, we conclude that the labor of the lunatic was of value as much as his board and keep at the asylum during the time sued for, and that no recovery during this period for his keep can be allowed.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the petition.

KLENKE v. NOONAN, &c.

(Filed June 7, 1904.)

1. Parties—Judgment—Conclusiveness—A judgment rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction which has never been appealed from, is conclusive between the parties thereto, not only as to all matters determined by it, but also as to all incidental matters which might have been properly litigated and decided therein.

2. Common law marriage—Offspring—Legitimacy—While common law marriages are forbidden by the laws of this State, yet where the parties reside in another State where such marriages are recognized as valid, and where the parties claiming to be husband and wife are shown by the evidence to have lived together and cohabited and recognized each other as husband and wife, and were so recognized in the community where they resided, and had children who bore the reputed husband's name and were recognized as his legitimate children, such children will be recognized by this court as the offspring of a legitimate marriage.

3. Presumptions of law—In the absence of proof to the contrary, this court will presume that the common law is in force in the State of Ohio.

Myers & Howard for appellant.

M. H. McLean for appellees.

Appeal from Kenton Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

This controversy involves the title and ownership of a house and lot in Covington, Ky., which was owned by William Noonan prior to his death in 1871. His wife, Ann Noonan, and three sons, John, William and Charles Noonan, and one daughter, Lizzie Klenke, survived their father. The appellee, Mary Ellen Noonan, and Thomas Dunn, as next friend of her infant children, Helen and John Noonan, Jr., brought this action in the Kenton Circuit Court on the 30th of December, 1897, in which they allege that the appellee, Mary E. Noonan, and John Noonan did, on or about the 1st of January, 1891, both being at that time residents of the State of Ohio, mutually consent and agree to live together as man and wife, and did thereafter cohabit and live together as such in Cincinnati, O., until the death of John Noonan in July, 1897; that Helen Noonan and John Noonan were born of this marriage and were respectively eight and six years of age; that at the time of his death, John Noonan was seized in fee simple of an undivided one-third interest in the house and lot in controversy; that it could not be divided without materially impairing its value; that Mary Ellen Noonan was entitled to one-third of the interest of John Noonan for life, and her children to the fee simple therein subject to the life estate of their mother, and asked for a sale of the property. The defendant, Lizzie Klenke, for answer to appellees' petition, denied that the plaintiff, Mary Ellen Noonan and John Noonan had agreed with each other to become man and wife, or that they had subsequently cohabited with each other as man and wife, or that as a result of such cohabitation the plaintiffs, Helen and John Noonan, Jr., were born. She alleged that no marriage ceremony had ever been performed between Mary Ellen Noonan and John Noonan, as required by the laws of the place of their residence, or that either of the plaintiffs had any interest in the property in controversy. The defendant, Gus W. Meninger, filed an answer and cross petition in which he alleged that he was the owner of the one undivided one-fourth interest in the property which had belonged to Charles Noonan in his lifetime, by purchase at a judicial sale pursuant to a judgment rendered in an action for the settlement of his estate, and united in the prayer of plaintiffs' petition for a sale of the property. The defendants, Lizzie Klenke and Wm. Noonan, by way of reply to the cross petition of Meninger, said that their father, Wm. Noonan, had devised the property in controversy to his wife, Ann Noonan; and that she had occupied it until her death on the 10th of December, 1893; that her son, Charles Noonan, had died in August, 1892, before his mother, unmarried and without issue, and did not, at the date of his death, have any right, title or interest in the property, and denied that Meninger, by virtue of his purchase, had acquired any interest or title therein. Meninger responded that on the 4th of February, 1897, he brought suit against all the heirs at law of Wm. and Ann Noonan, in which he alleged that their brother, Charles Noonan, was, at the date of his death, the owner of the one-fourth interest in the property in controversy; and that in that action it was adjudged that Charles Noonan was the owner of an undivided one-fourth interest in the property and a judgment of sale entered therein, at which sale he became the purchaser; and plead that the defendants, Lizzie Klenke and Wm. Noonan, were estopped from controverting that he was the owner of such interest. The chancellor found sufficient evidence to support the plea of a common law marriage between appellee and John Noonan, deceased, and sustained her claim; and that of her children and that of Meninger to the undivided one-fourth interest of Charles Noonan, deceased, and the defendant, Lizzie Klenke, has appealed.

We will first consider the issues raised by the pleadings of Meninger as to the interest of Charles Noonan in the property. While appellants, in their reply to the cross petition of Meninger, allege that their father, Wm. Noonan, devised all of his property of every kind to his wife, Ann Noonan, no copy of the alleged will is filed in the record; and it appears from the record of the chancery suit of Meninger v. Klenke, that Charles Noonan was adjudged to be the owner of an undivided one fourth interest in the house and lot in controversy in this action, and that it was sold to satisfy the claim of the appellee, Meninger, and purchased by him; that this sale was confirmed and deed executed to the purchaser. The appellant, Lizzie Klenke, was a party to this suit, and the judgment in that case has never been appealed from, and must be held conclusive, under repeated adjudications of this court, not only as to all matters determined by it, but as to all incidental matters which might have been properly litigated and decided therein. We, therefore, conclude that as to the Meninger branch of this case the judgment should be affirmed.

Since the adoption of the Revised Statutes, there is in this State no such thing as a legal marriage by recognition and cohabitation alone. All marriages to be valid must be solomnized and contracted in the presence of authorized persons or societies. (Estill v. Rogers, 64 Ky., 62) But the question in this case must be determined by the laws of Ohio. Appellee alleged that in Ohio, where the parties lived, that common law marriages are upheld and can be proven by declarations, admissions and cohabitation and general reputation as to the fact. This is specifically denied by answer, and no evidence has been introduced to support the averment of the petition. Section 1640 of the Kentucky Statutes reads as follows: "The unwritten or common law of any of the United States may be proved as facts by parol evidence of one learned in the law, and the printed books of cases adjudged in the courts of sister States may also be admitted as evidence of such law."

In Miles v. Collins, 58 Ky., 312, and Honore v. Hutchings, 71 Ky., 689, it was decided that this court would presume, until the contrary was alleged and proven, that the common law was in force in other States of the Union.

It, therefore, follows that in the entire absence of proof, that the court must presume that the common law on the subject of marriage prevails in the State of Ohio. The question of marriage or no marriage must, therefore, be determined from testimony in the record. No witness has testified to the alleged parol agreement between John Noonan and appellee to live together as husband and wife. But to establish a common law marriage, an express agreement to be husband and wife need not be shown, such agreement may be implied from acknowledgment, cohabitation and reputation when long continued and open. In Re Taylor, 9 Paige's Chancery, 610 (4 New York Chancery Reports,) it was decided that where a gentleman introduced a female, who was previously living with him as a housekeeper, to his friends as his wife, and from that time for a period of eleven years continued to cohabit with her as his wife, holding her out to the world as sustaining that relation to him, and had several children by her, who were called by his name, that these facts were sufficient to authorize a court to presume an actual marriage between the parties by contract in praesenti at the commencement of such matrimonial cohabitation; and that the acts and declarations of the man and the other attending circumstances during their cohabitation together, being parts of the res gestæ, are proper evidence to show the character of their intercourse, whether it was matrimonial or meretricious. In Taylor v. Shemwill, 43 Ky., 536, it was decided that marriage could be established by repute, cohabitation, and living together as man and wife for many years. In Strode, &c. v. McGowan's Heirs, 65 Ky., 621, it was held by this court: "First, that the law presumes that every child in a Christian country is 'prima facie' the offspring of a lawful union of the parents; and that the mother by actual marriage or by cohabitation and recognition was the lawful wife of the father, and in the absence of negative evidence, no supplemental proof of legal marriage would be necessary to legitimate the offspring; that mere rumors were insufficient to bastardize or require positive proof of actual marriage."

In Dannelli v. Dannelli's Adm'r, 67 Ky., 59, this court said: "The mere cohabitation of two persons of different sexes, or their behavior in other respects as husband and wife, always afford an inference of greater or less strength that a marriage has been solemnized between them, their conduct being susceptible of two opposite explanations, we are bound to assume it to be moral rather than immoral, and credit is to be given to their own assertions, whether express or implied, of a fact peculiarly within their own knowledge. The law is unwilling to bastardize children, and throws the burden on the party who alleges illegitimacy, and in the absence of evidence to the contrary, a child eo nomine is, therefore, legitimate, and the presumption of law is not likely to be repelled. It is not to be broken in upon or shaken by a mere balance of probabilities. The evidence for repelling it must be strong, satisfactory and conclusive."

It is shown in this case that John Noonan was an idle, improvident, dissolute person, who largely lived upon the bounty of his family. John Murray, the father of appellee, testifies that he had John Noonan arrested on charge of bastardy, and that in the presence of a magistrate he asserted that he was legally married to appellee and would produce his license in evidence thereof, which, however, he never did; and that he would furnish rooms and take his wife and child to them the next day. Laura Lewing testifies that she kept an apartment house in Cincinnati; that she rented one of her rooms to John Noonan and the appellee, and that they occupied it with their child for five or six weeks; that during this period, Noonan habitually spoke of appellee as his wife, and so introduced her to other lodgers and persons with whom they came in contact. Mrs. Heidel testifies that more than ten years before the death of John Noonan, he and the appellee, shortly after the birth of Helen Noonan, occupied rooms in her house for about six months; and that both of them habitually spoke of each other as husband and wife; and that Noonan introduced appellee as his wife and escorted her to public entertainments. It is also shown by the testimony of quite a number of other persons with whom Noonan associated that he always spoke of appellee as his wife and the infants as his kids. It is also shown beyond controversy, that both of the children always bore the name of Noonan and were known and recognized as his children. While a number of witnesses living in the vicinity of the home of John Noonan's mother and friends of the family, testify that he was an unmarried man, and was so spoken of by the family, this character of testimony is not sufficient to overcome the positive testimony of unimpeached witnesses to the contrary. Upon the whole case we have reached the conclusion that we would not be justified in disturbing the judgment of the trial court.

Judgment affirmed.

TATE v. ILLINOIS CENTRAL RY. CO.

(Filed June 7, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Railroads—Insult to passenger—Peremptory instruction—Duty of agent—Where the evidence shows that appellant was a passenger on appellee's road, had his ticket and was sitting in the depot waiting room by the fire waiting for the train, and was there assaulted by a section boss of appellee's road, cursed and insulted and driven out in the cold and compelled to stay out in the cold until his feet were frosted, and that the window of the room in which the depot agent was at work was open adjoining the waiting room, and the conduct and language of the section boss was loud and boisterous so that it could have been heard by the agent, it was error in the court to give peremptory instructions to the jury to find for appellee, as it was the duty of the agent to protect appellant, and whether he used ordinary care to do so, should have been submitted to the jury under the evidence.

J. C. Speight and H. L. Anderson for appellant.

J. M. Dickinson and Pirtle & Trabue for appellee.

Appeal from Graves Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

The appellant instituted this action against appellee for $1,000 in damages resulting from an assault upon, insult and injury to him, in appellee's depot in Fulton, Ky., while he was a passenger. Upon a trial of the case and after appellant's evidence was heard, the court gave a peremptory instruction to the jury to find for appellee, and judgment was rendered by the court dismissing appellant's petition, and adjudged that he should pay appellee's cost, from which judgment appellant has appealed.

The facts of the case, as they appear of record, are, in substance, as follows: The appellant bought a ticket at Arlington, Ky., to Paducah, Ky. When he reached Fulton, Ky., it was necessary for him to change cars, that is, from one of appellees' trains to another. About the time the train going to Paducah was due to arrive, he went to the depot and entered the waiting room provided for colored passengers, he being a colored man. On entering the depot with his baggage he went to the office window and asked the agent how long before the train for Paducah would arrive, and upon being informed that the train was some minutes late, he thanked the agent and took his seat. In a short while a tall man, wearing a long gum coat and cap, came into the waiting room and said to a crowd of section hands, "get out, bullies, get out, G—d d—n, you, I will take a shot at you directly." He then walked around the stove and said to appellant, "Old nigger, where in the h—l are you going?" Appellant answered, "to Paducah." He said, "have you got a ticket," and appellant said, "yes, sir." He then said, "G—d d—n you, don't give me any of your head, I will blow you up to see you jump up," at the same time pointing his pistol at appellant. This excited the appellant and he arose, but stated that he did not know what for, unless to run, when one of the section men said to this tall man, who was the section boss, "let that man alone, he is a preacher," and he answered, "G—d d—n a preacher, he looks like any other man to me, I will shoot him to see him jump up." He then said to appellant, "you get out of here." Appellant obeyed him and walked around the wall of the room to the front door and passed out. He remained out until the section boss got his hands out by driving and knocking them along. He stated that he then returned to the waiting room and took his seat by the fire, as he was suffering very much from the cold. The section boss returned, and said to appellant, "Old nigger, aint you gone from here yet? I'll bet you by G—d I will kill you. You get out of here and stay out." Appellant then left the room and stayed out until the train arrived. He also stated that the weather was very cold and that by reason of being forced to remain out of doors, his feet were frost bitten so that the skin peeled off of them. Appellant also stated that when he passed out of the door his hat was knocked off, but that he was too far away from the party to receive the force of the blow. Appellant introduced two witnesses who stated that as appellant was leaving the room the section boss struck and kicked at him and drew his pistol. All the witnesses prove that one Bennerman, a colored man, was an employe of appellee and was in the room at the time of both of the assaults and his business was sweeping and cleaning up the inside of the waiting room, waiting on the room generally and keeping up the fires. All the witnesses stated that the window between the ticket office and this waiting room was open all the time that appellant was in and around the depot, and that there was no attempt on the part of any one to save him from the assault, insult and injury. It was proven on cross examination that in the ticket office, which adjoined this waiting room, there were several telegraph instruments in operation, and that they made a considerable noise, from which it might be inferred that the agent could and did not hear the assault and the language used by the section boss. The proof of appellant showed that the noise made by the section boss was much louder than the noise made by the instruments. Appellee also attempted to show that this Bennerman did not have any position at the depot, or any connection therewith, but his only duty was to carry baggage to and from the depot. Some of the witnesses stated that that was his duty at the time of the trial, but at the time of the injury his duty was that of porter, as stated. Appellant also stated on cross examination that he did not complain to appellee's ticket agent and tell him of his ill treatment at the hands of the section boss, and appellee contends that even if he had done so, the ticket agent would not have had time to have prevented it. It is not claimed that the section boss, Boone, was in the discharge of any duty which he owed to appellee when he was guilty of the outrageous conduct toward appellant; the right to recover is not based on that ground.

The action of the lower court in giving the peremptory instruction, seems to have been based upon the idea that there was not any positive proof, showing that appellee's ticket agent had actual knowledge of the assault and injury to the plaintiff.

If there can be a recovery in this case it must be done upon the theory that the appellee was guilty of a breach of duty in the failure of those in charge of the depot to exercise proper care to protect appellant from assault and insult. In the case of Kinney v. Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co., 99 Ky., 59 the court said: "The principles of law applicable to such cases as this are well settled by the almost uniform adjudications of the courts in this country. Carriers are not held to be the insurers of the absolute safety or their passengers, or of their entire immunity from the misconduct of their fellow passengers or of strangers; but there is an implied obligation growing out of the contract between the carrier and the passenger, that the former shall afford to the latter reasonable protection and immunity from insults, violence, and wanton inference of intruders, fellow passengers and the carrier and his servants."

In the case of Clarke, &c. v. Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co., 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1839, the court said: "It is undoubtedly true that the law implies, from the relation of carrier and passenger, a contract that the carrier will use all reasonable precaution necessary, for the purpose of protecting the passenger from violence and insult which may be reasonably anticipated or naturally expected to occur, under the circumstances of the case."

In the case of Winnegar's Adm'r v. Central Passenger Railway Co., 85 Ky., 553, the court said: "The doctrine is now well established that the law implies a contract for the protection of the party carried, from the insult and wanton interference of strangers, fellow passengers and the carrier and its servants, and for every violation of the implied contract by force or negligence, the carrier is liable in an action of contract or tort. The law makes the carrier responsible for the acts of the person in charge of the car and who, for the time has the voluntary custody of the passenger, with the implied obligation that he will exercise the highest degree of diligence to transport him safely."

It will be observed in the cases quoted from that the complaining passengers were upon the cars being transported, and were almost wholly under the care, control and protection of those in charge of the train, and, therefore, there was an implied obligation upon the part of those in charge of the train to exercise the highest degree of diligence to transport them safely. With respect to passengers in the depots, the circumstances are different. They are not so completely under the power and control, and to the same extent, helpless to protect themselves as when upon the cars, yet the same implied obligations on the part of those in charge of the depot, to protect them from insult and injury, exists, but not to the same degree or extent. Ordinary care is sufficient in such a state of case.

It is conceded in this case that the appellant was a passenger, as he was there within thirty minutes before the time the train was due to leave, with a ticket, and with the intention to take passage on it.

In the case of the Illinois Central Railroad Co. v. Laloge, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 693, after discussing the duty of a carrier to licensees, the court said: To the passenger, whether on its trains or at its station, its duty is materially different. It must use every care to prevent their injury, and if it has notice of its passenger being in danger of violence, or indecent treatment, whether at the hands of a fellow passenger or another on its premises or within its control, it must use its best endeavors to protect the passenger. (Kinney v. R. R. Co., 99 Ky., 59.) * * * But still it is his coming to the station within a reasonable time before, with the intention to take the next train, that creates the relation of passenger and carrier.

"But we have in this State what may be regarded as legislative construction of the length of time that should be considered reasonable for the carrier to be required to look out for and safeguard its passengers before they have taken actual passage." The court then quotes section 784 of the statutes, and continues: "The carrier is not an innkeeper. It can not, in the discharge of its other duties required by law, be held to furnish accommodation for the entertainment for an indefinite length of time of those who contemplate in the future becoming its passengers."

If those in charge of appellee's depot knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care, consistent with other duties which they had to perform, could have known of the misconduct of the section foreman in the waiting room, and could by such care have protected appellant therefrom, he may recover, unless the injury was due to a want of care on his own part. In our opinion the appellant introduced some evidence entitling him to have his case submitted to the jury. The proof that the ticket agent was at his post of duty immediately preceding the outrageous and boisterous conduct of Boone; the window between his room and the waiting room being up during the whole of this unlawful conduct; the length of time which elapsed from the time when Boone began to drive his hands from the room and the altercation of words with appellant; his leaving the room and the length of time he remained out in the cold and then returning to the room and the second assault which again drove him from the room, and his remaining out in the cold from that time until the train started, all this was at least sufficient to put upon the appellee the proof to show that it was not responsible by its neglect or want of care, for the insult and injury received by appellant. We are of the opinion that the proof was not sufficient to show that Bennerman exercised any authority over the depot, or that it was any part of his duty to look after the safety and comfort of the passengers, and if such was not a part of his duty, notice to him was not notice to appellee.

Wherefore, the judgment of the lower court is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

DAVIE, &c. v. DAVIE, &c.

(Filed June 7, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Wills—Devise to son for life—Provision as to remainder—Children—Grandchildren—Brother and sister and their children—Construction—Jacob W. Kalfus in his will made the following devise: "I give to my son, Southern Kalfus, for and during his life, and after his death in fee simple to his children or grandchildren, if there should be any living at his death, but if there should be none living, the same shall pass to his brother and his sister and the children or grandchildren, if there should be any living, the following pieces of property, to wit," etc. Southern Kalfus died in 1897 without children or grandchildren, leaving his brother, James S. Kalfus and his sister, Addie K. Davie. James S. Kalfus has no children or grandchildren. Mrs. Davie has two grandchildren, Ada B. and Jessie, the appellants herein, who are children of her deceased son, Southern Davie, who died before Southern Kalfus. Other portions of the will of Jacob W. Kalfus show that he intended by his will to make his three children, Southern Kalfus, James S. Kalfus and Mrs. Davie equal in the division of his estate between them. Held—That the interest of Southern Kalfus devised to him under said will, at his death vested in fee simple in his brother and sister equally, who were both living at the time of the death of said Southern Kalfus.

O'Neal & O'Neal and W. O. Harris for appellants.

C. H. Shield and B. F. Washer for appellees.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

This appeal involves the construction of the following provision contained in the will of Jacob W. Kalfus: "I give and devise to my son, Southern Kalfus, for and during his life, and after his death in fee simple to his children or grandchildren, if there should be any living at his death, but if there should be none living, the same shall pass to his brother and his sister and the children or grandchildren, if there should be any living, the following pieces of property, to wit, etc."

The cause of this controversy arises from the following facts: Southern Kalfus died in 1897, without children or grandchildren, and left surviving him his brother, James Kalfus, and his sister, Addie K. Davie, the appellees to this action. Appellee James S. Kalfus has, at this time, no children or grandchildren, while Mrs. Davie has two grandchildren, Ada B. Davie and Jessie Davie, children of a deceased son, Southern Davie. Southern Davie died before the death of Southern Kalfus. The question here presented concerns the interest taken by James S. Kalfus and Addie K. Davie in the property devised by Jacob W. Kalfus to his son, Southern Kalfus. The appellees contend that by the terms of the will they are vested with a fee-simple title in Southern Kalfus' portion of his father's estate. The guardian of the two children of Southern Davie, grandchildren of Mrs. Davie, asserts an interest in the property, the character and nature of which she does not allege; that is, she does not allege whether they own as joint tenants with their grandmother or whether they take in remainder.

It is a recognized principle, that in the construction of wills there can be no fixed rules applicable to all cases, but the application of all rules of construction must necessarily be varied by the language used by the testator, the object being to arrive at his intention, to be gathered from the entire will. If literal effect be given to the following words in the clause of the will quoted, "but if there should be none living, the same shall pass to his brother and his sister and their children or grandchildren, if there should be any living," it would give these grandchildren equal joint interest with James S. Kalfus and their grandmother, Addie K. Davie. From the whole will, we do not believe the testator intended such a result, nor is there any language used in the will showing that it was the intention of the testator that his children, James S. Kalus and Addie K. Davie, should take a life estate in their brother, Southern Kalfus' portion of the estate, and these grandchildren should take the remainder. The testator, Jacob W. Kalfus, made provision for his three children, and described the property given to each and fixed the value of each piece, and then directed that out of his personal estate they be made equal. It is shown throughout his will that it was his desire that his children receive the same amount of his property, and upon like terms and conditions, unless the literal construction be given to the clause above quoted, in which event his son, James S. Kalfus, and his daughter, Addie K. Davie, would receive a less estate by reason of such provision, than Southern Kalfus would have received had he outlived either of them and participated in their portions. As evidence of this fact, we now quote the provision of the will with reference to his other two children: "I give and devise to my daughter, Adeline K. Davie, for and during her life and after her death in fee simple to her children or grandchildren at the time of her death. But if there should be neither at the time of her death, the same shall pass and go and I so devise it to her brothers or their children or grandchildren that may survive them, the following pieces of property, etc."

The other clause is as follows: "I give and devise to my son, James S. Kalfus, for and during his life and after his death in fee simple to his children or grandchildren, if there should be any living at his death. But if there be none living at his death, the same shall pass to his brother and sister or their children or grandchildren, if there should be any living, the following pieces of property, etc."

It will be observed that the clauses making the devise to his daughter, Addie K. Davie and to James S. Kalfus are in substance and effect the same. The one to Southern Kalfus is the same except the word "and" is used instead of "or" after the words "brother and sister," which literally makes quite a distinction. The question to be determined is, did the testator intend it?

We are of the opinion that he did not. It appears from the will that the draftsman was careless of the use of the words "and" and "or." He often used the word "and" when he meant "or," and vice versa. In the seventh clause of the will the testator openly states that "whatever stocks or bonds or money I may have on hand at the time of my death, my executor shall divide them equally between my children and their representatives, taking into consideration the amount or amounts that each one has received in money and the amounts each one has received in real estate mentioned in this will, so that each one shall be equal."

The testator evidently meant to say, "whatever stocks, bonds and money I may have, etc.," using "or" inadvertently for "and." Also here is a positive declaration on the part of the testator that Mrs. Davie, James S. and Southern Kalfus should take the same quantity and character of estate in the property devised to them by their father; that his desire was perfect equality between them, which could not be obtained if the construction contended for by appellants' counsel be sustained.

The authorities are numerous to the effect that it is within the power and it is the duty of the court, when necessary to effectuate the intention and purpose of the testator, to not only change or transfer "and" for "or," but to transpose words and sentences when absolutey necessary for such purpose. (Robb v. Bell, 12 B. M., 646; Williams v. Williams, 91 Ky., 556; Aulick v. Wallace, 13 Bush, 536; Moore's Adm'r v. Sleet, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 426.)

When a fair and reasonable construction is given to the language employed by the testator in all the clauses of the will, it is not difficult to understand what was intended by the testator in the use of the language employed in the second clause of the will, and this purpose can be ascertained without changing the word "and" to "or."

The devise to Southern Kalfus was made to him for life, and at his death to his brother and sister and their children or grandchildren, if either of them should be dead at the time the property passed from Southern Kalfus. The property was to go to the brother and sister if living at that time, if not, then to the children, etc. The testator evidently knew how to create a life estate, for in each of the devises to his children he expressly stated that he gave the property devised to them "for life," but in disposing of each of the interests in the event of the death of the devisee without children or grandchildren, he directed that such interest should pass to the surviving sister and brother, and, understanding the words necessary to create a life estate, if he had intended that they should take only a life estate, he would have added after the words "brother and sister" the words "for life."

The conclusion we have reached is in conformity with the judgment of the lower court and it is, therefore, affirmed.

O. W. &. A. T. Root and J. T. Thornton for appellants.

J. C. Wright for appellees.

Appeal from Campbell Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

John Cline, a resident of Campbell county, died intestate on the 19th day of August, 1902, the owner of real and personal estate amounting in value to from $350,000 to $400,000. There being, for some reason, delay in granting letters of administration upon the estate, the Campbell County Court, by order of the 26th of August, 1902, duly appointed the appellant, O. W. Root, curator of the decedent's estate, and he immediately took the necessary oath and executed bond as such curator, and at once took charge of the estate, real and personal, which he continued in the possession of until about September 25, 1902.

After the appointment of the curator, the appellee, Fannie W. Green, an heir at law of the decedent, brought suit in the Campbell Circuit Court for a settlement of the estate, all other heirs at law and the curator being made parties to the action, and upon motion of appellee, Fannie W. Green, the case was referred to the master commissioner to ascertain and report the liabilities of the estate, and also the value of the personal property that went into the hands of the curator. The order of reference directed the curator to pay and deliver to the commissioner, all moneys and other personal property in his hands belonging to the estate.

The curator filed response containing a statement of the personal estate that came into his hands as curator, a part of which was $119,146.78, which he found on deposit to the credit of the decedent in the Union Savings Bank and Trust Company, of Cincinnati, O., and which he caused the bank to transfer to his credit as cuartor, but it was continued on deposit in the bank as it was drawing 3 per cent. interest; that he was unable to turn over this sum to the commissioner because of a suit pending in Hamilton county, O., which had been instituted by an administrator of the estate of the decedent appointed by the probate court of that county and State, although the appellee, Fannie W. Green had, after the institution of the suit to settle the estate, duly qualified as administratrix thereof, by appointment of the Campbell County court.

With the exception of the $119,146.78 on deposit in the Cincinnati bank mentioned, the remainder of the personal estate, consisting of money, stocks, bonds and household effects, was paid and delivered by the curator into the hands of the commissioner as directed by the order of the Campbell Circuit Court. In a settlement made with appellant as curator by the commissioner, the former was given credit by certain costs of administration and other sums for taxes against the estate paid by him, which payments, altogether, amounted to something over $1,000. Appellant filed with the commissioner a claim of $1,200 for services performed by him as curator, and also a claim of $1,100 in favor of A. T. Root for services rendered as attorney for the curator. These claims were not allowed by the commissioner, but were reported, together with the evidence introduced by appellants in support thereof, to the court for its action.

These claims were passed upon by the court, but in the judgment rendered in regard thereto appellant, as curator, was only allowed $88.94 for his services as such, and $125 in addition, that sum being the amount paid by him to a security company for becoming surety upon his bond as curator. And A. T. Root was allowed for his services as attorney for the curator, only $50. Of that judgment the appellants, O. T. and A. T. Root, complain.

We are of opinion that the allowances to the curator and his attorney were too small. While it is true that the curator had control of the estate of the decedent only one month, he performed considerable labor in ascertaining the condition thereof, and of what it consisted, his investigations resulting in the finding of some of the money of the decedent in a Cincinnati bank, and some in the banks of Newport. There were also certain stocks and bonds found in one of the Newport banks. An appraisement of the entire personal estate was necessary, and was caused to be made by the curator in the usual legal form. In addition, he had to undertake the labor of looking up and locating the decedent's holdings of real estate, in order that he might ascertain how much of it was in the possession of tenants, and what rents were due thereon, and to collect such as were due and payable. Some of the real estate is situated in the cities of Newport and Dayton, Campbell county, some of it in the city of Covington, some in the city of Cincinnati, O., and some in the State of Florida. Certain rents were collected and accounted for by him as shown by the report of the commissioner

During the time of his curatorship he had the possession and control of money and other personal property belonging to the estate of the decedent, amounting to not less than $142,302.20. Though the larger part of the money was never withdrawn by him from the banks, it was on deposit to his credit, and he was responsible on his bond to the heirs at law of the decedent therefor.

Furthermore, immediately after his coming into possession of the estate of the decedent as curator, proceedings were set on foot by the proper officers, for the assessment for taxation of the entire estate left by the decedent for the years 1893 to 1902, inclusive, and to enforce the payment of taxes thereon alleged to be due the State of Kentucky, county of Campbell, cities of Newport and Dayton, and the district of Highlands in Campbell county, for those years, it being the contention of the officers seeking to collect such taxes, that the property of the decedent had been omitted from assessment and taxation during the years mentioned. The curator and his attorney, according to the evidence, gave especial attention to these tax suits, investigated the law in reference thereto, and made defense by the filing of demurrers, responses and answers, and the cases were all finally settled by the parties after the duties of the curator ceased, upon a basis not essentially differing from that contended for by the curator's attorney in the defense interposed by him.

In consideration, therefore, of the magnitude of the estate that went into the curator's hands, the value of the labor and services performed by him in preserving the same, as hereinbefore mentioned, and in resisting the tax suits, and in view of the responsibility accompanying the carrying out of such a trust as was imposed upon the curator, we are of opinion that he should have been allowed for his services at least $1,000. It appearing from the evidence that the attorney of the curator acted as his legal advisor while he was in possession of the decedent's estate, that he rendered him such services as were needed at the hands of an attorney in its management and preservation, and did all that was necessary in resisting and defending the tax suits instituted against the curator, and, besides, prepared and filed for him in this case the response made necessary by the order of the lower court, which required the curator to settle with and pay to the commissioner the personal estate of the decedent. We are further of opinion that the services of the attorney rendered the curator were and are reasonably worth $500, which sum should have been allowed him by the court.

For the reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with directions to the lower court to set aside so much of the judgment appealed from as fixed the compensation of the curator and his attorney, and in lieu thereof enter judgment allowing O. T. Root for his services as curator $1,000, and to his attorney, A. T. Root, $500 for the services rendered by him.

HARRIGAN AND WHITE v. THE ADVANCE THRESHER CO.

(Filed June 7, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Sales of personalty—Warranty—In an action on a note executed for the purchase price of an engine, the proof showing that the engine was warranted to be in good condition and all right, and that it would do the work of any twelve-horse power engine and that the purchaser relied on these statements, that they had no opportunity to test the engine, and but for these statements would not have bought it, and it turned out that it was not as represented and would not do the work as represented, they were entitled to have their note cancelled

2. Assignment of note—Construction of statutes—By the provisions of section 474, Kentucky Statutes, a note is subject to the same defenses as if it had remained in the hands of the original payee, and appellants are not estopped to deny liability on their note because, after the execution of it they acknowleged liability thereon, the proof showing that throughout the negotiations the agent agreed that the company should be bound on the warranty, in consideration of the execution of the note direct to appellee.

G. W. Whitesides for appellants.

John J. Milliken for appellee.

Appeal from Simpson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

This action was instituted by appellee against the appellants on a note for $300 executed for the purchase price of one "Star engine," purchased by appellants from West Brothers, the note having been executed direct to appellee at the request of West Brothers. The appellants answered the petition of the plaintiff and alleged that at the time and before they made the trade with West Brothers for the engine, West Brothers warranted the engine to be in good condition and all right, and that it would do the work of any twelve-horse power engine; that in buying this engine they relied upon these statements and warranty in making the trade; that they had no opportunity to test the engine as to its condition or power prior to the trade, and that but for these statements and warranty they would not have bought the engine; that they executed the note sued on to the appellee before they had received possession of the engine, with the positive representation and statement of West Brothers that the engine was in the condition and of the character as represented by them, which was made in the presence of one Boyd, the general agent of the appellee, who approved their statements and agreed that appellee would make good the representations and warranty of West Brothers; that in a few days after the execution of the note they received this engine and undertook to operate it and they found that it was not "all right;" that it was not in "good condition;" that it "would not do the work of any good twelve-horse power engine," and that in fact it was of no value; that they bought it for the purpose of running a thresher and corn shredder, which was, at the time, known to West Brothers and appellee, and that it was not in the condition nor did it have the power to run either the thresher or shredder, and it was not fit for any purpose, and that they had been damaged in the way of repairs and other expenses in attempting to run it, in the sum of $160. They asked that their note be cancelled, and tendered the appellee the engine, and asked judgment for $160.

The parties pleaded to an issue, the case was tried in equity, and the court adjudged that appellants pay the note with interest, from which judgment they have appealed. It appears from the proof that the engine was in very bad condition at the time appellants purchased it, that it would not do the work, and did not have the power of any good twelve-horse power engine, nor half that power, and was worthless for the purpose for which they purchased it. It also appears that Tom West, of the firm of West Brothers, and the person who sold the engine to appellants, represented, at the time and before the trade to appellants, that the engine was all right, and that it was in good condition, had the power and could do the work of any good twelve-horse power engine. This proof was without any contradiction, except West stated that he did not warrant or guarantee the engine, but did not deny that he made the representations stated. It was not shown what, in the opinion of Tom West, it took to constitute a warranty. He, in all probability, did not believe that the representations attributed to him amounted to a warranty.

This court, in several cases, has passed upon this question. In the case of McClintock v. Emick, Stomer & Co., 87 Ky., 161, the court held that, while a trade for mules was in progress, the following amounted to a warranty for the soundness of the mules. The purchaser asked the seller, "are they all right?" The answer was, "they are." In that case the court said: "If a person makes a positive affirmation as to the condition of the property, or utters what is equivalent to a promise as to it, instead of expressing a belief merely, then such affirmation or promise amounts to a warranty, and he is liable upon it. It does not depend upon whether the vendor intends to be bound by his warranty or not, but upon whether he made an affirmation as to the condition of the article or merely expressed an opinion as to it." (Lamme v. Gregg, 1 Met., 444.)

In the case of Cook v. Gray, 2 Bush, 121, the court said: "There is a material distinction between a warranty of a chattel on an executed sale and a warranty that articles to be manufactured and delivered in the future shall be of a particular quality. In the former case the purchaser has the right to rely upon the warranty without examination or inspection of the article, and, therefore, may return the article or sue for the breach of warranty, or use it as a defense by way of recoupment."

Upon this authority and the other cases cited in the opinion supra, this being an executed sale, the appellants had the right to retain the engine and make defense by way of recoupment. And if the warranty be proven, the appellants should have a credit on the note for the difference between the price they agreed to pay and the actual value of the engine at the time they received it. Appellee contends that appellants are estopped from making defense to this note because, after the execution of it, they acknowledged their liability thereon, and also because the appellee was an innocent purchaser and holder thereof. The proof shows in this case that appellee's agent originated this trade and aided and induced, throughout the negotiations, the trade to be made, and there is proof, although contradicted, that he agreed that the company should be bound with West Brothers on this warranty, in consideration of appellants executing the note direct to appellee. At all events, the appellee became the owner of this claim by assignment from West Brothers, and, under section 474 of the Kentucky Statutes, it is subject to the same defenses as if it had remained the property of West Brothers. Appellee's plea in estoppel can not avail it, for the reason they do not plead nor show by proof, that by any act or omission of appellants that it has been placed in any more unfavorable position or suffered any loss.

Wherefore, the judgment of the lower court is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

ALMON, &c. v. ELLISON, &c.

(Filed June 7, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Trustee and cestui que trust—Contracts—In this action to set aside a contract which appellants made with the widow of their deceased brother by which they took a transfer of $1,200 bank stock in lieu of their interest in his estate, the remainder of which they owned, the action of the chancellor in denying the relief will be upheld, where the facts show that the widow was left the estate for life with the provision that if the income should not be sufficient to support her, she should sell enough of the estate to provide for herself; that she became a nonresident, appellants saw the estate of their brother becoming exhausted and made a transfer of their interest in it to her for the bank stock, intending to get as much of it as they could and to protect themselves. There appears to be no fraud on her part, the paper which she signed in transferring the stock merely reciting that it was impossible for her to determine the extent of the estate that would be left at her death. Moreover, appellants did not offer to rescind the contract during the life of their brother's widow and the delivery of their bank stock to her.

Little & Slack, W. A. Taylor and L. P. Tanner for appellants.

W. B. Noe and R. L. Greene for appellees.

Appeal from McLean Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

L. E. Almon died, a resident of McLean county, in the year 1888, leaving an estate of about $7,000. He had no children and devised his entire estate to his wife for life, with remainder to his three brothers. He made his wife the executor of the will without bond, and provided that she might use the income for her support, and if at any time the income, which was hers absolutely, was not sufficient to support and maintain her comfortably, she to judge of that, she might sell and use so much of the principal as might be necessary, and for that purpose might make an absolute title to the purchaser. The widow qualified as executor, but returned no appraisement, sale bill or report to the county court, and made no settlement of her accounts. She then married a second time and moved to California. In the year 1898, the three brothers made a contract with her, in writing, by which she turned over to them absolutely, ten shares of bank stock worth about $1,200, and they in consideration thereof released and transferred to her all interest whatever they had in their brother's estate. In less than a year after this she died, and after her death the three brothers brought this suit, charging that the contract which they made with her releasing to her their interest in their brother's estate in consideration of the ten shares of bank stock, was obtained by fraud, and should be set aside.

She had no communication with appellants at all prior to the making of the contract. They employed a lawyer to investigate the condition of the estate, and he being unable to find any inventory or settlement could learn but little about it. In this condition of things he saw W. B. Noe, who was an officer in the bank referred to, and told him about the bank stock. It is clear from the evidence that Noe was not the attorney of the woman in the transaction, but was simply acting on behalf of the bank. The woman made no representations of any kind, and what Noe said was justified by the facts known to him. The paper which the appellants signed contained these words: "Whereas, the said widow has about exhausted the whole of said estate, and has removed from the State of Kentucky, and has again married."

It is said that this statement was a fraud. It is conceded that she had removed from Kentucky and had married again, but it is said that she left them under a misapprehension when she accepted the paper which recited that she had about exhausted the whole of the estate. The paper which the woman signed and delivered to appellants did not contain this recital, but simply recited the fact that it was impossible for her to ascertain what estate of her husband might be left at her death. The proof shows she left an estate in California worth about $8,500; she also left some land in Kentucky, the value of which is not accurately shown. But at the time the settlement was made she was much younger than either of the plaintiffs, was in good health, and a nonresident of Kentucky. She had the right, under her husband's will, to use the principal of the estate for her support if necessary, and of this she was to be the sole judge. She had married a second time and was living with her second husband in California. She had collected the entire personal estate except the bank stock and taken it out there with her. She had sold off some of the land and had been trying to sell the bank stock and the rest of the land. What induced the plaintiffs to make the trade was the hopeless condition they were in and the improbability of their ever being able to find and identify any of the estate of their brother when the widow might die at some future time in California, possibly after they were all dead, as she was younger than they. They made a good trade under the circumstances, judging from probabilities and the usual course of such things. They did not offer to restore the bank stock to her in her lifetime and rescind the agreement, and we are satisfied from all the proof that they could not afford to do so now if she was living. In other words, we are satisfied from the evidence that the plaintiffs could not afford to set aside this contract but for the unexpected death of the woman about a year after it was made. The principle, therefore, that as between trustee and cestui que trusts a contract will be rescinded where a fair disclosure is not made, has no application. The plaintiffs made a chancing bargain, and did what seemed very reasonable under the circumstances surrounding them.

Judgment affirmed.

ROSE v. LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE R. R. CO.

(Filed June 7, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Railroads—Master and servant—Damages—Instructions—In an action by appellant against appellee for damages sustained by having been struck with a pick by D., a fellow servant, while engaged in removing a cross tie, it appearing that the section boss directed D. to help remove the tie while appellant was engaged in an effort to remove it, that D. was drinking, but that fact was unknown to the section boss, there having been nothing in his previous conduct to show it, there was no negligence on the part of the section boss and the action of the trial court in sustaining a motion for a peremptory instruction, was proper.

M. C. Swinford and W. H. Lall for appellant.

J. I. Blanton, Benjamin D. Warfield and E. W. Hines for appellee.

Appeal from Harrison Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Appellant filed this suit to recover for personal injuries received by him while in the service of appellee as a section hand, working under a section boss named Foley. He alleged that his injury was due to the negligence of Foley in this, that while he and two other men were pulling out a tie by sticking their picks into it, Foley, by gross negligence, ordered a number of other men to help pull out the tie and they, in obedience to his order, crowded up to do so; that one of them named Davis was drunk and that Foley knew this or ought to have known it by ordinary care, and that Davis struck the plaintiff with his pick above the left eye in attempting to stick his pick in the tie. At the conclusion of the evidence for the plaintiff, the court instructed the jury peremptorily to find for the defendant.

The action is not rested on the negligence of Davis in striking the plaintiff with his pick, for Davis was a fellow laborer with the plaintiff and the defendant is not responsible to him for Davis' negligence, and so the action is placed entirely on the negligence of the section boss. While there is evidence tending to show that Davis was drunk, and that by reason of his being drunk he negligently struck the plaintiff with his pick, we do not see anything in the evidence tending to show that Foley knew it or ought to have known it. The plaintiff himself did not know it. There had been nothing in Davis' previous conduct tending to show that he was drinking, so far as appears from the proof, and we think it may be inferred from the evidence that he had taken the drinks proven, not long before the accident. But, however this may be, the evidence does not show that the section boss knew he had been drinking or that there was anything in his conduct from which the section boss should have anticipated danger, in ordering him to pull out the tie or help in doing so.

While there is some evidence that a less number of men might have gotten out the tie, still in matters of this sort there must be a considerable margin for judgment, as a railroad track must sometimes be fixed very quickly to avoid delay of traffic, and we do not see that the section boss, in ordering the other men to help in getting out this tie from under the track, should have anticipated that one of them would come up behind another and hit him in the head in broad daylight with a pick in sticking the pick in the tie.

Judgment affirmed.

LITELL v. PETTIT.

(Filed June 7, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Peremptory instruction—Evidence—In an action by appellant for damages against appellee for the conversion of tramway cars, it was error for the trial court to sustain a motion for a peremptory instruction, where it appears there was sufficient evidence to have taken the case to the jury.

R. G. Hill for appellant.

Sweeney, Ellis & Sweeney for appellee.

Appeal from Daviess Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The appellant, George C. Litell, brought this action against the appellee, Thomas S. Pettit, to recover the value of three tramway cars alleged to have belonged to him, and which the defendant had sold and appropriated the proceeds to his own use. The defendant in his answer, denied that he had sold or disposed of any tramway cars, but admitted that he had sold some car wheels and axles for which he had received $19.50, and which he had appropriated to his own use. He further alleged that these car wheels and axles had been left in his possession by one H. E. Miller more than seven years before the institution of plaintiff's cause of action, and he plead and relied upon the lapse of time and statute of limitation, in bar of plaintiff's claim. The averments of the answer as to possession were controverted by reply. Upon the trial before a jury, the plaintiff proved that he had paid a bill as security for H. E. Miller to the Owensboro Savings Bank for $225; and that Miller had transferred to him certain tramway cars owned by him, on the land of R. G. Hill.

H. E. Miller testified that these cars had wheels of heavy iron made to run on poles; that each car had four wheels and a set of trucks; that when he turned over the sawmill which he had rented from the defendant, Pettit, these cars were placed in a building belonging to Hill; that he had sold these cars to the plaintiff. Hardin Shepard testified that the defendant, Pettit, had given to his brother a written order for certain car wheels which he claimed belonged to him at the sawmill, and which he sold to Dall and Groet Zinger, of Owensboro, and that these were the same wheels that were left at Pettit's Station by Miller. John Wright testified that in 1898 he made three tramway cars for Miller, that the wheels were moulded from a special pattern, and that he subsequently bought of Dall and Groet Zinger twelve wheels of the same pattern as those moulded for Miller. Henry Krahwinkle testified that he lived at Pettit Station, and knew the three tram cars that were used by Miller, and that Hardin Shepard carried them away.

At the conclusion of this testimony the trial judge sustained a motion for a peremptory instruction, and to reverse that judgment this appeal is prosecuted. In our opinion there was sufficient evidence of the alleged conversion of plaintiff's tram cars by the defendant, Pettit, to have taken the case to the jury, and the trial court erred in the peremptory instruction.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

CENTRAL KENTUCKY ASYLUM FOR INSANE v. FRY'S COMMITTEE, &c.

(Filed June 7, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Commissioner's report—Weight of evidence—Service of lunatic—Where the finding of the commissioner upon a claim for service of lunatic against an asylum was sustained by the chancellor, though the evidence is conflicting such effect will be given the report of the commissioner as to refuse to disturb the judgment of the chancellor.

Holt & Alexander for appellants.

R. H. Blain for appellees

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

This case is similar in its facts to the case of Henry Michaels v. Central Kentucky Asylum for the Insane, this day decided (ante, 304), and is governed by the principles announced in that opinion. While the proof is very conflicting as to the value of Susan Fry's services, the commissioner to whom the case was referred, fixed their value at $2 a week. The court, on final hearing, overruled the exceptions to the commissioner's report and gave judgment in favor of the asylum for the amount of its claim, subject to a credit for the services of the lunatic as allowed by the commissioner. Giving the finding of the commissioner, which was confirmed by the chancellor, some effect, we conclude that we ought not to reverse the judgment on the facts.

Judgment affirmed.

BOSWORTH, TREASURER v. SHUCK.

(Filed June 9, 1904.)

Claim against treasury—Appropriation exhausted—Mandamus—Ordinarily, when the law recognizes the validity of a claim against the State, it is payable out of any funds in the treasury not otherwise appropriated; but where a claim against the State is payable out of a specific appropriation which has been exhausted, the courts can not, by mandamus, require the auditor to issue a warrant for the claim or the treasurer to pay it.

N. B. Hays for appellant.

B. G. Williams for appellee.

Appeal from Franklin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

On the 30th of July, 1903, the appellee, Finley Shuck, filed his petition in the Franklin Circuit Court against Gus G. Coulter, auditor of public accounts of the State of Kentucky, in which he alleged that he had rendered clerical services as chief of the claims department in the auditor's office from the 1st of March, 1900, until the 1st of March, 1903, under the following written agreement:

"I hereby appoint the Hon. Finley Shuck, of Lebanon, Marion county, to the position in the auditor's office, known as chief in claims department, at a salary of $2,400 per annum. The salary of this place is to commence March 1, 1900.

"GUS G. COULTER, Auditor.

"February 28, 1900."

That the aggregate salary due him therefor was $7,200; that he had received at different times amounts aggregating $5,325, leaving due to him $1,875, and prayed that a writ of mandamus should issue, requiring the defendant to issue a warrant on the treasurer to him for the alleged balance. The defendant answered that the obligation sued on was executed without consideration, and that it was not intended by the parties that the plaintiff should fill the position of chief of the claims department or draw the salary stipulated for, except at the pleasure of the auditor; and that he did pay to the plaintiff $2,400 a year until about January 1, 1901; that after that date he was unable to continue to pay the plaintiff this sum out of the appropriations allowed to the auditor to pay for clerical assistance, and at the same time keep a competent clerical force to conduct the business of the office of auditor, and that this fact was well known to the plaintiff, and that he was paid a reasonable compensation for his services, which was accepted by him; that there was no fund in his hands or in the State treasury out of which the plaintiffs' claim could be paid; the appropriation had been exhausted in the payment for necessary clerical assistance, and asked that the plaintiffs' petition be dismissed. The plaintiff, in his reply, denied the affirmative allegations of the answer, and alleged that $16,200 had been appropriated by the general assembly to pay for clerical assistance in the auditor's office for each year; and that if this fund had been applied by the defendant to the payment of the clerical force in his office alone, there would have been more than sufficient to have paid his claim; but that the defendant had unlawfully diverted $3,000 per annum of the amount appropriated for clerical assistance in the auditor's office, for the payment of salaries to persons employed in the land office; and that there was a sufficient balance of funds appropriated for the clerical force in the auditor's office to pay the balance due to him; that by law only $1,200 was appropriated to the payment of assistants in the land office. The affirmative averments of the reply were denied by rejoinder, and the defendant further alleged that the office of register of the land office had been abolished, and that by the act of March 11, 1898, the duties imposed on the register of the land office, were transferred to and made a part of the duties of the office of auditor. On the 3d day of October, 1903, an agreed judgment was entered in this action, directing the auditor to draw his warrant on the State treasurer in favor of the plaintiff for $1,500. On the 25th of January, 1904, the appellee, Shuck, brought this action against the appellant, H. M. Bosworth, as treasurer of the State of Kentucky, for a mandamus requiring him to pay the $1,500 warrant which had, in the meantime, been issued pursuant to the judgment in the former action. The defendant answered that the appropriation made by the general assembly for clerk hire and clerical assistance in the auditor's office, for each of the years covered by plaintiff's term of service, had been exhausted by Coulter, before the issuance of the warrant sued for; that in fact, he had overdrawn the gross appropriations for this purpose for these years $2,143.82, before the warrant sued on was issued by the auditor; and that no appropriation had been made by law for the payment thereof; and that there was no funds in the treasury available for its payment, and asked that the petition be dismissed. Plaintiff, in his reply to the answer of Bosworth, as treasurer, plead the judgment in the suit of Shuck v. Coulter, as an estoppel to the defense relied on by Bosworth. The case being submitted on the pleadings, it was adjudged that the defendant, as treasurer of the State of Kentucky, should pay the amount of the warrant, and the defendant has appealed.

The only question for decision is whether the appellant, as treasurer, can be required by mandamus to pay the warrant of appellee for clerical services rendered the auditor, after the appropriation for that purpose had been exhausted in the payment of previous warrants for similar services. By sections 188, 139, and subsection 4 of section 4001a, of the Kentucky Statutes, the auditor of public accounts is allowed $17,400 to enable him to employ and pay such clerks as he may deem necessary for the proper discharge of the business of his office, including the duties formerly performed by the register of the land office. The selection of the clerical force for the proper conduct of the business of the auditor's office, and the fixing or apportioning of their respective salaries is left to the sound discretion of the auditor, but the aggregate of such salaries, can not lawfully exceed the amount appropriated therefor by the general assembly. By section 144 of the Kentucky Statutes, he is required to keep an account between the Commonwealth and her civil officers to whom salary or wages are payable out of the treasury. Section 4688 provides "that no money shall be paid out of the treasury except upon the warrant of the auditor drawn upon the treasurer, and then only by check of the treasurer upon a designated depository; and that no such check shall be given by the treasurer, even though the auditor issues a warrant therefor unless the law under which the money may be claimed expressly directed and ordered that it shall be paid out of the public treasury."

It is not necessary for us to determine in this action what may be the ultimate liability of the State under the agreed judgment in Shuck v. Coulter, Auditor. All that was decided in that case was that appellee had a valid claim for $1,500 for clerical services rendered the auditor, and that warrant should issue therefor. When payment of the warrant so adjudged is demanded of the treasurer, he responds that the specific appropriation for the liquidation of claims for clerical services in the auditor's office had been exhausted previous to the issual of appellee's warrant; and that there were no funds in the treasury out of which such warrant could be lawfully paid by him. Ordinarily, when the law recognizes the validity of a claim against the State, it is payable out of any funds in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, but a wholly different rule prevails where a claim against the State is payable only out of a specific appropriation, which has been exhausted.

When this state of case is shown to exist, courts can not, by mandate, require the auditor to issue a warrant for the claim, or the treasurer to pay it. (Troop's Public Officers, sections 823-824; Western v. Daine, 51 Me., 631; Kentucky v. Boutwell, 13 Wallace, 526; United States v. Bayard, 127 U. S., 251; Paige, Superintendent, 85 Cal., 50; People v. Hyde Park, 117 Ill., 462.)

For reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

WATER SUPPLY CO. v CITY OF GEORGETOWN.

(Filed June 10, 1904—Not to be reported.)

In the controversy between the parties to this action as to their respective rights to the use of the water from what is known as the Royal or Republican Spring in the city of Georgetown, the court holds: First. That under the evidence and previous adjudications, that at the time John Nichols and his associates obtained their grant from the city of Georgetown, the entire title to the spring was in the city of Georgetown and J. D. Grover, and that Nichols and his associates, by their grant from the city and from Grover, obtained a perfect title to the perpetual use of the spring, and that the appellee, Georgetown Water, Gas, Electric and Power Co. has succeeded to all the rights of Nichols and his associates. Second. Whatever right the appellant, Water Supply Co. obtained under its deed from Montgomery, are subject to the prior rights of the appellee, Georgetown Water, Gas, Electric and Power Co., and when it comes to its permit from the city of Georgetown which was granted long after the grant to Nichols and his associates, it has only "permission to tap the spring branch by an underground pipe run from the power house, now occupied by the Georgetown Water Co., or along Water street and through the ground occupied by the ice company." This permit does not specify the point at which the ice company may tap the spring branch, and the court can not add to its terms. It may tap it any where it pleases within the limits specified in the ordinance, but may not run its pipe into the spring; that is, it must place its pipe below the point where the water ripples in leaving the pool of the spring. Third. The petition of the city of Georgetown, so far as it claims to be the entire owner of the spring, is dismissed without prejudice.

Victor F. Bradley and Montgomery & Lee for appellant.

J. B. Finnell for appellee.

Jas. F. Askew for Georgetown Water, Gas, Electric and Power Co.

Appeal from Scott Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

There is a large spring at Georgetown, known as the Royal or Republican spring, on which the city depends largely for its water supply. This controversy arises between appellants and appellees as to the right to take water from the spring. The facts in regard to the title to the tract are thus stated by this court in the case of Floyd v. Adams, 8 Ky., 72: "On the 9th of February, 1781, John Floyd and Stephen Trigg entered into articles of agreement, whereby the former agreed to convey to the latter one thousand acres of land in Fayette county, on Elkhorn, the place whereon M'Clellan's fort stands, and five hundred acres adjoining thereto, for and in consideration of Trigg's settlement and pre emption on Harrod's Creek, and eight hundred acres on Gist's Fork of Brasheer's Creek. Tirgg was the next year killed by the Indians, and in the year following Floyd was also killed, but had previously made his will, whereby he directed his executors therein named, to convey to the heirs of Trigg, 'one thousand acres of land in Fayette, called the 'royal Spring tract.' Some time thereafter, Cobb filed his bill in the former supreme court for the district of Kentucky, alleging that he had purchased from Trigg in his life time, the tract of 1,000 acres, known by the name of the 'Royal Spring Tract,' to which suit he made Trigg's heirs and Floyd's executors, defendants, and prayed that the conveyance should be made to him. On a final hearing of the cause, that court decreed Floyd's executors to convey to Cobb, and a conveyance was accordingly made by them. Cobb afterwards conveyed to Craig, who sold and conveyed distinct parcels to different individuals."

No paper title on behalf of the city of Georgetown to the spring is produced, but it is shown that, as a matter of right, as far back as the memory of any living witnesses go, the citizens of the town used it to get water. It is also shown from some old burned or charred papers in the clerk's office of the Scott Circuit Court, found among the burnt records in a suit between the heirs of Craig, that it was pleaded in that suit that Craig laid off and established the town and had a plat of it made, and that a piece of ground was left as a public ground near the spring and east of it as a watering place for wagons and teams, and in these pleadings it is stated that the middle of the Big or Royal spring or branch, was the western boundary of the town according to its meanderings. By an act of the legislature, approved February 11, 1835, the boundary of the town is stated as follows: "Beginning at a point known as the beginning of the boundary of the town at the head of the Republican spring (here follows several calls); thence up the middle of said branch to the middle of the head; thence around with the head of the spring to the beginning point of the Republican spring."

On the other hand, appellants also claim under Craig. One of his devisees named Pitts conveyed to W. B. Keene; Keene devised to Richards; Richards conveyed to Grinstead; Grinstead to Graves; Graves to Payne; Payne to Grover; Grover to Montgomery and Montgomery to appellants. In these deeds, so far as they are copied in the record, the land conveyed is bounded as follows: "Beginning at a point in the middle of the Georgetown and Frankfort turnpike in line with the west wall of Big Spring Branch * * * thence * * * to middle of Big Spring; thence with line of west wall of Big Spring Branch N. 7¾ E. 9 10-100 chains to the beginning."

It also appears that when Dr. Keene lived on the land, which after his death went to his grandson, Keene Richards, he said that the spring belonged to the town; he was then living on the tract west of the spring and there was at that time a partition wall that ran up through the head of the spring, which Dr. Keene said he had put there so he could fix for his milk and butter. He had a spring house which constituted part of the wall and he watered his stock on the west side of the wall. Just when this wall was placed there, nobody introduced as a witness is old enough to say, although some of the witnesses are over seventy years of age. There was an opening in the wall for the water on the west side to get out into the branch. After Dr. Keene's death and the property had fallen to his grandson, Keene Richards, Richards continued to water his stock at the spring, a neighbor suggesting to him why he did not get a force pump and force it up to his stable; he answered, "I don't know whether the town would let me do it or not to water my stock." The wall remained through the middle of the spring until the year 1889, when they had an epidemic of typhoid fever in the town, and the physicians thinking that the watering of the stock at the spring might befoul the water, made an arrangement with Payne, who then owned the Keene place, by which, with his consent, the town tore out, at its expense, the old wall running up through the middle of the spring, or a little west of the center, and made for Payne a watering place for his stock lower down on the branch. But this was all by consent, within fifteen years before this suit was brought, and there was then no controversy between the parties as to their rights in the spring. The old wall had then stood where it was, beyond the memory of any of the witnesses, perhaps for more than half a century. About this time John Nichols and others made a contract with the city to erect waterworks and supply it with water, and in this contract the city granted to them, among other things, the use of a lot described in the deed, also "the right to take water from the Big Spring Branch along the line of this lot, and also to pump out and take water from the head of said Big Spring." But it was stipulated: "The right to pump water out of Big Spring Branch and the head thereof, as above described herein, is perpetual, but not exclusive."

Nichols and his associates also obtained a lease from Grover, who then owned the Keene place, by which Grover leased to them "his portion of the spring in Georgetown, Ky., known as the Big Spring, for the purpose of using the water of said spring in supplying water for waterworks about to be put up in the town of Georgetown, and this lease is to continue as long as said Nichols or his assigns shall keep up waterworks in the town aforesaid; and in consideration of the lease of said spring aforesaid, the said Nichols agrees and binds himself to run a water pipe and put in a hydrant to the same, at any point said Grover may designate between the dwelling and stable on the farm of said Grover and furnish during the entire continuance of this lease, water to said Grover, without any expense or charge to him, through said pipe and hydrant, but whenever said Nichols or his assigns shall cease to furnish said water, then this lease to be null and void."

The appellee, the Georgetown Water, Gas, Electric and Power Co., has succeeded to all the rights of Nichols and his associates. In the deed from Montgomery to appellants, under which they claim there is this stipulation: "It is understood and agreed by the parties hereto that so far as release to the use of water by the second party in so much of the Royal Spring as is embraced in the aforesaid boundary, the same is subject to any right, real or supposed, that may have been conveyed by J. D. Grover, in writing from him to John Nichols, of date June 1, 1889, and recorded in deed book 25, page 124."

Appellants claim under this deed; they also claim under a permit from the city, which, so far as material, is as follows: "Whereupon the Georgetown Street Railway and the Georgetown Ice Co. having made their application for and the same being considered and the council advised, on motion it is ordered that the said companies be and are granted a permit to erect a brick, metal roof power house, car house and factory buildings on Water street, southeast of the Big Spring in the city of Georgetown, Ky., and said companies are also granted permission to tap the spring branch by an underground pipe run from said power house through the grounds now occupied by the Georgetown Water Co., or along Water street, and through the grounds now occupied by the said ice company."

In dry weather the spring gets low. The Electric Light and Water Co. has a pipe running into the head of the spring through which it pumps water from it for its use. Near by appellants, the ice and street railway companies, have another large pipe through which they pump water from the spring for their use, and in times of drouth on two occasions there was a scarcity of water to supply the demand, although it does not seem actually to have failed at either time. The city of Georgetown brought this suit to enjoin appellants from taking water from the spring. The Electric Light and Water Co., on its motion, was made a party to the action. On final hearing the court enjoined appellants from taking any water from the spring, adjudging that the spring and the branch leading therefrom was wholly the property of the city. He also adjudged that appellant should not tap the spring branch at a point less than 200 feet north of the north line of College street, and that the city of Georgetown might build a dam at a point not exceeding 195 feet north of the north line of College street, and that the waste water from the ice plant should be piped back into the spring branch not less than 200 feet north of the north line of College street. From this judgment the ice company and the street railway company appeal.

The proof on the trial showed that running back for many years the town council had made appropriations for cleaning out the spring and keeping it in order, and that east of the spring there was a space used as a common over which teams and others approached the spring, or which were used by the public in connection with it in different ways. But there never appeared to be any question raised as to the part of the spring which was walled off to Dr. Keene, or those claiming under him. Some years ago A. K. Lair, who owned a mill on the spring branch, brought a suit against the town and the water supply company, charging that they were using more of the water by withdrawing it from the stream for manufacturing and other purposes, than they reasonably had a right to, to the damage of his mill, as the supply of water coming to the mill was thus reduced. In answer to this suit, the town alleged as follows: "That the Big Spring is within the town of Georgetown, and the stream therefrom for a long distance flows through said town, and that the spring is owned by said town, and the said town has owned it for one hundred and three years, and has owned the east bank of said stream for said time, commencing at the head of the stream and running northwardly ——— yards; that said spring and east bank were, in the laying out of the town, dedicated to said town and all of its inhabitants by the original proprietor, Elijah Craig, and the defendants state that the town of Georgetown was located where it was located, because of said spring, and that said town and all the inhabitants thereof, during all the time have claimed the right to use and have used the water for all purposes to which water could be applied, and have so openly, notoriously and adversely to all the world."

Appellant, the ice company, was defendant to this action, and filed an answer adopting as its own the answer of the city. The suit was afterwards settled and Lair is not a party to this action. It is insisted, however, that the ice company is estopped here by its adoption of the answer of the city in that case. But an estoppel never arises unless the adverse party relying on it has been misled to his prejudice. The city of Georgetown and the ice company were not adversary parties in that case. The ice company was withdrawing water from the spring branch above Lair's mill under its permit from the city. The city claimed authority to give the permit and to control the water as permitted by it. As the ice company claimed under the permit of the city, it was proper that it should rely upon the defense made by the city. In doing this, it could not have misled the city to its prejudice, and it is not estopped in this case between it and the city to show a title independently of the permit of the city. For in the suit with Lair, all that it was required to do was to make a defense to Lair's suit. It was not required to set up facts not necessary to the defense of that suit.

It will be observed that previous to the year 1889 the Royal Spring was divided by the old stone wall, and that when Nichols and his associates were preparing to erect the waterworks, they obtained a grant from the city of the right to take water from the spring, and also obtained from Grover, who then owned the Keene place, a lease of his portion of the spring for the purpose of using the water in their waterworks. At this time, undoubtedly, the entire title to the spring was in Grover and in the city of Georgetown, and so Nichols and his associates obtained a perfect title, as their grant was from both the title holders. It will also be observed that when Montgomery came to convey to appellants the grant was expressly made subject to the right conveyed by J. D. Grover to John Nichols and his associates in the year 1889. Whatever rights, therefore, they obtained under the deed from Montgomery, are subject to the prior rights of Nichols and his associates which have passed and now belong to the electric light and water company. They can not, therefore, under their deed, exercise any rights in the spring to the prejudice of the rights of the electric light and water company. And when they come to their permit from the city, which was also granted long after the grant to Nichols and his associates, they only have "permission to tap the spring branch by an underground pipe run from said power house through the ground now occupied by the Georgetown Water Co., or along Water street and through the ground now occupied by the said ice company." The purpose of the council in thus limiting its permit seems to have been to avoid the conflict that might arise if the ice company was authorized to run its pipe into the spring; for then there would be no way to determine in time of scarcity, whether there was a surplus of water for the ice company over and above what the water company needed, and there might be contention and trouble between them; one insisting that there was plenty of water, and the other that it was prevented from properly discharging its duties to the public. The council desired evidently a water supply so that the waterworks would afford fire protection as well as furnish citizens with water for their own use. It, therefore, devise a self-regulating guage to determine when there was a surplus of water beyond the needs of the water company. The water company took its water from the spring. When there was a surplus it would run out of the spring down the branch. This surplus, after it left the spring, the ice company was permitted to use. The permit does not specify the point at which the ice company may tap the spring branch, and the court can not add to its terms. The ice company may tap the spring branch at any point it pleases by its underground pipe, within the limits specified in the ordinance, but it may not run its pipe into the spring; that is, it must place its pipe below the point where the water ripples in leaving the pool of the spring, for it must tap the spring branch, and not the spring; but beyond this, its rights are only limited by the permit to the location of its pipe through the ground then occupied by the Georgetown Water Co., or along Water street and through the ground then occupied by the ice company.

We do not find it necessary in this case to determine whether the city of Georgetown only owns to the center of the spring, or whether Keene and those claiming under him owned so much of the spring as was included within the old stone wall or covered by the deeds under which they held. Appellants are exercising no rights in this part of the spring, but are piping the water from the east side under their permit from the city. There is nothing in the pleadings or in the proof warranting a judgment as to a dam across the spring branch or as to the point at which the waste water from the ice factory shall be piped back into the spring branch. The petition of the city of Georgetown, in so far as it claims to be the absolute owner of the entire spring, is dismissed without prejudice. Judgment will be entered in favor of appellees enjoining appellants from running their pipe above referred to into the spring or pumping any water through it from the spring, but allowing them, in the language of the permit, "to tap the spring branch by an underground pipe run from said power house through the ground now occupied by the Georgetown Water Co., or along Water street and through the ground now occupied by the said ice company."

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for a judgment as herein indicated.

SHINDLER, COUNTY JUDGE v. FLOYD, &c.

(Filed June 10, 1904.)

Local option election—Contest board—Kentucky Statutes, section 1534, provides that the county judge and two justices residing nearest the courthouse, in each county, shall be a contest board in contested elections of county officers, except members of the legislature; section 2566, Kentucky Statutes, part of the local option law, provides that in local option election, a contest shall be heard by the same board, which, by law, is authorized to determine a contest of an election for county officers; by section 18 of the election law of 1898, the county board of election commissioners is made a contest board in lieu of the county judge and two justices, and the election law of 1900 repealed the provision of the law making the county board of election commissioners a board of contest, and conferred jurisdiction upon the courts to try election contests of certain officers. Held—That as the legislature, in effect, wrote in section 2566 of the local option law, that a contested election under it should be determined by the county judge and two justices of the peace, the acts of 1898 and 1900, did not repeal it, therefore the county judge and two justices nearest the courthouse constitute the contesting board in a local option election contest.

Willis & Todd, John Speed, L. W. Ross, R. L. Greene and G. H. Briggs for appellant.

John S. Kelley and Reasor & Grume for appellees.

Appeal from Spencer Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

A local option election was held in Taylorsville, and the result was duly certified. More than ten citizens and legal voters of the town proposed to contest the election and filed a written statement of the grounds of contest. They proposed to contest it before G. B. Shindler, county judge of Spencer county, and J. W. Snyder and B. L. Lutz, justices of the peace, living nearest to the courthouse. These officers appeared and after considering the question, decided that they did not, under the law, constitute a board of contest to try the contested election and refused to act; thereupon the contestants instituted this proceeding, and seek to compel them to do so by mandamus. To determine this question involves the necessity of examining to some extent the statutes with reference to contested elections, etc.

Section 1534, Kentucky Statutes (1899 edition, and it is part of the act of 1892, as amended on February 24, 1894,) reads as follows: "The judge of the county court and two justices of the peace residing nearest the courthouse in each county, shall be a board, with like powers as those named in the last section, for determining the contested election of any officer elective by the voters of the county, or any district therein, except members of the general assembly, and also of any police judge, clerk, marshal, or other elective municipal officers, where there is no other provision of law for determining the contested election of such municipal officers." * * *

It will be observed that this statute constitutes the judge of the county court and two justices of the peace residing nearest to the courthouse a board of contest to determine the contested election of any officer elective by the voters of the county, and also of any police judge, clerk, marshal, or other elective municipal officer, where there is no other provision of law for determining a contested election of such municipal officers. It is certain from the language of this section that this board was only authorized to determine the contested election of officers. No jurisdiction is conferred upon that board to determine a contest of an election held for the purpose of determining whether the local option law should become operative, or whether the prohibition law should become inoperative. Thus the matter stood until 1894, when the legislature enacted a law which provided that a local option should be contested, and that provision is part of the local option act, and in section 2566, Kentucky Statutes (1903 edition), it reads as follows: "The contest shall be heard and determined by the same board which, by law, is authorized and empowered to hear and determine a contest of an election for county officers." * * *

By section 18 of the election law of 1898, the county board of election commissioners is made a board of contest in lieu of the county judge and two justices of the peace, and this board was only authorized to determine the contested election of certain officers. There is nothing in the act showing an intention of the legislature to confer jurisdiction on this board to try a contested election growing out of an election under the local option law. The election law of 1900 repealed the provision of the law making the county board of election commissioners a board of contest, and conferred jurisdiction upon the courts to try contested elections of certain officers. It will be observed that the legislature enacted separate and distinct statutes relating to contested elections of officers from the statute providing for a contest of an election under the local option law.

The question here for determination is, did the provision of the statute conferring jurisdiction upon the county judge and two justices of the peace to try contests of local option elections, remain in force. When section 2566 was enacted, the general assembly in effect, wrote into it that the contests shall be heard and determined by a board consisting of the judge of the county court and two justices of the peace residing nearest the courthouse. The act of 1898, as we have said, only conferred jurisdiction upon the board of county election commissioners to try contested elections of officers. The act of 1900 only provided that such contests should be tried in the courts. As the general assembly in effect, wrote in the section of the local option law that a contested election under it should be determined by the county judge and two justices of the peace, it is evident that the acts of 1898 and 1900 did not repeal it, because no reference is made to the act; therefore it was not in terms repealed, and as the acts did not relate to the subject of contested elections under the local option law, it can not be held that it did so by implication. If the words had been actually written in the statute, which we have said in effect were written therein, no one would contend that the acts of 1898 or 1900 repealed it. The office of county judge still exists, likewise the office of justice of the peace, hence the incumbents of these offices may compose the board to determine contested elections held under the local option law, although the jurisdiction has been taken away from them to try contested elections of officers. We have reached the conclusion that the county judge and two justices of the peace compose the board to try the contested election in question.

The judgment is affirmed.

SEVEN HILLS CHAUTAUQUA CO. v. CHASE BROS. CO., &c.

(Filed June 10, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Principal and agent—Authority of agent—Where, by the terms of employment of an agent to sell trees, it was expressly stipulated that he was not to make any agreement or promise of any kind, verbal or written, other than those entered upon the regular order blanks of his company, a contract entered into with a purchaser by him in excess of the authority thus conferred upon him, which was not accepted by his employers, will not be enforced.

2. Same—In the absence of special authority to bind a principal, a drummer can merely solicit and transmit the order, and the contract of sale does not become complete until the order is accepted by the principal.

L. P. Tanner for appellant.

Powers & Anderson for appellees.

Appeal from Daviess Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The appellant, the Seven Hills Chautauqua Co., a Kentucky corporation, brought this action against Chase Bros. Co., a New York corporation, doing business as nurserymen at Rochester N. Y., to recover $375 in damages for an alleged failure to deliver to them at Owensboro, Ky., five hundred Carolina poplar trees during the season of 1902, in compliance with the following written contract:

"For and in consideration of $125 Chase Bros. Co., Rochester, N. Y., party of the first part, agrees to sell, with the provisions set forth below, to the Seven Hills Chautauqua Co., party of the second part, five hundred Carolina poplar trees F. O. B. Owensboro, Ky., described as follows: Trees to be uniform in size, first grade, not less than twelve feet long, nor three inches in diameter at base, and to be three years of age. Party of first part agrees that all trees dying shall be replaced by live trees at the end of twelve months. The party of the second part, Seven Hills Chautauqua Co., agrees to pay party of the first part $100, the amount named as consideration, upon the delivery of said trees in accordance with the terms of the above contract. The party of the first part, Chase Bros. Co., agrees that party of the second part, the Seven Hills Chautauqua Co., shall retain $25 of the consideration above named for seven months, as guarantee of the fulfillment of the terms of this contract.

"October 30, 1902.

"CHASE BROS. CO.,
"By C. V. BARNES, Agent.
"SEVEN HILLS CHAUTAUQUA CO.,
"By W. G. ARCHER, Super."

The defendant, in its answer, alleged that it was engaged in the business of growing and selling fruit and other ornamental trees and flowers in Rochester, N. Y., and that it sold the products of its nursery through drummers, on orders from persons desiring to purchase their goods, and which were always subject to their acceptance or refusal; that C. V. Barnes was one of their drummers; that it received from him in due course of mail on one of their order blanks an order signed by the plaintiff, asking it to ship to the plaintiff five hundred Carolina poplar trees, three years old, twelve feet high and three inches in diameter at base; that accompanying the order was a copy of the alleged contract filed with plaintiff's petition; that it refused to accept the order or sign the contract, and immediately gave notice thereof to the plaintiff and returned the order and copy of the contract to Barnes. They further allege that Barnes had no authority to sign its name to the contract filed with plaintiff's petition, or to agree for it to ship or deliver the trees therein contracted for, and that these facts were well known to the plaintiff; that the limit of his authority was to solicit and transmit orders to them for their acceptance or rejection; and that this fact was well known to the plaintiff. The pleadings were made up by reply and rejoinder. Upon the trial of the case before a jury, the circuit judge directed a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff has appealed.

A copy of the contract evidencing the terms of C. V. Barnes' employment by Chase Bros. Co. appears in the record, and it is expressly stipulated therein that he was not to make any agreement or promise of any kind, verbal or written, with a customer, other than those entered upon the regular blank orders of the company, and which were required to be signed in duplicate by the customer, one of which was to be forwarded to the nursery company in New York, and the other left with the customer. On the 31st of August, 1902, Barnes wrote to the nursery company for prices on one thousand Carolina poplar trees to be consigned to appellant in the fall, requesting that the height and diameter of such trees should be given. The company responded that they would furnish one thousand selected Carolina poplar trees, eight to ten feet high, for $275, or the same number from five to eight feet high, for $185, to be paid for in cash on delivery. This letter was shown to the plaintiff. On September 15, 1902, the company in response to a letter from Barnes asking a reduction of the price, offered to furnish one thousand Carolina poplar trees, eight to ten feet in height, for $250, to be paid for in cash. This letter specified that these trees would measure from one and three-fourths to two and one-fourth inches in diameter, three inches above the ground. On September 22, 1902, Barnes, at the request of plaintiff, wrote the company for information as to the size of their four-year-old trees, height and diameter, and for prices thereon. In response to this letter, the nursery company advised against the use of four-year-old trees for various reasons. It is also shown that they had no poplar trees four years old, or poplars three inches in diameter at the base. It is shown that Barnes was simply a traveling salesman for the appellee, without authority to do more than solicit orders for the products of the nursery, which were always subject to their approval. It also appears that appellant knew the instruction which had been given to Barnes by the nursery company, as to the prices and size of the poplar trees, which they were willing to furnish to them, and that the trees stipulated for in the contract were of a much larger and more valuable character. In fact, the proof shows that such trees sold at $1 each at the nursery in Rochester.

In Charles Brown Grocery Co. v. Beckett, &c., 22 Ky. Law Rep., 398, this court quoted and approved the rule laid down in 6 A. & E. En. of Law, 2d edition, 227, as to the authority of drummers to bind their principals; it is in these words: "In the absence of special authority to bind their principals, the drummer can merely solicit and transmit the order, and the contract of sale does not become complete until the order is accepted by his principal." John Matthews Produce Co. v. Rentz, 29 Ky. Law Rep., 1528.)

We think these cases are conclusive of the one at bar, and that the trial court properly instructed the jury to find for the defendant.

Judgment affirmed.

COURT OF APPEALS OF KENTUCKY.

WILSON v. THE ALPINE COAL CO.

(Filed June 10, 1904.)

1. Pleading—Sufficiency of petition—In an action by one employed as a surveyor in locating an entry to a coal mine, and who was injured by the falling of coal and stone from the roof of the mine, an allegation in plaintiff's petition for damages, "that by the carelessness and negligence of the defendant and the superintendent and those in charge and control of the mine, large quantities of slate, and stone lying about the vein of coal in the entry thereof, where plaintiff's duties called him, where the coal had been removed, had become loose and unsafe and dangerous to persons entering said mines, with no support thereunder," were sufficient to sustain his action.

2. Cured by answer—Even if these allegations were insufficient in failing to allege that the defendant knew of the dangerous condition of the mine, they were cured by the answer which averred that the plaintiff had notice of the dangerous condition of the mine, and was notified not to place himself at the point where he was injured.

3. Relative duties of servant and master—It was not the business of the plaintiff in the performance of his duty to inspect the mine, and he had the right to rely on the defendant to perform that duty and keep the mine in a reasonably safe condition, and this duty is personal to the master and can not be delegated to another.

Virgil P. Smith and W. A. Morrow for appellant.

O. H. Waddle for appellee.

Appeal from Pulaski Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

Appellee operates a coal mine. Appellant was an employe of the appellee and was assisting an engineer in the employ of appellee in surveying and locating an entry in the mine and in fixing the courses and distances for the information of those engaged in mining coal. The employment of appellant was that of a common laborer and he performed his duty under the direction of the engineer. His position was similar to that of a chain carrier in surveying the surface of land. The evidence conduces to show that they were engaged in the work at night by the aid of lamps; that the engineer had stationed the appellant at a point in the entry of the mine, to hold a lamp to aid in the measurement of the distance between that and another point, and while standing there large quantities of coal and stone fell from the roof on his foot and crushed it; that the roof of the mine was not supported by props or supports at the place where the accident happened, to prevent it from falling, and that the character of the material overhead was shelly and full of seams and cracks, and that the safety of those entering the mines required a support overhead. The foregoing is the substance of the evidence offered on the trial. The court gave the jury a peremptory instruction to find for the defendant.

Appellee urges that the court did not err, because: First, that the evidence did not authorize the submission of the case to the jury; second, that the petition did not state a cause of action.

Appellant was not engaged in mining coal; he had nothing to do with the operations in the mine, except to serve under the engineer in making a survey for the purpose of locating an entry, etc. To discharge this duty it was necessary to go into the entry of the mines on the occasion when he was injured. It was not his business to inspect the mines; he had the right to rely upon the appellee to perform that duty and to keep the mines in a reasonably safe condition. Before entering the mines appellant had the right to assume that the appellee had performed its duty in that respect. The master is not held bound as the insurer of the safety of the place in which he puts his servant, but he is bound to exercise that care and diligence proportionate to the occupation which a reasonably prudent man would exercise under like circumstances, both to provide and keep in a reasonably safe condition the place where the servant is put at work. This duty is personal to the master, and can not be so delegated as to relieve him of liability. It is the duty of a master operating a coal mine, to have the duty of inspection performed by a competent inspector, for the eye of such one might discover defects in the mines which might not be discovered by a servant, and, if it was, he might not fully comprehend its significance, and the danger threatened. (Ashland Coal and Iron Co. v. Wallace, 101 Ky., 626.) If the roof was in the condition described in the testimony, if an inspection had been made its dangerous condition would have been discovered. The fact that it remained in that condition indicates that it was not inspected, or that if it was, the appellee failed to have proper supports placed under the roof, and thus prevent it imperilling the lives of its servants. If the testimony of the appellant be true, but one inference can be drawn from it, and that is, that the appellee was guilty of negligence in allowing the roof of the mine to remain in the condition shown by the testimony.

It is averred in the petition "that by the carelessness and negligence of the defendant and the superintendent and those in charge and control of the said mines, large quantities of slate and stone lying about the vein of coal and in the entry of said mines where the coal has been removed from, and in the entry where his duties called him, had become loose, unsafe and dangerous, and was suffered and permitted to remain loose, dangerous and unsafe to persons entering the said mines, and with no support thereunder."

It is insisted that in addition to this averment that there should have been one to the effect that the defendant knew of the unsafe and dangerous condition of the mines. It is charged that the mines were in that unsafe and dangerous condition by reason of the carelessness and negligence of the defendant. The right to recover is based upon a breach of duty of the defendant in allowing the mines to become unsafe and dangerous. It was the duty of the defendant to inspect the mines. In our opinion the averments of the petition are sufficient. It is also claimed that the petition was defective, because there was no averment that the plaintiff did not know of the unsafe and dangerous condition of the mines and could not have known it by the exercise of ordinary care. If the omission of this averment rendered the petition defective, it was cured by the answer, because it is there averred that the plaintiff had notice of the dangerous character of the roof where the injury was received, and he was notified not to place himself at that point. This is equivalent to charging that he had knowledge of the unsafe and dangerous condition of the mines. In our opinion the court should have allowed the case to remain with the jury under proper instructions.

The judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

NEW YORK LIFE INSURANCE CO. v. MEINKEN'S ADM'R.

(Filed June 10, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Humphrey, Burnett & Humphrey and Jas. H. McIntosh for appellant.

C. H. Shield and Eli H. Brown for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, First Division.

Judge Hobson delivered the following response to petition for rehearing.

The learned counsel for appellee insist in the petition for rehearing that the court has misunderstood their real contention in the case. They say: "What we asked the court to decide was, and is, what was the legal effect of the acceptance of Meinken's $15 and $14.50 in money and his notes for $44.50 and $30 in payment or settlement of the third annual premium, and the retention of the money and the note for $30 without an offer to return either the money or the note?"

This question was considered by the court on the hearing, and in the latter part of the opinion the authorities bearing upon it are collected. The question was not more fully discussed in the opinion for the reason that in the recent case of Fidelity Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Price, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 1148, it was considered at length and decided adversely to appellee's contention. The previous decisions of the court are cited and discussed in that opinion.

Petition overruled.

FIDELITY NATIONAL BANK'S, OF CINCINNATI, O., RECEIVER, &c. v. YOUTSEY, RECEIVER, &c.

(Filed June 10, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Commissioners and receivers—Fees of—Where the receiver of a national bank rendered services to the extent of investing by order of court $50,000 of the trust funds in government bonds, and in addition was engaged fifteen days in taking depositions, $2,200 was adequate compensation for such services and the court erred in allowing a sum in excess of that.

2. Same—The statute is specific as to the compensation of receivers in receiving and paying out money under an order of court, and where no services are performed which are not contemplated by statute, the allowance of a greater sum than that fixed by law will not be upheld.

W. H. Mackoy and John W. Herron for appellants.

Otto Wolff for appellees.

Appeal from Campbell Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

J. J. Youtsey was receiver of the Campbell Circuit Court. Under an order of the court, made in this action, there came into his hands nearly one hundred thousand dollars. Under an order of the court, he invested about fifty thousand dollars of the fund in government bonds to await the final judgment of the court. In addition to rendering services as receiver, one branch of the case was referred to him as special commissioner. He was engaged fifteen days in taking testimony. How long he was engaged in making his report does not appear, as he never made any written statement as to the time employed as special commissioner. Before the final order in the case, he asked the court to fix his compensation for his services as receiver and special commissioner at $6,000, this to include the $2,200, which had been previously allowed and paid to him. The court allowed him $2,800 in addition to the $2,200, making a total of $5,000. The appellants in the court below objected to the allowance of the $2,800, and from that judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

The fees of receivers and commissioners are fixed by section 1740, Kentucky Statutes, which are as follows: "To master commissioner or receiver, where the amount is not agreed upon by the parties, for each day they are actually engaged, three dollars For receiving and paying out money under an order of court, where the amount is one thousand dollars or less, two per centum. Where the amount is more than one thousand dollars, but does not exceed two thousand dollars, two per centum on the first one thousand, and one and one-half per centum on the excess. Where the amount is more than two thousand, but does not exceed five thousand dollars, two per centum on the first thousand, one and one-half per centum on the second one thousand, and one per centum on the excess. Where the amount is over five thousand dollars, he shall receive fees on the first five thousand dollars as above provided, and one-half of one per centum on the remainder."

By the provision of this act, Youtsey was only entitled to three dollars a day as special commissioner for the time actually engaged. The statute is specific as to the compensation of receivers in receiving and paying out money under an order of court. This court in McHenry v. Winston, 105

Ky., 807; Russell v. Averitt, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 909; Wathen v. England, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 1601; Morgan v. Wickliffe, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1039, have held that the statute fixes the allowances which commissioners and receivers shall have for services described in the statute. There are other kinds of services which a receiver may render for which the court may make a reasonable allowance, as in the cases of Sherley v. Mattingly & Son, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 289, and Spears v. Thomas, Receiver, &c., 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1154. In this case the receiver performed no services not contemplated by the statute, except the investment of the money in United States bonds. If this investment was treated as a collection and disbursement, his total allowance as receiver should not have been as much as $1,000. Under section 896, Kentucky Statutes, he was not entitled to an allowance as commissioner, because he did not file a statement under oath showing the number of days he was employed. There was no question made in the court below as to the allowance of the $2,200 for services as receiver and commissioner, and for that reason we will not review the action of the court in making that allowance, except for the purpose of determining whether it was sufficient compensation for the services rendered. We are of the opinion that the $2,200 was ample compensation for the services rendered by Youtsey as receiver and special commissioner; therefore, the court erred in allowing the $2,800 in addition thereto. Some of the cases relied upon by counsel for the appellee were decided before the adoption of the present statute. Where the receiver only receives and disburses money, it is not competent to prove the value of services, because the statute fixes the compensation.

The judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

TATE v. ILLINOIS CENTRAL R. R. CO.

(Filed June 10, 1904—Not to be reported.)

J. C. Speight and H. L. Anderson for appellant.

J. M. Dickinson and Pirtle & Trabue for appellee.

Judge Paynter delivered the following dissenting opinion:

If there can be a recovery in this case, it must be done upon the theory that the appellee was guilty of a breach of duty in the failure of its depot agent to exercise proper care to protect appellant from assault and insult. The evidence is, that the agent was in the ticket office immediately before Boone entered the waiting room; that the window of that office was raised; that no one who testified saw him during the time either of the events transpired of which complaint is made; that the appellant did not complain to him about the conduct of Boone, or tell him of it. It is also shown that there were telegraph instruments in the ticket office making a noise. The only way to reach the conclusion that the agent had knowledge of what transpired, is to infer it from the fact that the agent was in the ticket office with the window raised. When this is done, another fact must be found, to wit: That after obtaining that knowledge he could, by the exercise of proper diligence, have saved appellant from the assault and insult. The evidence tends to show that Boone was not talking in a loud tone of voice, and it would be a mere guess to say that the agent heard him. There is no evidence showing that the agent had any reason to apprehend the assault. If the ticket agent had heard the first word that Boone addressed tc the appellant, he could not have reached the waiting room until the last one was spoken. When Boone left the waiting room, even if the agent had been aware of his conduct, he had no reason to believe he would return and renew it. The appellant did not apprehend it, for he returned to the waiting-room with a feeling of security. The second attack was as sudden as the first, and was over so soon that the agent could not have prevented it, if he had been at the ticket office window. While Boone's conduct was unprovoked, we are of the opinion that the appellee, in the exercise of proper vigilance, could not have anticipated and prevented it.

Appeal from the Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division.

Judge Hobson delivered the following response to petition for rehearing:

In entering the judgment of affirmance herein the clerk entered a judgment in favor of appellees, awarding them 10 per cent. damages on the amount superseded. Appellees have entered a motion to correct the mandate in so far as it awarded damages against them.

The property owner is not personally liable for an assessment to pay for a street improvement. The property assessed is only liable. The proceeding to enforce the assessment is strictly, therefore, a proceeding in rem or against the property. (Meyer v. Covington, 103 Ky., 546; Barker v. South Construction Co., 20 Ky. Law Rep., 796; Woodward v. Collett, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1068; Fehler v. Gosnell, 99 Ky., 384; Bitzer v. O'Brien, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1310; Henderson v. Lambert, 14 Bush, 30; Kentucky Statutes, section 2884.)

It has been held by this court in a long line of decisions, that 10 per cent. damages will not be awarded on the affirmance of a judgment in a proceeding strictly in rem, where the judgment has been superseded. (Worsham v. Lancaster, 104 Ky., 813; Cornwall v. Fletcher, 9 Ky. Law Rep., 408; Ross v. Wilson, 7 Bush, 86; Wilson v. Pope, 14 B. Monroe, 83; Wood v. Roman, 5 B. Monroe, 145; Simrall v. Reid, 2 Dana, 65; Talbott v. Morton, 5 Littell, 398; Hargis v. Mayes, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1965.)

The motion to correct the mandate, in so far as it awards damages on the amount superseded is, therefore, sustained.

UNION CENTRAL LIFE INS. CO. v. GALVIN, GUARDIAN.

(Filed June 10, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Life insurance—Payment of premium—Former appeal—Where it was held on a former appeal to this court that the execution of a note for insurance premium by a third party, which was accepted by the company, did not render a policy void which contained the provision that the policy should be void if the first three notes executed to the company were not paid; the opinion on that appeal is the law of the case, and where the facts were undisputed there was nothing to submit to the jury upon the return of the case to the lower court.

Burnett & Burnett for appellant.

Forcht & Field and W. W. Thum for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

On February 1, 1900, Sallie E. Galvin made an application to appellee for a policy insuring her life in the sum of $1,000 in favor of her child, W. T. Galvin.

She had at the time the money to pay the first premium, but for some reason not explained the agent took her husband's note for it, due in four months and delivered to her a binding receipt as though the premium was paid in cash. The husband neglected to pay his note at maturity, and when he offered to pay it the company declined to receive it. Subsequently Mrs. Galvin died, and this suit having been brought upon the policy, the circuit court, at the conclusion of the evidence, instructed the jury peremptorily to find for the defendant. On appeal from the judgment entered on the verdict of the jury in favor of the defendant, it was held by this court that the provision contained in the policy making it void if any notes given to the company for the first three annual premiums were not paid, referred only to notes executed by the assured and not to notes executed by a third party, taken by the company and accepted in satisfaction of the liability of the assured. (Galvin v. Union Central Life Insurance Co., 24 Ky. Law Rep., 2452.) On the return of the case to the circuit court it was tried again, and at the conclusion of the evidence the court peremptorily instructed the jury to find for the plaintiff and the defendant appeals. The opinion rendered on the former appeal is the law of the case. The facts were undisputed. The contract was in writing and there was nothing to submit to the jury. If the failure to pay the note did not avoid the policy as had been held on the former appeal, there was no reason why the plaintiff should not recover.

Judgment affirmed.

STACK v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed June 14, 1904.)

1. Office and officer—Usurpation—Tie vote for councilmen—Proceedings thereunder—Action by attorney general—In a proceeding by the attorney general against the appellant for usurpation of the office of councilman from the fourth ward of the city of Dayton, a fourth class city, the respondent rests his claim to be a member of said board for the term beginning December 7, 1903, solely upon a certificate issued to him on November 23, 1903, by order of the board of councilmen of the city of Dayton, whose term of office expired on the very day on which the term of the council of which the appellant claims to be a member began, and the approval of the mayor of said certificate on November 24, 1903, to which response a general demurrer by the Commonwealth was sustained. Held—That under the provisions of subsection 5 of section 1596a, Kentucky Statutes, providing for the canvassing of returns and the issuing of certificates of election, that no power or authority is given to the canvassing board to determine which of the candidates are elected in the case of municipal officer. In such case their duty is fully discharged by certifying the vote to the common council of such municipality, and under the provisions of the charter of fourth class cities, the board of councilmen of the city of Dayton, whose term of office expired December 7, 1903, had no power or authority to determine who had been elected a member of the board of council of said city for the succeeding term; and, therefore, the certificate relied on by appellant, signed by the city clerk, conferred on him no right to discharge the duties of a member of the common council of said city whose term began December 7, 1903.

2. Burden of proof—In a proceeding instituted by the State to test the title of an alleged usurper, the burden of showing the right or title to the office alleged to be usurped, is upon the respondent.

Aubrey Barbour and Ramsey Washington for appellant.

James C. & B. A. Wright for appellee.

Appeal from Campbell Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

This proceeding was instituted by the attorney general under section 485 of the Civil Code, against Thos. Stack for usurpation of the office of councilman from the fourth ward from the city of Dayton, for a term beginning on the 7th of December, 1903. The petition alleges that on the 3d of November, 1903, a general election was held in the fourth ward of the city of Dayton for the election of councilmen to represent the said ward for a term of two years, beginning on the 7th day of December, 1903, and that at the election, Charles Thomas received 148 votes, F. A. Dietz 189 votes, and the defendant, Thos. Stack, 139 votes; that the defendant was not elected to the office of councilman in said city for said ward beginning on the 7th of December, 1903, but that notwithstanding this fact, he had taken the oath of office and qualified as councilman from the fourth ward, for the term beginning on the 7th of December, 1903, and had usurped and entered upon and then was in the exercise of the rights, powers and duties thereof, wrongfully. The defendant answered that he was a candidate for the office of councilman from the fourth ward of Dayton, a city of the fourth class, at an election held on the 3d of November, 1903, at which he received 159 votes as alleged in the petition; and that on November 16, 1903, the mayor and board of councilmen of the city of Dayton, appointed a committee of said board to canvass the returns of the election for the city offices and members of the board of councilmen of the city of Dayton, held November 3, 1903, as certified to said board of councilmen by the board of election commissioners of Campbell county; and that at a meeting of said board of council of the city of Dayton, held November 23, 1903, said committee made its report, and by the terms of said report recommended that the certificate of election of councilman of the fourth ward be issued to the defendant, Thos. Stack; that said report was duly adopted by said board of councilmen on the said 23d of November, 1903, and approved by the mayor November 24, 1903; and said report and action by the mayor was approved by the said board of councilmen on December 7, 1903; and that in pursuance of said action of said board of councilmen and said mayor, the city clerk of said city of Dayton did, on November 23, 1903, issue a certificate of election to this defendant as a member of the board of councilmen for the fourth ward of said city of Dayton, to serve for the term of two years from the first Monday in December, 1903, and in pursuance of said certificate of election, this defendant took the oath of office and qualified as a councilman, and denied that he was wrongfully in the exercise of the rights, powers and duties thereof. The following exhibit was filed with the answer:

"Dayton, Ky., November 23, 1903.

"I, Charles A. Bird, city clerk, do hereby issue this certificate to Thos. Stack, by order of the board of councilmen of the city of Dayton, Ky. I do hereby certify that Thos. Stack has been elected as a member of the board of councilmen for the fourth ward of said city of Dayton, Ky., to serve for a term of two years from the first Monday in December, 1903. By order of the board of councilmen of the city of Dayton.

"CHARLES A. BIRD, City Clerk."

The folllowing amended answer was subsequently filed: "The defendant for amendment to his answer herein, says that said committee appointed on November 16, 1903, as alleged in said petition, and said board of councilmen, did canvass said returns as certified to said board of councilmen by said board of election commissioners of Campbell county; and that thereafter said committee reported as alleged in his answer."

A general demurrer was filed by the plaintiff to the answer as amended, and sustained, and defendant declining to plead further, it was adjudged that he had usurped the office of councilman in the city of Dayton for the term beginning on the 7th of December, 1903, and that he be ousted therefrom, and from that judgment he has appealed. In a proceeding of this character instituted by the Commonwealth, the burden of showing right or title to the office alleged to be usurped, is upon the respondent. (23 A. & E. En. of Law, 625, and authorities there cited.) The rule is admirably stated in Mechem on Public officers, section 491, as follows: "Where a proceeding is instituted by and on behalf of the State in its sovereign capacity, to test the title of an alleged usurper, much more generality of allegation is tolerated than in cases where a private individual is the prosecuting party. The title to all offices being derived from the State, and it having an inherent right at any time to call upon one who assumes to exercise the functions of a public office, to show his right to do so, it is evident that no specific allegation of right, or title upon the part of the State can be necessary. It is often said, therefore, that the State is under no obligation to show anything on its part; and that the charge in general language that the respondent has entered into, usurped and unlawfully exercised the functions of a certain office, is all that is required to put him to his answer."

The respondent in this case rests his claim to be a member of the board of councilmen of the city of Dayton for the term beginning on the 7th of December, 1908, solely upon a certificate issued to him on the 23d of November, 1908, by order of the board of councilmen of the city of Dayton, whose term of office expired on the very day on which the term of the council of which appellant claims to be a member, began. It is true that he alleged that this certificate was approved by the mayor on the 24th of November, 1908, and that the action of the mayor was approved by the board of councilmen on December 7, 1908, but construing the pleadings most strongly against the defendant, as we must, all that this answer alleges is the approval of the mayor of the action of the council, and their ratification of his act before their term of office expired. Subsection 5 of section 1596a of the Kentucky statutes provides for the canvassing of returns of an election by the county board, and the issuing of certificates of election. It reads as follows: "On the next day, the said county board of election commissioners shall meet in the county clerk's office between 10 and 12 o'clock in the morning, open and canvass the returns of such election, and give triplicate or more written certificates of election over their signatures, of those who have received the highest number of votes for any office, exclusively within the gift of the voters of the county, one copy of the certificate to be retained in the clerk's office, another delivered to each of the persons elected, and the other forwarded by the county clerk to the secretary of State at the seat of government. For offices not within such gift, they shall give duplicate or more written certificates over their signatures of the number of votes given in the county, city, town, district, or precinct, particularizing therein the precinct at which the votes were given, one copy to be retained in the clerk's office, one delivered to the sheriff, and one, in case of municipal or district elections, to the common council of said municipality or the governing authority of such district."

The only duty imposed by this section upon the county board of election commissioners in cases of municipal offices, is to count the ballots and certify the returns to the common council of such municipality. They are not authorized in such cases to issue certificates of election. Subsection 11 of the same section of the statute provides that: "Where the canvassing board of two or more counties on comparison of the returns, or the board of canvassers for a county, find that two or more have received the highest and equal number of votes for the same office, they shall, by lot, determine which of the candidates is elected."

But no power or authority is given to the canvassing board to determine which of the candidates are elected in the case of municipal officers. In such case their duty is fully discharged by certifying the vote to the common council of such municipality; that this was the purpose of the general assembly is made quite clear by section 3486 of the Kentucky Statutes, which is a provision of the charter of fourth class cities, to which Dayton belongs, and which reads as follows: "In case of a vacancy in the board by death, resignation, or any other cause, such vacancy shall be filled as hereinafter provided. The board shall meet at such times and places as shall be provided by ordinance. It shall judge of the eligibility and election returns of its members, adopt rules for its proceedings and government, and enforce the same by appropriate fines, not exceeding $10 for each offense; and three-fourths of the members voting affirmatively may, for good cause, expel any member."

Section 3552 of the Kentucky Statutes, which is also a section of the charters of fourth class cities, provides: "If a vacancy shall occur in any elective office, including the office of councilman, such vacancy shall be filled by the board of council, subject to the provisions of the Constitution applicable thereto. If the election of any elective officer in cities of this class be contested, such contest shall be conducted and determined as provided by law in cases of election of county officers."

It is apparent from these provisions of the charter of fourth class cities that the board of councilmen, whose term of office expired on the 7th day of December, 1903, had no power or authority to determine who had been elected a member of the board of council of the city of Dayton for the succeeding term, and that the certificate relied on by the appellant, signed by Charles A. Bird, city clerk, conferred upon him no right to discharge any of the duties of a member of the common council of the city of Dayton, whose term began on the 7th of December, 1903. But it has been suggested that as the statute has made the board of common council of cities of the fourth class judges of the eligibility and election returns of its members, and conferred upon them the power to fill vacancies, that the courts are deprived thereby of jurisdiction to determine the question in proceedings under section 483 of the Civil Code; and it must be conceded that there are some decisions of courts which seem to approve this doctrine, but after a very thorough examination of the question, we have reached the conclusion that the great weight of authority, and the better reason, is opposed to this doctrine, and the rule established that unless the statute conferring the jurisdiction upon the common council to judge of the election and qualification of its members unequivocally excludes, by express provision or necessary implication, the jurisdiction of the courts, that it remains in them, and that conferred upon the council is only concurrent or temporary. This rule is laid down by Dillon on Municipal Corporations, 3d edition, 203 and 203, and notes; McReary's American Law of Elections, section 295, where a great many cases have been collated and cited, and the 23d A. & E. En. of Law, 609. As the board of council of the city of Dayton, whose term began on the first Monday in December, 1903, has not passed upon the claim of appellant to be a member thereof, it is unnecessary for us to decide what effect might be given by the court to their determination of the question, if they had in fact so acted.

For reasons indicated the judgment is affirmed.

ILLINOIS CENTRAL R. R. CO. v. McINTOSH.

Gordon, Gordon & Cox, Pirtle & Trabue and J. M. Dickinson for appellant.

Fox & Morrow and C. J. Waddell for appellee.

Appeal from Hopkins Circuit Court.

Judge Hobson delivered the following response to petition for rehearing:

Counsel seem to misapprehend the opinion. We said: "If the foreman had not run his hand car negligently on the time of the train, there would have been no trouble from the failure to give signals of the approach of the train to the crossing. On the other hand, if these signals had been given, the consequences of his negligence might have perhaps been avoided. * * * The order of the section boss for them to throw the car off was proper to avoid a collision, but if by reason of the emergency thus negligently produced, the plaintiff was injured in obeying the order of the section boss to prevent a collision or loss of life or property, and his injury was the proximate result of his obeying the order of his boss and was not due to negligence on his part in overstraining himself to get the car off, of which the jury are to judge, he may recover."

The plaintiff on the first trial had asked an instruction predicated on the negligence of the section boss and also one predicated on the negligence of the trainmen. Further on in the opinion we said that in lieu of these two instructions the court should give one instruction as indicated in the opinion. What we meant is that if by reason of the gross negligence of the section boss or by reason of the negligence of the trainmen a collision of the train with the hand car was imminent, and to avoid the consequence of this the section foreman ordered the hands to take the hand car from the track, and in doing this the plaintiff was ruptured as the natural consequence of having to lift the hand car from the track quickly loaded, as it was, to avoid a collision, he may recover, unless his injury was due to contributory negligence on his own part.

Petition overruled.

PROCTOR v. PROCTOR'S ADM'R, &c.

(Filed June 14, 1904.)

1. Offset—Claim for board—Contract with person since deceased—In an action on a note executed by appellant to his deceased sister by her administrator, he pleaded as an offset a contract made with her, to take care of her as long as she lived, and as compensation for his services he was to have all her estate which she left, and that the note sued on was all of her estate; the appellant failing to prove the alleged contract, and the evidence showing that his sister's services were worth as much as her board, his plea on that ground must fail.

2. Payments alleged—Private account book as evidence—In an action on a note by the administrator of a deceased person, appellant claimed he had paid out for such person various sums as credits on the note sued on, and offered as evidence thereof a book kept by him, showing such credits. Held—That under Civil Code, section 66, subsection 7, providing that "a person may testify for himself as against persons who are under no disability, as to the correctness of original entries made by him in an account book according to the usual course of business, though the person against whom they were made may have died," which is but declaratory of the common law, was intended to apply to entries in a book kept according to the usual course of business, in those cases where the books themselves were evidence of the facts set out in them, and does not apply to entries made by a debtor in his private book, and in such case the entries themselves not being competent evidence, the appellant could not testify concerning them.

T. H. Hardin for appellees.

Appeal from Mercer Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

On December 10. 1888, S. E. Proctor made a deed to her brother, William Proctor, for a tract of land in consideration of $750, for which he executed to her his note, due one day after date. She died in the year 1899, and this suit was filed by her administrator against William Proctor to recover on the note and enforce the lien on the land. He pleaded that in the year 1897 his sister made a contract with him, whereby it was agreed that he should take care of her as long as she should live, and as compensation for his services he was to have all the estate she left; that under this contract she lived with him from that time to her death, and that the note sued on was the only estate she left. In another paragraph he pleaded that his services were of the reasonable value of $100 a year; that he furnished board, lodging, clothing, medical attention, etc., and that it was understood that she was to pay out of her estate a reasonable compensation for these things, to be offset against the note. The allegations of the answer were controverted by the reply and on final hearing the court gave judgment against the defendant for the note, and enforced the lien on the land subject to certain credits allowed in the judgment.

William Proctor testified for himself that his sister made the agreement with him as set out in the first paragraph of his answer; but under section 606 of the Civil Code he can not testify for himself as to any transaction between him and the decedent. The court, therefore, properly sustained the plaintiff's exceptions to so much of his deposition as states what occurred between him and his sister. He introduced Mary Scott, his daughter, who stated that there was a general understanding in the family as to an agreement between her father and her aunt that he was to pay her bills and he was to get her interest in her father's estate at her death. He also introduced one of his sons who said that his father had told him that this was the agreement. But this evidence was irrelevant. He introduced another son, who stated generally that the understanding was that his father was to take care of his aunt as long as she lived for what she had, but he did not state from whom he got this understanding or show that he had really any personal knowledge as to what the agreement was. To the same effect is the testimony of a niece whom he introduced. There can be no recovery on the alleged contract without proof that it was made, and we think that the circuit court properly held the proof insufficient. The plaintiff proved by a number of witnesses that the deceased did not stay at the defendant's house all the time, but was at other places one-fourth of the time or more each year, and that while at his house she helped cook and do other house work, her labor being of value as much as her board. The proof as to the way the deceased labored at the defendant's house and the length of time that she was away, tend strongly to show that she was not there as a boarder.

The defendant claimed credit for a number of sums which he had paid out as he alleged for his sister, and in proof of these payments offered a book kept by him. Exception was filed to the competency of this evidence. Section 606 of the Civil Code contains several exceptions to the general rule laid down in the section. Among these is subsection 7: "A person may testify for himself as to the correctness of original entries made by him against persons who are under no disability—other than coverture, or infancy and coverture combined—in an account book, according to the usual course of business, though the person against whom they were made may have died or have become of unsound mind; but no person shall testify for himself concerning entries in a book, or the contents or purport of any writing under the control of himself, or of himself and others jointly, if he refuse or fail to produce such book or writing, and to make it subject to the order of the court for the purposes of the action, if required to do so by the party against whom he offers to testify."

The question presented is to what account book does the statute refer. In Galbraith v. Starks, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 2090, which was like this action on a note where a book account was relied on to show payments on the note, this court held that the provision of the Code above quoted is but declaratory of the common law, with the addition that a party in interest may testify concerning such entries, even as against one who is dead. In Brannin v. Foree, 12 B. Monroe, 506, which was also a suit on a note where a book kept by the defendant was relied on to show payments on the note, the common law rule on the subject is thus stated by the court: "To render such entries admissible as evidence, the books must appear to contain a register of the daily business of the party, and to have been honestly and fairly kept; and the person who made the entries must swear that the articles charged were actually sold and delivered, that the entries are the original ones, and were made at or about the time of the transactions, and that the sums charged and claimed have not been paid. (1 Greenleaf on Evidence, section 118, and note 1.) Evidence of this description is admitted upon the principle of 'moral necessity.' It is received upon the presumption that unless it be admitted there will be a total failure of proof, and that injustice will consequently result. It is, however, but secondary evidence, and that of the lowest grade. The principle upon which it is rendered admissible is, therefore, limited in its operation to that character of dealing, to which the law has prima facie ascribed a destitution of the ordinary means of proof, viz., the daily sale and barter of merchandise and other commodities, the performance of services and letting of articles to hire, and probably the payment, from time to time, of money placed on deposit, circumstances so frequent in succession, and generally so trivial in their individual amount that the procurement of formal proofs can not be expected, and would not compensate for the time necessary for the purpose. If the competency of the proof in this case be tested by the subject-matter, the entries in the books and the evidence in relation thereto were properly rejected. It was not the sale of the merchandise, or the performance of services, or the use of the property hired and returned, or the payment from time to time of money on deposit, but the payment of an outstanding debt, evidenced by a note in writing; a payment on which should be established, according to the usual course of dealing, either by a written receipt endorsed upon the note, or taken upon a separate paper. In those States where this character of testimony is deemed competent for any purpose, it is not deemed sufficient to prove the payment of money."

The entries in question where not, therefore, admissible at common law in cases of this sort; and as the statute relied on is but declaratory of the common law, it does not apply to entries which at the common law were inadmissible. Were the rule otherwise, the estate of decedents might suffer unduly in this class of cases, and notes held by deceased persons might be defeated by entries made by the debtor in his private book. The statute was not designed to accomplish this. Its purpose is to allow the debtor himself to testify to the correctness of entries made by him in his books kept according to the usual course of business, in those cases where the books themselves at common law were evidence of the facts set out in them. It was not designed to change the rule as to what books were evidence. We are not called on here to define more accurately in what cases entries in books may be admitted, for it is clear that in the case before us the entries were incompetent as held in the cases cited. We have carefully gone over the account and find no substantial error in the allowance of credits by the circuit court.

Judgment affirmed.

LOUISVILLE PUBLIC WAREHOUSE CO. v. MILLER AND TILFORD.

(Filed June 14, 1094—Not to be reported.)

Special commissioner—Authority of chancellor to appoint—Under Kentucky Statutes, sections 1044, and 1761 to 1771 inclusive, pertaining to the appointment of commissioners and receivers of courts having six circuit judges, and requiring the concurrent action of four of the six circuit judges in making such appointment, we have no hesitancy in reaching the conclusion that a chancellor of one of the chancery branches of the Jefferson Circuit Court has no jurisdiction to appoint a special commissioner except under the provision of Kentucky Statutes, section 399, where the commissioner is interested as an attorney or party to the action, or under section 400, where the parties or their attorneys may be permitted by the court to select a commissioner or receiver; as such action would in effect abrogate the statute authorizing the appointment of a commissioner by all of the six judges and leaves it in the hands of the judges of the equity branches. As to the wisdom of this legislation we have nothing to do, but it is certain that the legislature has withheld the power from the chancellors. This being true, the action of the chancellor of the first chancery branch of the Jefferson Circuit Court undertaking to appoint a special commissioner in the case at bar to perform the duties devolved upon the regular commissioner, was void, he being without jurisdiction, and the writ of prohibition should issue.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

The question presented for adjudication by this record is, whether or not judges of the chancery branches of the Jefferson Circuit Court have jurisdiction to appoint special commissioners, when, in their opinion, the necessities of the case warrant it. As the question turns upon a proper construction of the statutes creating and regulating the office of commissioner, it will not be amiss to insert the following sections of the Kentucky Statutes, directly applying to the subject in hand:

"Section 892. Each circuit judge shall appoint a master commissioner for such court, may remove him and appoint another; but no master commissioner shall continue in office more than four years without a reappointment. Before acting, the master commissioner shall be sworn and execute a bond, with surety, to be approved by the court, for the faithful performance of the duties of his office. The bond shall be entered of record in said court, and shall be renewed once in each year, and oftener if required by the court, and a copy thereof, certified by the clerk shall be evidence in all proceedings in this State.

"Section 899. When the master commissioner is interested as an attorney or party in any action or proceeding which it is necessary or proper to refer to a commissioner, the court shall, by proper order, appoint a special commissioner to act in such action or proceeding, and shall require him to take an oath and execute bond as the regular commissioner is required to do.

"Section 400. The parties or their attorneys may be permitted by the court to select a receiver or commissioner, in any action or proceeding, to perform the duties of the master commissioner. Before acting, such receiver or commissioner shall be sworn and execute bond, with surety, in the same manner and the same in substance as is required of a master commissioner. They shall promptly and faithfully discharge the duties of their stations, and promptly comply with all orders and judgments rendered in the action or proceeding. Their compensation shall be the same as that of a master commissioner, and ascertained and allowed in the same manner.

"Section 1044. (Circuit courts having six judges.) The regular judges at any general term of the court, any four concurring, shall appoint a commissioner and a receiver of the court, who shall hold their office during four years, unless removed, as they may be, at the pleasure of the court in general terms, any four of the regular judges concurring. The commissioner shall discharge the duties and have the powers appertaining to the office of a master in chancery and as provided by law and the rules of the court. The receiver shall receive, care for and deposit all the moneys and property that may be paid or deposited into court, and shall disburse the same upon the orders of the court as provided by law and the rules of the court. Before entering upon the discharge of their duties, the commissioner and the receiver shall appear in open court, execute bond according to law and take an oath that they will honestly, impartially and to the best of their judgment discharge all the duties of their offices without favor or respect of persons, and render true and just reports and accounts of their actions and doings as such.

"Section 1761. * * * that in counties having a population of seventy-five thousand or over, commissioners or receivers appointed by the circuit court shall receive an annual salary of $5,000, and the number of deputies allowed to each of said officers, and the compensation allowed to each, and the amount, if any, allowed for the necessary expenses of the office, shall be regulated and fixed by an order entered upon the order book of the circuit court, and a certified copy of said order shall, as soon as entered, be forwarded to the auditor of public accounts, as shall a copy of any subsequent changes made therein.

"Said commissioners and receivers shall, in a suitable book, kept in his office, keep and enter therein a true and faithful account of the amounts earned by him or due him for official services rendered to any person, company or corporation, when and to whom such service was rendered, and what part thereof, if any, has been paid, and when paid; and shall annually, in the month of January, report to the auditor, under oath, the amount received by him on account of his official duties or position from all sources, during the preceding year, as well as the amount paid out by him for necessary deputies or assistants, and for the expenses of conducting his office, giving separately the amount he has paid out on account of each item; and if it shall appear from such annual statement that any such officer has received as compensation on account of his official services from all sources more than $5,000 during such year, after the payment of the salaries of his necessary deputies or assistants, and the legitimate expenses of conducting his office, then such officer shall, with such statement, pay to the auditor the amount so received in excess of said $5,000 and the salaries of his deputies and expenses of his office; and any such officer who shall fail to comply herewith shall, upon conviction, be fined not less than $100, nor more than $500, and upon conviction shall be removed from office. But nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent said officers from making up out of the overplus of any year any shortage in their salaries, or the salaries of the deputies, of any previous year.

"Section 1762. Each of the officers mentioned in the preceding section shall receive an annual salary of $5,000, and the number of deputies allowed to each of said officers, and the compensation to be received by each, except the chief deputy, and the amount, if any, allowed for the necessary expenses of the office, shall be regulated and fixed by an order entered upon the order book of the circuit court and county court, and signed by a majority of the judges of said courts; and a certified copy of said order shall, as soon as entered, be forwarded to the auditor of public accounts, as shall a copy of any subsequent changes made therein.

"Section 1763. The salary of the chief deputy of each of said officers shall be $2,000 per year, and the salary of each of the other deputies shall be fixed at a reasonable amount, not exceeding $1,500 per year.

"Section 1764. The salary of each officer, his deputies and expenses of office, shall be paid monthly by the treasurer of the State upon the warrant of the auditor, made payable to the officer. If 75 per cent. of the amount paid into the State treasury in any month is not sufficient to pay the salaries and expenses for that month, the deficit may be made up out of the amount paid in any succeeding month; but in no event shall the amount paid by the auditor to any officer for salaries and expenses exceed 75 per cent. of the amount paid into the treasury each month by such officer, during his official term.

"Section 1765. If any officer shall fail to make and file with the auditor, as herein required, the monthly statement, or shall fail to remit the amount shown by such statement at the time required, unless the time for filing such statement and paying the money is extended by the auditor, which he may do, but not for longer than ten days in any month, such officer shall be fined for each offense not less than $500.

"Section 1766. If any officer shall knowingly omit to report, or fail to report or make, as herein provided, a correct statement of all the money received or collected the preceding month on account of his office, or shall knowingly make or subscribe any false statement concerning the same, such officer shall be guilty of a felony, and punished by confinement in the penitentiary for not less than one nor more than five years.

"Section 1769. If the amount paid to any officer during his term or incumbency shall not have been sufficient to pay the salaries and expenses of such officer and his office, the auditor shall, out of the money collected and paid as herein provided by his successor or the person appointed as collector, pay to such officers, or to the person entitled to receive the same, an amount sufficient to supply the deficit due for salaries and expenses, not exceeding 75 per cent. of the amount of fees accrued during his official term, and which shall have been collected and paid into the treasury."

It will be observed that, by the provisions of section 1044, the commissioner of a circuit court having six judges is appointed for a term of four years, subject to removal "at the pleasure of the court in general terms, any four of the regular judges concurring;" and that he "shall discharge the duties and have the powers appertaining to the office of a master in chancery and as provided by law and the rules of the court." By section 1761 to 1771, inclusive, there is provided an elaborate system regulating the fees of the office of such commissioner, and the payment of the salary of the chief officer and his deputies. An examination of these sections will show that all the fees of this office belong to and are appropriated by the State, and out of 75 per cent. thereof the salaries of the officer and his deputies are to be paid, the officer to receive a sum not greater than $5,000, his chief deputy $3,000, and the remainder of his office force such sums as are fixed by order of the court, not to exceed $1,500 each per year. The officer is required to keep an accurate account of all the fees made and collected in his office, and at fixed times to turn them over to the treasury of the State, and of the gross sum collected, the State receives 25 per cent. at all hazards.

In the case of Smith v Cochran, 7 Bush, 147, it was held that the commissioner of the Jefferson Chancery Court, who, under the act at that time regulating the office, was appointed by the chancellor for a fixed term of six years, and who was liable to impeachment and dismissal for misfeasance and malfeasance in office, could not be arbitrarily removed by the chancellor, there being no provision in the act regulating the office, which authorized such action, and it was, therefore, void. It was necessarily held in that case that there was no inherent power in the chancellor thus to remove his commissioner. In the case of the same style, Id., 548, it was held that the chancellor had no power to appoint a special commissioner to discharge the duties of the office of commissioner, and that an order referring the settlement of a decedent's estate to a special commissioner, over the protest of the regular commissioner, was void. At that time, there was a general act appertaining to master commissioners throughout the State, authorizing the circuit judge to appoint special commissioners at will; but the court held that this act was not applicable to the commissioner of the Louisville chancery court, and, therefore, conferred no power upon the chancellor in this regard. The statutes above quoted, under the principle of Broadus v. Broadus, 10 Bush, 299, must be construed as containing all the law on the subject of which they treat, and, under the rule enunciated in the cases of Smith v. Cochran, supra, we would have no hesitancy in reaching the conclusion that the chancellors have no power to appoint a special commissioner, except under the circumstances provided for by sections 899 and 400, without reference to the sections regulating the fees of the office; for if they were invested with this authority, it is manifest that they could destroy the office, by so diverting the emoluments to special commissioners as to make it worthless, and thereby render it impossible for any one to hold the office, except such an one as they might favor. This would, practically, take from the other judges any participation in the appointment of the commissioner, although the law specifically devolves upon them this duty in connection with the chancellors; in other words, the construction contended for by the respondent would, in effect, abrogate the statute authorizing the appointment of a commissioner by all of the six judges, and leave it in the hands of the judges of the equity branches. But when, in addition to the foregoing reasons, we take into consideration sections 1761 to 1771, inclusive, it is inconceivable that it could have been intended that the chancellors should be invested with the power to divert from the State the emoluments of the office of the commissioner so definitely required to be paid into its treasury, by the appointment of special commissioners, who would receive the whole allowance made them, without any participation therein by the State. As to whether or not it is wise, thus to withhold from the chancellors of circuit courts having six judges the appointing of the officer with whom they are so intimately associated, and upon whom they must so often rely for assistance, is not a question for us to decide; it is certain that the legislature has withheld it from them. And the same may be said of the wisdom of withholding from them the power of appointing a special commissioner at will.

There is much cogency in the reasoning of the learned counsel for the respondent, that the chancellors should be invested with these powers, but a careful examination of the statutes relating to the subject, convinces us that it has not been given, and that they are limited in this matter to the express provisions of the statutes. This being true, the action of the chancellor of the first chancery branch, in undertaking to appoint a special commissioner in the case at bar to perform the duties devolved by law upon the regular commissioner of the court, was void, he being without jurisdiction to make it; and it follows, therefore, under the provisions of section 10 of the Constitution, as construed in the cases of Hindman v. Toney, 97 Ky., 413; Weaver v. Toney, 107 Ky., 419; Shackelford v. Patterson, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 816, and Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co., v. Miller, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1714, that the writ of prohibition should issue.

MOORE v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed June 14, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Homicide—Verdict by lot—New trials—Under section 281, Criminal Code, decisions of the court on motions for a new trial are not subject to exception, and this court cannot review the action of the lower court where an affidavit of one of the jurors was filed tending to show that the number of years the appellant was to serve in the penitentiary, was determined by lot.

2. Absence of counsel—The defendant was indicted in October, 1901, and he was not tried until in March, 1903. The rule of the court is that a case should not ordinarily be continued on the sole ground of absence of counsel. It appearing that defendant was ably defended by local counsel, in view of the fact in the case the judgment is affirmed.

A. T. Wood and Z. T. Young for appellant.

N. B. Hays, Loraine Mix and H. B. Kinsolving for appellee.

Appeal from Rowan Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The defendant was indicted for the murder of Fin Toliver, and was found guilty of voluntary manslaughter and sentenced to the penitentiary for eighteen years. He seeks a reversal upon two grounds; one, that the jury made its verdict by lot, and the other, on account of the absence from the trial of Col. A. T. Wood, one of his attorneys.

On the motion for new trial, the appellant filed an affidavit of one of the jurors which tended to show that the number of years he was to serve in the penitentiary, was determined by lot. The court overruled the motion for a new trial. Under section 281, Criminal Code of Practice, decisions of the court upon motions for a new trial are not subject to exception, and this court can not review the action of the lower court. (Redmon v. Commonwealth, 82 Ky., 333; York v. Commonwealth, 82 Ky., 362; Commonwealth v. Hourigan, 89 Ky., 308.)

The defendant was indicted in October, 1901. The case was not tried until in March, 1903. The case had been continued at a previous term for the appellant, because Col. Wood had not had an opportunity to become familiar with the case. The rule of this court is, that a case should not ordinarily be continued on the sole ground of absence of counsel. (Cook. v. Commonwealth, 24 Ky. Law Rep , 1409.) Z. T. Young, a local attorney, defended the appellant. He is an able and efficient attorney. In view of the facts of the case it is evident from the verdict that the appellant was ably defended.

The judgment is affirmed.

MONTGOMERY v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed June 14, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Homicide—Reckless shooting—Unintentional killing—The defendant with others were all out on Sunday at a place where liquor was sold and began to "fill up," defendant becoming very drunk. Several shots were fired, but by whom or for what object is not known. Soon afterwards defendant was seen with a large pistol in both hands trying, apparently, to turn the cylinder. While so engaged the report of a shot was heard from the direction of a building about fifty yards away. It is not shown who fired the shot, nor for what purpose. The defendant immediately turned his gun in the direction where the shot came from and, apparently, without taking aim, fired, killing his brother-in-law with whom he was on perfectly friendly terms, and wounding another party. On the trial of an indictment for murder he was convicted of voluntary manslaughter and sent to the penitentiary for six years, from which verdict and judgment he appeals. Held—That whilst the instructions of the court as to voluntary manslaughter were prejudicial to the substantial rights of the defendant in omitting the use of the words "willful and intentional," the jury should also have been instructed, that if they believed from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant intentionally, or in a wanton, careless manner fired off and discharged his pistol, and thereby shot and killed deceased, such killing was voluntary manslaughter. We are also of the opinion that the testimony in the case warranted the giving of an instruction upon involuntary manslaughter as defined in Conner v. Commonwealth, 76 Ky., 719.

A. F. Byrd for appellant.

N. B. Hays and Loraine Mix for appellee.

Appeal from Magoffin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The appellant was indicted for the murder of Charles Fletcher, and was convicted by a petit jury for voluntary manslaughter and sentenced to the penitentiary for six years. The testimony discloses that the defendant was a brother-in-law of the deceased, and that previous to his death they were perfectly friendly. The homicide occurred on Sunday. On the preceding Saturday night the deceased and Dud Montgomery spent the night at the house of the accused, and left there the next morning before breakfast for a place in the neighborhood where whiskey was sold; and that they were followed to this point after breakfast by the defendant and a brother of the deceased. After remaining at this point some little time, the whole party repaired to a neighboring church to attend divine services. At the conclusion of the church services, the whole party returned to the saloon, or perhaps it would be more accurate to say, place where whisky was being sold, and at once began to "fill up." The defendant became very intoxicated. While all the parties were present several shots were fired, but it is not shown who they were fired by, or with what object, if any; that soon afterwards the defendant was seen with a large revolving pistol in both hands, apparently trying to turn its cylinder. While he was engaged in this way, the report of a shot was heard from the direction of a building about fifty yards away. It is not shown who fired this shot, or for what purpose. But the defendant immediately turned his pistol in the direction where the shot came from, and apparently without taking aim, fired. In fact, most of the witnesses testify that he was not looking in the direction his pistol was pointed at the time, but the ball therefrom passed through the body of the deceased, killing him instantly, and wounding another party. The defendant claims that he was so drunk that he was unconscious of what he was doing; and that the killing of his brother-in-law was, in consequence thereof, a pure accident. A reversal of the judgment is asked chiefly upon two grounds: First, because the trial court in the instruction given to the jury on voluntary manslaughter, did not require them to find from the evidence that the shooting of the deceased by the defendant was willful and intentional; second, for failure and refusal of the trial court to instruct the jury upon the theory of involuntary manslaughter.

The common law divides felonious homicides into murder, voluntary manslaughter and involuntary manslaughter, and under an indictment for murder the accused, if the facts warranted it, may be convicted of either degree of the offense. In 4 Blackstone, 192, voluntary manslaughter is defined as "the unlawful intentional killing of another without malice;" and involuntary manslaughter as "the killing of another in doing some unlawful act, but without the intention to kill;" and this may be either where the act is directed against the person killed, or where it is directed against a another person or thing, and kills one not intended to be hurt.

Substantially the same definition is given in 21 A. & E. En. of Law, 2d edition, 172. And these definitions have been frequently approved by this court. (Connor v. Commonwealth, 76 Ky., 719; Buckner v. Commonwealth, 77 Ky., 601; Mitchell v. Commonwealth, 78 Ky., 219; Trimble v. Commonwealth, 78 Ky., 176; Bush v. Commonwealth, 78 Ky., 268; Smith v. Commonwealth, 93 Ky., 318; Commonwealth v. Matthews, 89 Ky., 287; Greer v. Commonwealth, 11 Ky., 99.) It is essential to the commission of voluntary manslaughter that the homicide should have been willfully and intentionally committed, or under such circumstances as to strike one at first blush as so reckless and wanton as to be felonious, though apparently not intended by the perpetrator. The entire criminal law is pervaded by this doctrine. Bishop in his New Criminal Law, volume 1, section 314, says: "Every act of gross carelessness, even in the performance of what is lawful, and a fortiori of what is not lawful, and every negligent omission of a legal duty whereby death ensues, is indictable either as murder or manslaughter."

And as an illustration of this principle, he speaks of the reckless use of fire arms.

In 1 Russell on Crimes, 636, the author says: "There are many acts so heedless and incautious as necessarily to be deemed unlawful and wanton, though there may not be any express intent to do mischief, and the party committing them, and causing death by such conduct, will be guilty of manslaughter. As where a gentleman came to town in a chaise, but before he got out of it, fired his pistol in the street, which, by accident, killed a woman, it was ruled manslaughter, for the act was so reckless as to breed danger and was manifestly improper."

In Sparks v. Commonwealth, 60 Ky., 111, it was decided that where a man intentionally and in a wanton, reckless and careless manner, fired off and discharged his pistol on a public street and thoroughfare of a town, and thereby shot and killed another, that such killing was manslaughter.

This case was followed by Chrystal v. Commonwealth, 72 Ky., 669, and Yorks v. Commonwealth, 82 Ky., 360. In the last case this court, through Judge Holt, said: "It may now be regarded as well settled in this State by numerous decisions of this court, that when one intentionally does an act in such a reckless and careless manner that it is calculated to endanger human life, and death ensues, he is guilty of manslaughter, although the death of the person killed may not have been intended."

This rule was also adhered to in Smith v. Commonwealth, 98 Ky., 318. In Spriggs, Jr. v. Commonwealth, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 540, the instructions in Sparks v. Commonwealth, Chrystal v. Same, and York v. Same were criticised because they made no distinction between voluntary and involuntary manslaughter, but authorized a conviction for the common law offense of manslaughter without the limiting adjective voluntary. But it was not decided in that case that if a a person willfully discharged a pistol in a street or other public place, and some one was killed by the shot, that such killing was not voluntary manslaughter. We are, therefore, of the opinion that whilst the instruction as to voluntary manslaughter was prejudicial to the substantial rights of the defendant, in omitting the use of the words willful and intentional, that the jury should also have been instructed that if they believed from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant intentionally, or in a wanton, careless and reckless manner fired off and discharged his pistol, and thereby shot and killed the deceased, that such killing was voluntary manslaughter, and punishable by confinement in the penitentiary. We are also of the opinion that the testimony in the case warranted the giving of an instruction upon involuntary manslaughter as defined in Connor v. Commonwealth, 76 Ky., 719.

For reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded for a new trial consistent with this opinion.

SHAW v. LOUISVILLE RAILWAY CO.

(Filed June 15, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Street railroad—Injury to bicycle rider—Warning by motorman—Where appellant was riding on a bicycle in front of a street car, near the track, the company is not liable for his injury where the motorman gave the customary warning by continuously sounding the gong, and having the car under proper control, and whether he was so acting was submitted to the jury who found that he was not in fault.

2. Same—The failure of the court to instruct the jury that if the motorman saw, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have seen appellant's danger in time to have avoided injuring him, but failing to do it, is liable notwithstanding appellant's contributory negligence, was not error, as appellant was not on the track and not in danger so long as he continued in the course and was not injured until the front end of the car had passed the bicycle.

Thos. Welsh and Matt O'Doherty for appellant.

R. L. Greene and Fairleigh, Straus & Fairleigh for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

Appellant, who was riding a bicycle alongside of appellee's track, was injured by falling against the side of a passing car, which was going in the same direction he was. Whether appellant was startled by the sudden appearance of the car (which is his counsel's theory), or whether he lost control of his wheel by reason of unevenness in the street, or other cause, can not easily be determined from the evidence. But which ever it may have been, appellee is not responsible in law for it if its motorman in charge of the car was, at the time in the exercise of due care toward appellant, by giving the customary warning by sounding his gong, and having his car under proper control. Whether or not he was so acting, was submitted to the jury, and they found for appellee that its motorman was not in fault. The sole objection is that the court failed to instruct the jury that if the motorman saw, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have seen, appellant's peril in time to have avoided injuring him, but failed to do so, it is liable notwithstanding appellant's contributory negligence. The motorman says he saw appellant for a distance of 150 feet before reaching him; that he sounded the gong, and appellant appeared to draw further away from the side of the track, though he was then clear of the space the car would need to pass him; that he continued to ring the gong, and that the front end of the car passed him in safety. Other witnesses corroborate the motorman upon these points. The motorman's having seen appellant and his proximity to the car, his duty to give the customary warnings and to control his car with reference to appellant's movement, or anticipated movements, attached. There was no place in this case for the instruction asked for. Appellant was not upon the track; he was not even in danger from the car so long as he continued in his course. The motorman had the right to assume that as he rang the gong continuously and as appellant appeared to heed it, that he was aware of its approach, and would govern his course accordingly. Appellant's danger was not an obvious one, nor was it probable that it would culminate in his injury. It existed only as does that element in the proximity of any person to a moving car or train. Suddenly losing consciousness, the turn of a foot on a pebble, if walking, the giving away of the wheel if riding, any slight and unforeseen impediment or accident might throw him against or in front of the moving car. The chances of the thing happening are so remote as not to call for the exercise of any extraordinary precaution on the part of the car driver, further than to warn the person that the car is approaching, and see that the other person is aware of its approach. There appears to us to be no error in the trial.

Judgment affirmed.

SHIRLEY v. SOUTHERN RAILWAY IN KENTUCKY.

(Filed June 15, 1904.)

Consideration of land—Appeal—Supersedeas—Discharge—Tender of damages awarded—Where, in a proceeding by a railroad company to condemn land upon which to build its road, the damages have been duly assessed by a judgment in the circuit court upon an appeal from the county court, the land owner can not, after the payment by the railroad company of all costs, and the tender to him of the damages awarded by the verdict of the jury, delay the railroad company in taking possession of the land under the judgment, by the execution of a supersedeas bond.

Robert Harding and W. C. Bell for appellant.

Boyle & Yeaman and Humphrey, Burnett & Humphrey for appellee.

Appeal from Mercer Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The appellee, the Southern Railway in Kentucky, instituted this proceeding against the appellant, Shirley, under subdivision 4 of article 5 of the Kentucky Statutes, for the condemnation of a strip of land one hundred feet wide and containing five and six-tenths acres of land for the purpose of constructing and operating their railroad thereon.

The commissioners appointed by the county court awarded appellant $2,500 for the value of the land actually taken, and incidental damages to the residue of the tract. Exceptions were filed by the railway company to the report of the commissioners, and a jury impaneled in the county court to try the issues of fact, who returned a verdict of $2,400 in damages for the appellant, and judgment was entered thereon. The railway company appealed from the county court judgment to the circuit court. A trial de novo in the circuit court resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of appellee for $1,700.

A motion for a new trial having been overruled, the railroad company paid the cost incidental to the condemnation proceeding in the county court, and tendered to the appellant $1,700, the amount awarded by the jury in the circuit court, which was declined. It thereupon paid the $1,700 into court and filed the affidavit of the county clerk showing that all costs of the condemnation proceedings in that court had been paid, and a writ of possession for the strip of land was awarded the railroad company. Shirley thereupon appealed to this court and executed a supersedeas bond, suspending the circuit court judgment, and the case now comes up for hearing upon a motion filed by the railroad company to discharge the supersedeas, in order that they may take possession of the land and proceed with the construction of their railway thereon.

The question turns upon the construction which is to give to section 889 of the Kentucky Statutes, which reads as follows:

"Section 889. When exceptions shall be filed by either party, the court shall forthwith cause a jury to be empaneled to try the issues of fact made by the exceptions, and each juror shall be allowed $1 per day for his services to be taxed as cost. In assessing the damages the jury shall be governed by the rule prescribed in section 886 of this law, and, upon the request of either party, may be sent by the court, in charge of the sheriff to view the land or material. If sufficient cause be not shown for setting aside the verdict, the court shall render judgment in conformity thereto, and shall make such orders as may be proper for the conveyance of the title upon the payment of the damages assessed. Either party may appeal to the circuit court, by executing bond, as required in other cases within thirty days, and the appeal shall be tried de novo. Upon the confirmation of the report of the commissioner by the county court, or the assessment of damages by said court, as herein provided, and the payment to the owners of the amount due, as shown by the report of the commissioners when confirmed, as shown by the judgment of the county court when the damages are assessed by said court, and all cost adjudged to the owner, the railroad company shall be entitled to take possession of said land and material, and to use and control the same for the purpose for which it was condemned as fully as if the title had been conveyed to it. But when an appeal shall be taken from the judgment of the county court by the company, it shall not be entitled to take possession of the land or material condemned until it shall have paid into court the damages assessed and all costs. All money paid into court under the provisions of law shall be received by the clerk of the court and held subject to the order of the court, for which he and his sureties on his official bond shall be responsible to the persons entitled thereto."

Appellant insists that the statute makes no provision for the tender and payment by the railroad company to the landholder of the damages which may be assessed in the circuit court upon the trial of the appeal, and confers no authority upon the circuit court to award to the railroad company possession of the condemned land except upon the payment of the judgment rendered upon the trial in the county court. On this point the statute says: "But when an appeal shall be taken from the judgment of the county court by the company, it shall not be entitled to take possession of the land or material condemned, until it shall have paid into court the damages assessed and all costs."

It is quite evident that the "payment into court" spoken of in this paragraph of the section of the statute does not refer to the payment of the county court judgment, as this has already been provided for by the preceeding paragraphs, but clearly referred to the payment into court of the damages which may be assessed upon the appeal in the circuit court. After the trial in the circuit court the judgment rendered therein takes the place of the county court judgment. On this point Freeman on Judgments, section 328, says: "The effect of an appeal from an inferior to a superior tribunal, where the superior tribunal is required to try the question appealed de novo, and render thereon such decision as in its opinion should be rendered under the law and evidence, is to vacate and set aside the judgment of the inferior tribunal."

The circuit court is the final tribunal provided by the statute for the determination of the amount which shall be awarded to the landholder by way of damages. No reason has been suggested, and none exists why a different rule of procedure should obtain after the trial in the circuit court than in the county court. We are supported in this view of the law by Blackkshire v. R. R. Co., 13 Kan., 514; Pool v. Breese, 114 Ill., 594; Peterson v. Fenly, 30 Ia., 537; Downing v. Demoines 63 Ia., 177; Jackson v. Baltimore, &c., R. R. Co., 45 N. J., Eq., 454; Lake Erie R. R. Co. v. Kinsey, 87 Ind., 514. It follows, therefore, that the landholder can not, after the tender to him of the damages awarded by the verdict of the jury in the circuit court, delay the railroad company in taking possession of the land under the judgment, by the execution of a supesdedeas bond.

For reason indicated the motion to discharge the supersedeas is sustained.

HOWARD v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed June 15, 1904—Not to be reported.)

W. M. Smith, J. A Violett, J. A. Scott and Carlo Little for appellant.

B. G. Williams, R. B. Franklin, L. W. Arnett, W. O. Davis and Poor & Stout for appellee.

Appeal from Franklin Circuit Court.

Judge Hobson delivered the following response to petition for rehearing:

The questions called to our attention in the petition for rehearing under the Constitution of the United States, were considered by the court on the original hearing and we adhere to the conclusion there reached that no right of appellant under the fifty-sixth or fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States has been violated.

The motion for rehearing is overruled.

CITY OF LEXINGTON v. BATSON'S ADM'R.

(Filed June 15, 1904.)

Smallpox—Pesthouse—Negligence in management—Liability of city—Death resulting—A city is not civilly liable in tort for the death of a patient sent to and confined in the city pesthouse by order of the board of health of said city, although it is alleged in the petition that the city suffered its pesthouse to become foul and unfit for use as such, and that it negligently failed to provide a suitable pesthouse for the detention and treatment of those who had been exposed to, or had the smallpox; that it failed to provide competent physicans or suitable or any medicine, or sufficient clothing or covering, or sufficient or fit food; that those in charge neglected plaintiff's intestate, by reason of all which he died, and although it is conceded that the evidence was sufficient to sustain the jury's verdict, finding for the plaintiff.

Wm. Rogers Clay and C. W. Miller for appellant.

Beauchamp & Calhoun for appellee.

Appeal from Fayette Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

Appellant, a city of the second class, is given the power to establish and enforce quarantine laws and regulations to prevent the introduction and spread of contagious diseases within the city, and to establish and maintain eruptive hospitals in the city. (Section 3058, Kentucky Statutes.) It is likewise made the duty of the city council to appoint a board of health which has the same powers within the city that the county board of health has in the county under the statute. (Section 2089, Kentucky Statutes.) Appellant had established such hospital and appointed the board of health. During an epidemic of smallpox in the city, plaintiff's intestate had been exposed to contagion, and was consequently confined by the order of the board of health in the city hospital. He became sick of the disease and died. It is charged that the city suffered its pesthouse to become foul and unfit for use as such, and that it negligently failed to provide a suitable pesthouse for the detention and treatment of those who had been exposed to or had the disease; that the city failed to provide competent physicians, or suitable or any medicines, or sufficient clothing or covering, or sufficient or fit food for the inmates; that those in charge neglected plaintiff's intestate in his sickness; by reason of all which he died. The evidence it is conceded was sufficient to sustain the jury's verdict finding for the plaintiff.

Under the authority of Twyman's Adm'r v. Board of Councilmen of Frankfort, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 1620, we must hold that the city is not civilly liable in tort for the acts complained of. The remedy, and so far as we know the only present legal protection of those unfortunates who may be maltreated as is charged in this suit, is by an indictment of the officers in charge for misfeasance or nonfeasance, and a civil action against the individuals who have been guilty of the wrongs. Plaintiff joined the members of the board of health as defendants to the suit. But the court let them out on a demurrer to the petition. Just why does not appear. But as there is no appeal or cross appeal by appellee, we refrain from commenting further on that action.

The judgment against the city is reversed and cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the petition.

ASHER v. LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE R. R. CO.

(Filed June 15, 1904.)

1. Judgment—Appeal—Reversal—Payment—Re-trial—Notice—In the year 1887 appellant Asher recovered a judgment against appellee L. & N. R. R. Co. for $3,000 damages for the right of way over appellant's land. On appeal this judgment was reversed in 1891, the same having been paid in 1888. At the May term, 1899, of the circuit court, eight years after the reversal, appellee filed a notice given to it by appellant that it would, on the second day of said term, file the mandate of the Court of Appeals, and redocket the case. No action was taken at that term and the notice was lost. At the October term, 1899, the court, without any additional notice, made an order reciting that the mandate had been theretofore filed, and ordered that the former judgment be set aside and directed the case to be redocketed. At the October term, 1902, when a special judge presided, a jury was impaneled, appellee introduced its evidence, and the jury returned a verdict for $900 damages. Thereupon appellee's counsel filed an affidavit that it had paid the former judgment of $3,000, and upon appellee's motion, judgment was awarded in favor of appellee against appellant for $2,100, the difference in the two judgments, with interest from August 10, 1888. All these proceedings were had in the absence of appellant and his counsel. Appellee contends that the proceeding is binding upon appellant because his attorney had stated to appellee's counsel a day or two before the judgment was rendered, that he did not regard this proceeding as regular, and did not intend to pay any attention to it until the time for him to make his defense, and then he would do so, and in addition to this, on the day of trial the court stopped the proceedings and sent a special messenger, who informed the appellant of the fact that they were about to enter upon the trial of the case, and he declined to make his appearance. Held—

First. That when a case has been stricken from the docket, and especially remained off as long as this one, before it could be reinstated by either party, a notice should have been served upon the opposite party of the intention to have an order made to that effect.

Second. The court had no power to render the judgment against appellant for the $2,100, on the state of the record.

Third. Even if the proceeding were regular with reference to the second trial, and the appellant was before the court on that branch of the case, he still was not before the court on the other branch of the case, but would have to be brought before it by rule, or direct action for the restitution; and as neither remedy was followed the judgment for restitution was void.

Fourth. The appellant having entered his appearance by this appeal, on the return of the case no notice will be necessary for further proceedings on the condemnation proceedings.

N. B. Hays and Hazelrigg, Chenault & Hazelrigg for appellant.

J. W. Alcorn and Benjamin D. Warfield for appellee.

Appeal from Bell Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

In the year 1887 the appellee began condemnation proceedngs to condemn a right of way over appellant Asher's farm in Bell county. A jury awarded appellant, in that action, $3,000 in damages. On appeal to this court that judgment was reversed, the opinion of this court in that case being delivered in February, 1891, and reported in 12 Ky. Law Rep., 815. It appears that the appellee paid appellant this $3,000 in the year 1888. Notwithstanding this payment and the reversal of that judgment in 1891, there is nothing in the record showing any effort made for the further hearing of the condemnation proceedings or to obtain another trial before a jury in that case until at the May term, 1899, over eight years after the reversal. At that term the appellee produced and filed a notice given by it to the appellant that it would, on the second day of that term, move to file the mandate of the Court of Appeals and redocket that case. This was all that was done at that term and no motion was in fact made to redocket the case and the mandate was not in fact filed. This notice was lost, not having been called up, and no action of the court obtained thereon, and the matter stood precisely as if no notice to file the mandate or docket the case had been given. (Section 447, Civil Code, and Foster v. Wade, 4 Met., 253.)

At the October term of the same year, the court, without any additional notice to the appellant, made an order reciting that the mandate of the Court of Appeals had been theretofore filed, and copied the mandate, and ordered, that in obedience to this mandate the, judgment for the $3,000 in favor of the appellant be set aside, and directed the case to be redocketed. The case remained on the docket without action until the October term, 1902, when a special judge, who had been appointed by the governor, presided in the trial of the case. A jury was empaneled, the appellee introduced its evidence and the jury returned a verdict allowing appellant only $900 for the damage to his land by reason of the road passing through it.

Appellee's counsel filed an affidavit to the effect that the appellant had been paid by the appellee the $3,000, the amount of the former judgment, and moved the court for a judgment against him for the difference, $2,100, with interest from the 10th day of August, 1888. The order recited that the motion came on to be heard, and on testimony heard in open court it found that appellee had paid appellant this sum of $3,000 and deducted the $900 that day awarded, and rendered judgment in accordance with the motion. And on that day and in the same order the court appointed a special commissioner who conveyed the strip of land taken by the road, to the appellee. All of these proceedings were had in the absence of the appellant and his counsel.

Appellee contends that this proceeding is binding upon the appellant because his attorney, a day or two before this judgment was rendered, had stated to the counsel for the appellee that he did not regard this proceeding as regular, and did not intend to pay any attention to it until the time arrived for him to make defense, and then he would do; so and in addition to this, on the day of the trial and after the case had been called for trial, the court stopped the proceedings and sent a special messenger to inform the appellant of the fact that they were about to enter into the trial of his case. Appellant was informed in person by this mesenger, and he declined to make his appearance in court.

We are of the opinion that when a case has been stricken from the docket and especially after it had remained off the docket as long as this one, that before it could be reinstated upon the docket by either party, a notice should have been served upon the opposite party of the intention to have an order made to that effect. The record does not show, nor is it claimed by the appellee that any such notice was ever served upon the appellant, except the one referred to which was lost by the failure to have the court to act upon it.

The court erred in rendering judgment against appellant for the $2,100 and its interest, the difference between the two judgments. The court had not the power to render this judgment of restitution on the state of the record. Even if the proceeding were regular with reference to the second assessment of damages by the jury, and the appellants were before the court on that branch of the case, he still was not before the court on this branch of it, but would have to be brought before it by rule or direct action for the restitution. And as neither remedy was followed by the court, the action of the court in adjudging restitution in this case was void. There is no pretense that appellant had any notice of any kind or character of this proceeding of restitution. (85 Ky., 379; 6 Ky. Law Rep., 299.)

Wherefore, the judgment of the lower court is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion, and appellant having entered his appearance by this appeal, on the return of the case no notice will be necessary for further proceedings on the condemnation proceedings.

HARRIS v. HOWARD, &c.

(Filed June 15, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Homestead—Widow—A widow is not entitled to homestead in a tract of land where neither the pleadings nor the record show that her husband ever occupied it or intended to occupy it as a homestead, or that she has ever lived upon it as such.

W. F. Hall and W. C. L. Huff for appellant.

Clay & Hardin for appellees.

Appeal from Harlan Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

The widow of a decedent who died intestate owning a lot of land worth less than $1,000, claims that the whole of it should be set apart to her, instead of being allotted merely dower in the lot. Her pleadings failed to show, nor does the record show, that her husband ever occupied it or intended to occupy it as a homestead; or that she has ever lived upon it as such. Upon the authority of Higgins v. Higgins, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 1824, and the statute therein referred to, the judgment of the circuit court denying her claim of homestead is affirmed.

E. T. KENNEY CO. v. ANDERSON, &c.

(Filed June 15, 1904—Not to be reported.)

This action was brought to recover the balance of the money agreed to be paid the appellees for "one Star engine on trucks," the price being $1,080, for which four notes were given and delivered to one Benefiel, and on which $372 had been paid to said Benefiel, who was the general agent of appellant. The engine was warranted to be of good material, well constructed, and, with proper care and management, to do as good work as any other engine of the same size and rated capacity (14-horse power) made for the same purpose. The appellees allege in their answer that the engine was worthless, had broken down in a few days after it was bought, and after being repeatedly repaired and worked on by appellant's employes, sent for that purpose, finally had to be abandoned as absolutely worthless; and in their answer tendered the engine to appellants and asked a cancellation of their notes, and a recovery of the purchase money paid, and for their costs and damages. The lower court adjudged that the notes sued on be canceled; that appellant take the machine, and pay appellees $300, with interest and costs. This case was decided mainly upon the evidence, the court holding:

First. That appellant did not prove its allegation that the engineers put in charge of the engine by appellees were incompetent or unskillful, except by inference, in that they did not make the engine run.

Second. Appellant contends that it is not liable on its warranty, for the reason that appellees did not, within six days after the engine failed to work, give written notice thereof. The purpose of this stipulation was to give the seller an opportunity to have an expert to visit and repair the defects in the engine, for its protection and benefit as well as that of the buyer; and it appears that it did get the notice and sent the expert, and thereby waived its right to the giving of the notice in the exact manner set out in the written warranty.

Third. Appellant contends that even if its agent, Benefiel, made an agreement with appellees which induced them to make a payment on the engine, still it is not liable because Benefiel was not a general agent with power to make a contract binding on the appellant. Held—That if appellant accepted and held the money paid by appellees to Benefiel, with knowledge of the contract made by him, it is estopped to deny his right to make it; and there is no evidence that appellees had any notice or knowledge of any limitation upon the power of Benefiel if there was any.

Fourth. The contract with reference to agent stated: "Local agents and salesmen are only authorized to make sales in accordance with special instructions and upon forms furnished by the company. Mechanical experts are not agents and have no authority to bind the company by any contract or statement whatever." The use of this language in the contract, by implicaton, was notice to appellees that an agent other than those therein described did have such power as was excluded from those named; and Benefiel was shown not to be one of those described, but was a general agent transacting business generally and not confined to Kentucky.

Fifth. When appellant's agent, Benefiel, collected the first note, he then assured the appellees, that if the engine could not be made to fill the warranty, the company would take it back and furnish a new one or refund the money. Appellees accepted this proposition and when it was finally ascertained that the engine could not be made to do the work and appellant's agent asked for a return of the engine, appellees had the right to ask a return of the money before delivering up the engine.

Sixth. The preponderance of the evidence shows that the engine was not a 14-horse power engine as warranted, but was of less capacity.

Burnam & Moberly and W. S. Moberly for appellant.

Chenault & Chenault, H. C. Hazelwood and J. Tevis Cobb for appellees.

Appeal from Madison Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

On the 13th of June, 1899, the appellees made an agreement with one Robt. C. Hall, for the purchase of one Star engine on trucks, at an agreed price which was afterwards modified on the date of the receipt of the engine, to wit: The 22d of June, 1899, and on that day the appellees executed to the Aultman Co. their four notes, three of them for $300 each, and one for $180. These notes were executed in the office of Delong & Co. and delivered to one Benefiel. At that time and for some months afterwards, appellees were under the belief that Hall, Benefiel and Delong & Co. were all the agents of the Aultman Co. and were also under the impression that they had purchased the engine from that company, when the fact was that the beforenamed parties were the agents of the appellant, the E. T. Kenney Co., who purchased and sold the machinery of the Aultman Co.

The appellees paid the first of the $300 notes, with its interest, and $72 on the $180 note, and failed and refused to pay anything further thereon, and this action was brought by the appellants to recover the balance of the purchase price and to enforce the mortgage lien which appellant had retained on this engine and trucks. To this petition appellees filed their answer and several amended answers, in which they, in substance, alleged that at the time of their purchase of this engine, the appellant warranted it to be made of good material, well constructed, and with proper use and management to do as good work as any other of the same size and rated capacity made for the same purpose; and they warranted it to be a 14-horse power engine and suitable for hauling a threshing machine over the country and driving the machinery when threshing. The written warranty of the appellant, which was delivered to the appellees at the time of the purchase of the engine, is as follows:

"The machinery and extra parts specified above are warranted to be made of good material, well constructed, and with proper use and management, to do as good work as any other of the same size and rated capacity made for the same purpose. If, inside of six days after the date of its first use, it shall fail in any respect to fill this warranty, written notice shall be given immediately by the purchaser to the Aultman Co. at its office at Canton, Ohio, by registered letter, and written notice also to the local agent through whom same is received, stating particularly in said letter and notice what parts and wherein it fails to fill the warranty, and a reasonable time to be allowed said company to get skilled workmen to the machinery and remedy the defects, if there be any (if the defects be of such a nature that a remedy can not be suggested by letter,) the purchaser to render all necessary and friendly assistance and co-opperation in making the machinery a practical success. If the machinery, or any part thereof, or any of the separate attachments, can not be made to fill the warranty, then the defective machine, or part, or attachment (as the case may be), shall be returned immediately by the undersigned to the place where it was received, with the option in the company either to furnish another machine, or part, or attachment, in place of that so returned, which shall perform the work, or return the consideration or a proportionate share thereof, and rescind the contract in whole or in part, as the case may be, and be released from any other liability whatever herein, and to ascertain the proportionate share of the consideration for any machine, part or attachment, when its price is not specified separately, the gross consideration shall be apportioned in proportion to the list prices printed hereon, and shall be refunded out of the cash and credited on the several notes proportionately.

"If any metallic piece breaks during the first season by reason of any flaw therein, the company will furnish a new piece in its place, free on board cars at the factory, upon said broken piece being returned to the company promptly, if it appears thereby to the satisfaction of the company that the break was caused by a flaw.

"If a mechanical expert visits the machine for the company, and does not leave it working properly, the purchaser shall give immediate notice in writing or by prepaid telegram to said company at its home office, and to the local agent, and state in writing specifically any failure or neglect complained of.

"Failure to make settlement for the machine at the time and place of delivery and in the manner above provided; or a failure to give any of the notices in writing as provided for herein; or failure to render friendly assistance or co-opperation; or keeping the machine after the six days allowed as above provided; or any abuse, misuse, unnecessary exposure or waste committed or suffered by the purchaser, shall be a waiver of the warranty, and a full release of the warrantor, without in any way affecting the liability of the purchaser for the price of the machine or notes given therefor.

"Notice—All agreements appertaining to this order (except the mere acceptance thereof at the home office) are included in the above.

"The above warranty is the form furnished by the Aultman Co., and is the only form of warranty made or authorized by it to be given on the above named machine. No agent or other person shall make any different warranty, or vary or modify any of the terms, or waive any of the conditions of this warranty, and any attempt to do so shall not bind the company nor affect this contract. Local agents and salesmen have no general agency powers, and are authorized only to make sales in accordance with special instructions and upon forms furnished by said company. Mechanical experts are not agents, and have no authority to bind said company by any contract or statement, whatever, or to vary any terms or waive any condition of any contract. This order is subject to the acceptance and approval of the company at its home office, and when so approved and accepted, is a binding contract which no person has authority to modify or vary in any respect, or to waive any of its conditions except in writing approved by the management at the home office, and any attempt to otherwise change any of the terms or waive any of the provisions of the warranty will not be binding on said company; nor will any modification in the price, terms of payment or securities in any way affect the warranty and its provisions Notes for any part of the purchase price must all be made payable to the company on the forms furnished by it; otherwise they will not bind said company nor release the buyer."

The appellees alleged that they performed specifically each of the conditions required of them by the contract, and also alleged that the engine proved to be worthless; that it was not made of good materials, nor was it well constructed, nor did it, with proper use and management, do as good work as any other of the same size and rated capacity made for the same purpose; that appellant did not and could not make it perform the work for which it was purchased, as required by the contract, and also alleged that they had paid about $400 of the purchase price after they and appellant had ascertained the defects and insufficiency of the machine as stated. The payments were made to Mr. Benefiel, appellant's alleged general agent, under the following circumstances and agreements. Appellees refused to pay anything on the machine for the reason of the failure of the warranty, whereupon Benefiel, promised and agreed with them that if they would make the payment, that before the next threshing season began the appellant would send an expert to the machine and have him make it comply with the warranty, and in case of a failure in this, the company would furnish the appellees a new engine, or surrender to the appellees their notes and return to them the cash they had paid.

Appellees alleged that the appellant had failed to comply with this agreement made by Benefiel, tendered the engine and asked a cancellation of the notes sued on and for a judgment for the money paid by them on the engine and other damages sustained.

Appellant replied to this answer entering a denial to each of the allegations therein, and specifically alleged that appellees were estopped from claiming any benefit under the warranty, for the reason that they had failed to give the Aultman Co. the notices, as required by the written warranty, and because the defects in the engine, if any there were, were the result of incompetent and unskilled persons being employed by appellees to run and manage it, and also because appellees had paid a part of the purchase price after the discovery of the defects. Appellant also denied the power and authority of Benefiel to make the contract alleged, or to waive appellant's rights under the warranty, or that it had notice of such a contract if made, and by reason thereof was not bound. The issues were completed, the proof taken by deposition, and the court adjudged in effect as follows: That the notes sued on be cancelled, the appellant take the engine, and that appellant pay to appellees the sum of $300, with interest and costs.

The proof on the material questions involved on this appeal is in substance as follows: The appellees commenced to use this engine about the 24th of July, 1897, at which time it exhibited defects, which the engineer was able to remedy, until the fourth day thereafter, when it completely broke down. Appellee Anderson went to Richmond and called up over the long distance telephone appellant's agent, Delong, at Lexington, and informed him of the condition of the engine, and being unable, by the telephone, to make Delong understand the particulars of the defects and breakage in the engine, early the next morning he took the train for Lexington and called on Delong in person, and, after explaining to Delong the condition of the engine, asked him if it would not be right for him to notify the company; he then believing that the Aultman Co. was the proper company to notify. Delong told him that it would not be necessary as he had already notified them by telephone, and that they would have an expert there in a few days. Thereafter, and about the 9th of August, one Wilson, an expert machinist, representing appellant, arrived at the engine and attempted to remedy the defects. By his efforts he caused it to run for a very short time, but it broke down again a few hours after he left. Wilson stated when he left that he had to go to some other place, but would return again soon, but he did not return again that season. Appellees learned for the first time, from Wilson, on the occasion of his visit to the engine, that the appellant, and not the Aultman Co., was the real seller of the engine. Whereupon they wrote to appellant and stated that their expert had been there, but had failed to remedy the defects. Soon after this Benefiel appeared on the scene and undertook to aid in running it for about a week. With his help, and such other assistance as they could get in the vicinity, they succeeded in threshing a few crops, at the rate of 150 or 200 bushels per day. It finally gave down and they put it under the shed and notified the company that it would not work, and thus matters stood until the last day of December, 1899, when Benefiel arrived, as he claimed, for the purpose of collecting the first note, which was due the previous October. Appellees refused to pay him because the appellant had failed to make the engine run and perform the work as warranted. The proof shows by two or three witnesses that, to induce appellees to pay this note, Benefiel did make the promise, as stated in appellees' answer. Benefiel says that he only stated that appellant would comply with their written warranty. On this occasion appellees did not pay the full amount of their note, but paid a part, and promised to pay the remainder in a short time.

That the company had notice that Benefiel made an agreement with appellees in substance as stated, is evidenced by the following letter which the president of the appellant company files as a part of his deposition:

"Blue Grass, Ky., January 1, 1900.

"Dear Sir—In regard to your letter which was received a few days past I shall get the money as soon as possible as I was away from home when Mr. Benefiel was here and did not get to see him and have been confined to my bed sick ever since until now. We would have paid the note at once, except our engine did not work for us, and Mr. Williams saw Mr. Benefiel, who said he would make it all O. K. and if could not make it all right didn't want us to keep it. It seems like we are dealing with a respectable company and when the company agrees to their part, we can't expect more, and that is all we can ask, so you may rest easy a few days and we will send the other money as quick as possible.

"Yours truly,

(Signed) "NEAL ANDERSON."

Some time in June, and before the threshing season began, the expert, Wilson, arrived and worked about an hour and a half on the engine. There was no test made of it at that time, but he said he would return when they began to thresh. This he did not do. They attempted to thresh a short time that season, but being unable to make the engine work, they pulled in long before the season was over. They had engineers of long practice and experience, but they could not manage it or make it work. Benefiel and Wilson appeared on the day they ceased to try to run it, and offered to make it run. Appellees told them that they had no objection to their doing so, but as to them, they were done with it, as it had damaged them too much already. Benefiel asked that they surrender to him the engine, which appellees said they would do, if he would surrender to them their notes and refund to them the money they had paid. This he refused to do, stating that he had no money, and they then agreed to have a friendly law suit.

Appellant did not prove that the engineers put in charge of this engine by appellees were not competent or skilled except by inference, in that they did not make this engine run. Appellant contends that it is not liable on the warranty for the reason that appellees did not, within six days, give written notice to the Aultman Co., by registered letter, of the defects in the engine, nor did it give such notice to the local agent, Delong & Co., at Lexington. The purpose of this stipulation, in this contract of warranty, was to give the seller of the engine an opportunity to have an expert visit it and repair the defects, for its protection and benefit, as well as that of the buyer. The notice was the essential thing, and it appears that it did get the notice and act upon it by sending its expert to the engine; and even if appellant had the right to demand the giving of the notice in the exact way and manner as prescribed in the contract, it waived its right thereto by accepting and acting upon the notice it did receive. See the case of Frick Co. v. Morgan & Co., 24 Ky. Law Rep., 837, in which there was a written warranty similar to the one in the case at bar. And there was no allegation or proof that the Frick Co. had any notice of any kind that the engine was defective in any manner. In that case the court said: "It is clear from the testimony, that appellants never waived the conditions of their contract as to the notice, and as appellees failed to comply therewith, they can not be permitted, after using the separator for more than two years, to defend an action for the purchase money on the ground that it failed to work satisfactorily."

The court in that case clearly indicated that warrantors in such cases may waive the conditions of their contract as to the manner and method of giving notice.

In Vol. 28, Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law, 1st edition, 832, in speaking of warranties similar to the one at bar, it is said: "The notice is not necessary where the seller's agent is present at the trial of the machine, and sees its failure to work as warranted, or where he otherwise impliedly waives notice, as by attempting to remedy a defect." And again on page 833, in note 2: "And although a notice in writing may be required by the contract, yet if the seller responds to an oral notice given to an agent, he thereby waives his right to a notice in writing." (Davis v. Butrick, 68 Ia., 94.)

The appellant complains that this notice was not given to the Aultman Co., and that its, the Kenney Co.'s, compliance with this notice by sending an expert to this engine, was not a waiver of the notice to the Aultman Co. The president of the Aultman Co., in his deposition, stated that it was not the seller of the engine; that it sold to the appellant, Kenney Co., and that if the notice had been given to the Aultman Co., as required by the writing, that it would have sent the same to Indianapolis, Ind., to the Kenney Co., the seller of the engine to the appellees, that it, the Kenney Co., might send the expert. This witness was introduced by appellant and his testimony was not controverted by it. Under these facts it would have been a vain and useless thing to have sent a notice to the Aultman Co., at Canton, O. The reasonable and proper thing to have done was what they did do, to get the notice as quickly as possible to the person whose duty it was to send the expert and the real seller of the engine.

Appellant contends that, even if Benefiel made the contract with appellees which induced them to make a payment on this engine, and it accepted and held the money with knowledge of such contract, still it is not liable or bound thereby, because Benefiel was not a general agent with power to make such contracts. In this we think appellant is mistaken. If it accepted and held the money with knowledge of the contract made by Benefiel, it is estopped to deny that he had the right to make the contract. In addition to this, there is no evidnce showing that appellees had any notice or knowledge of the limitations upon the power of Benefiel, if any there was. The contract with reference to agents contains this language: "Local agents and salesmen have no general agency powers and are authorized only to make sales in accordance with special instructions and upon forms furnished by the company. Mechanical experts are not agents and have no authority to bind said company by any contract or statement whatever, or to vary any terms or waive any conditions of any contract."

The use of this language in the contract, by implication, at least, was notice to appellees that an agent, other than therein described, did have such powers, as therein excluded from the agents named. The proof shows clearly that Benefiel was not one of such agents. Appellant stated that he was the general collector of the company, but acted under special instructions. The proof showed that he not only collected for the company, but transacted generally the business of the company, and that he was not confined to Kentucky, but had territory in other States. The appellant also contends that the appellees can not claim the benefit of this warranty, for the reason they did not return the engine to appellant at the place at which they received it. The contract says that if the machinery can not be made to fill the warranty, then it is to be returned, but it is not stated in the contract who is to determine whether or not it fills the warranty. The appellees seem to have been under the impression that after appellant's expert had attempted to make it fill the warranty and failed, that it could not be done. Appellant seemed to have had a different opinion, and desired further time in which to test this matter. When appellant's agent, Benefiel, collected the first note, he then assured appellees that, if the engine could not be made to fill the warranty, the company would take the engine back or furnish a new one or refund the money paid by appellees. Appellees accepted this proposition, and when it was finally ascertained that the engine could not be made to perform the work and appellant's agent asked for a return of the engine, appellees had the right to ask a return of the money before delivering to the appellant the possession of the engine.

The preponderance of the evidence was that the engine was not in accordance with the warranty, as it appears to have been light and frail, and did not have sufficient power to drive a thresher, and there must have been an inherent defect in the construction of it. There was an unusual "knock" in it from the very beginning, which continued until they ceased to use it. According to the evidence of appellant it is probable that this engine was less than a 14-horse power. The witness, Martin J. Hogan, said he superintended the construction of this engine, and in describing it used the following language: "It gave the full power of a 14-horse traction engine. The cylinder was 8¼ inches in diameter by 10 inches piston stroke, and running at 200 revolutions per minute will furnish power for a 14-horse traction engine." Appellant's witness, Tuttle, who professed to be an expret, on being asked how to explain or read horse-power in an engine, answered: "You take the diameter of the cylinder, stroke of the engine and revolutions per minute," and stated that the diameter of the cylinder of this engine was 8¼ inches, and that to produce 14-horse power, the length of the stroke should be 12 inches and the number of revolutions 240 per minute.

If Tuttle was right as to what it took to constitute a 14-horse power engine, and if Hogan, the person who superintended the construction of it, gave a correct description of it, then this engine was less than a 14-horse-power engine. As further evidence of this fact, the appellant filed as a part of the record, a copy of its letter in answer to its agent, Hall's letter, ordering the engine, in which it stated to Hall: "We might fill the order with a 12 h. p. engine, but want to call your attention to one thing, that is, we will not fill it with a 10 h. p. or 12 h p. when the order calls for a 14 h. p. We hold the order awaiting your advices before passing on it."

From this it appears that the company at least hesitated and possibly declined to fill the order with a 14-horse power engine for the price offered.

Appellant has referred to the case of Watts v. The National Cash Register Co., 25 Ky. Law Rep., 1947, and McCormick Harvesting Machine Co. v. Arnold, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 663, as in point and sustaining its contention. These cases have no application to the case at bar because in these cases the sale was a conditional sale or one in which the purchaser had the right to make a trial of the article before finally deciding whether or not he would purchase, and in these sales there was no sale with a warranty, as in the case at bar.

Wherefore, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

EVENING POST CO v. RHEA.

(Filed June 16, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Libel—Actionable publication—Questionable acts of appellee—Excessive verdict—On October 26, 1900, appellant, a corporation owning a daily paper in Louisville, Ky., published an article concerning appellee, charging him with certain election frauds in his capacity as one of the county election commissioners of Logan county, for which appellee brought this suit for damages, to which appellant affirmatively pleaded justification as a purveyor of news in the defense of the action. A trial resulted in a verdict in favor of appellee in the sum of $4,500. Held by a majority of the court—That appellee, on the trial, established a cause of action against appellant, but all the court agree that the verdict is flagrantly excessive. Appellants' own evidence, including the avowal of his counsel at bar, showed that a letter referred to in the publication, was written for the purpose of making A. G. Rhea appear in the role of a political criminal, and that this letter deceived and imposed upon appellant's correspondent; that although it was untrue in fact, appellant believed it to be true, and if appellee and his brother chose to masquerade as criminals they ought not to much complain if they were taken at their word, and spoken and written of as belonging to the role which they voluntarily assumed, and it is this consideration that has enabled us to reach the conclusion that the verdict is excessive. We perceive no other error in the record.

Helm, Bruce & Helm and Wilbur F. & J. C. Browder for appellant.

W. P. Sandidge for appellee.

Appeal from Logan Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

On the 26th of October, 1900, appellant, which is a corporation owning a daily newspaper in Louisville, Ky., published the following article concerning appellee:

"1st. Same Old Tactics. They Name all Logan County Election Officers, Appointing a Few Men as Republicans Who are not Republicans.

"Evening Post. special service.

"Russellville, Ky., October 26.—The appointment of the precinct election officers for this county just made here indicates that the Goebel gang will this year resort to the same high handed tactics as employed last year.

"2d. The county board is composed of Tom Rhea, who is a brother of John Rhea, and is himself a candidate for sheriff; John Edwards and L. A. Freeman, the latter being the Republican member of the board. Of the forty-two officers to which they are entitled under the law, the Repuublicans got only fifteen of those recommended, the Democratic members of the board appointing sixty-nine of the eighty-four officers. In many cases the men appointed as Republican officers were not Republicans. At least one man appointed as a republican does not live in this county. The Republicans and Anti-Goebel Democrats are terribly wrought up over the outrage, and feeling is running high.

"3d. The frauds that were contemplated in certain Democratic precincts in the election last year, and which were detected and prevented, will probably be attempted this year on a larger scale than ever. The closest watch will be kept on all proceedings, and at the first evidence of fraud some sensational arrests will follow. It is an open secret here that certain parties have written evidence, sufficient to convict at least one Goebelite in the Federal court, for an offense committed last year, and it is said that upon the first evidence of fraud in the approaching election, this party, and probably some others, will be taken in charge by the authorities.

"The people are long suffering, but have made up their minds this time to have a free ballot and a fair count."

The appellee, together with John Edwards and L. A. Freeman, composed the county election commissioners of Logan county, Kentucky, and were charged with the duty of selecting the precinct officers to hold the general election in that county in November, 1900; and it was the manner of the discharge of this duty that inspired the publication in question. Conceiving that the article was libelous as to him, appellee instituted this action in the Logan Circuit Court, to recover damages, making the usual and necessary allegations to present a cause of action against appellant. The latter entered a general denial to all of the material allegations of the petition, except as to the publication, and affirmatvely pleaded justification and its privilege as a purveyor of news in defense of the action. A trial resulted in a verdict in favor of appellee, in the sum of $4,500, to reverse the judgment, for which this appeal is prosecuted.

For convenience, we have divided the publication into sections 1, 2 and 3. It was written by S. W. Linebough, a special correspondent of appellant, living in Russellville, Ky. The facts constituting section 2 of the publication were obtained by the correspondent from L. A. Freeman, the Republican member of the board of election commissioners, and, while not altogether correct, they were in part, at least, true. The third section was claimed by the appellant not to have been intended to refer to appellee at all; and this is apparently true, as appears from an inspection of its contents; it was based upon, and referred to, the following transaction, as shown by appellee: The year before, just prior to the general election of 1899, the appellee and his brother, A. G. Rhea, in order to carry out a political plot formed by them, wrote a letter to one Joe Brown, whereby it was made to appear that A. G. Rhea had committed certain political crimes with reference to the colored voters in Logan county, and which, if true, would incriminate him under Federal statutes regulating the matter. This letter was to be taken by Joe Brown to Mr. Wilbur Browder, who appears to have been the treasurer of the Republican party in that county, and also an attorney for the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co.; Brown was to pretend to betray the Democratic party, and to sell the letter to Browder for money, and also to regain a lost position, which he had formerly held with the railroad. This letter was not true, but only pretended to be, and will, perhaps, be more clearly explained by the following avowal made by counsel for appellee at the bar of the trial court:

"We propose to prove that * * * the plaintiff, T. S. Rhea and A. G. Rhea, laid a trap to catch Mr. Browder, and that they caught him; that the letter referred to by the witness was written and signed by A. G. Rhea, and pursuant to said plan or scheme adopted by said T. S. Rhea, A. G. Rhea * * * for the purpose of being sold to Mr. Browder; that the letter was to have the semblance of criminality, or was to appear to be incriminating as affecting the said A. G. Rhea in its contents, and that on that account Mr. Browder would pay a good price for it; that that plan was successfully carried out, and that Mr. Browder has gotten the letter;" and by the following excerpts from the testimony of A. G. Rhea: "I wrote the final letter because I understood that I was the man they were after, and that I would bring a bigger price, and I said, 'I will write one that will bring it;' and in that letter I told him to keep the negroes away from the polls, and run them into Tennessee, any way to keep them out, and to get out the white folks. And the suggestion was made, and we put it in there, that Joe Brown could carry out his part, and that we would carry out ours, and we could get what we were justly entitled to, and you (addressing himself to Mr. Browder) would think that Joe had worked us, and we would get our normal majority by putting it up 150 higher than it ought to be. * * * It had been suggested that if he attempt to control the negro vote, either by purchase or keeping them away from the polls, or by any one using his influence among them who was friendly to them, that he would come under the jurisdiction of the Federal court, and I told them I would put it in there and keep them away if I could, and I would take the chance with the Federal court."

The letter referred to was sold to Browder, and the political conspiracy, from the standpoint of appellee and his friends, was eminently successful. Browder seems to have made no use of the letter, but filed it away in his desk at his law office, and it was subsequently shown to the correspondent of appellant by Browder's son; and this is the evidence referred to in section 3 of the publication complained of. It appears that Browder, his son, and appellant's correspondent, believed in the genuineness of the letter, and the truth of its contents. So far as the 3d section is concerned, appellant seems to have builded wiser than it knew; for, at the time of the publication, it had no intimation that appellee had any part in its composition, and, therefore, the reference was intended only to A. G. Rhea, whose name was subscribed thereto; appellee's complicity in the matter was brought out by himself, it being wholly unknown up to that time by appellant.

The majority of the court have reached the conclusion that appellee, upon the trial below, established a cause of action against appellant, but that, under all the circumstances of the case, the verdict is flagrantly excessive. Appellee's own evidence, including the avowals of his counsel at bar, showed that the letter referred to in the third section of the publication was written for the purpose of making A. G. Rhea appear in the role of a political criminal, and that this letter deceived and imposed upon appellant's correspondent; that although it was untrue in fact, appellant believed it to be true; and if appellee and his brother chose to masquerade as criminals, they ought not to much complain if they were taken at their word, and spoken and written of as belonging to the role which they voluntarily assumed; and it is this consideration that has enabled us to reach the conclusion that the verdict is excessive.

Perceiving no other error in the record the judgment is reversed, because the verdict is excessive, for proceedings consistent herewith.

Whole court sitting.

Chief Justice Burnam delivered the following dissenting opinion:

I concur in the reversal of the judgment in this case, but am clearly of the opinion that no cause of action is shown to exist in favor of the plaintiff, and the jury should have been directed to find for the defendant.

CITY OF LOUISVILLE v. LOUISVILLE RAILWAY CO.

(Filed June 16, 1904.)

1. Taxation—Ad valorem—License or occupation—Gross earnings—Constitution—Void ordinance—Prior to the adoption of the present Constitution, appellee had an arrangement with the city, by which, in consideration of the franchises granted, it was to pay the city $50 yearly for each car run upon its railway. After the adoption of the present Constitution and present statutes, an ordinance was adopted and it was agreed that the appellee should pay the city a license tax of 2½ per cent. on its gross earnings in lieu of all other taxes. This act went into effect February 1, 1894. This ordinance was void, but under it appellee paid a large sum of money to the city. The city sues in these actions for the ad valorem tax on appellant's property and franchises levied under the new Constitution and the statutes enacted thereunder. Held—That while under section 181 of the Constitution, a license or occupation tax may be authorized, and this power is conferred under sections 3011-3012, Kentucky Statutes, governing cities of the first class, no occupation or license tax was imposed by the general council under the power conferred, and therefore, in the absence of such action the appellee was not liable for a license tax during the time covered by the taxes sued for. It was not required to pay the $50 per car, for this old scheme had passed away, and it was bound to pay its ad valorem taxes on its property and franchises as other property holders. The ordinance allowing it to pay 2½ per cent. of its income in lieu of its ad valorem taxes and other taxes, was void; still the money paid under this void ordinance had gone into the city treasury and must be credited on the ad valorem taxes which were in fact due, and the circuit court properly allowed appellee credit for the sums so paid.

2. Failure to pay when due—Interest—Appellee could have learned exactly what its taxes were from the record made by the board of valuation and assessment, and should have tendered the money and stopped interest, and failing to do so, interest should have been allowed on the taxes for the years 1894-5 and 6, from the time they were payable.

H. L. Stone, City Attorney, for appellant.

Boyle & Yeaman and Humphrey, Burnett & Humphrey for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

These actions were brought by the city of Louisville against the Louisville Railway Co. to recover certain taxes. This is the third appeal. (City of Louisville v. Louisville Railway Co., 111 Ky., 1, and City of Louisville v. Louisville Railway Co., 24 Ky. Law Rep., 438.) Nearly all the questions involved have heretofore been settled, and only the following need now be considered. Previous to the adoption of the present Constitution and the statutes pursuant thereto, the street railway company had an arrangement with the city, by which, in consideration of the franchises granted, it was provided: "That the said Louisville City Railway Co. shall, for the franchise and privilege herein granted to construct and operate railways over the streets hereinbefore named, pay into the city treasury of the city of Louisville, each and every year, the sum of $35, tax or license, for each and every car run upon their said railways, or such other sum as the general council may fix, not less than $25 and not to exceed $50 for each car so used by said company, so long as said company shall operate said railways, or so long as the same shall be operated by any other company."

The amount to be paid was subsequently fixed by ordinance at $50 a car. After the adoption of the present Constitution and the present statutes, an arrangement was made between the street railway company and the city by which it agreed to pay a license tax of 2½ per centum on the gross earnings of the company in lieu of all other taxes. This ordinance, after setting out the previous arrangement, reads as follows: "Now, therefore, be it ordained that the said license tax of 2½ per centum on the gross earnings of the said company shall be in lieu and instead of the license taxes provided in the said contracts, and that the amount so paid shall be in full discharge of the taxes due to the said city, except that the said company shall pay the same tax upon its lands as is paid by other owners of lands in the city of Louisville. The provisions of this ordinance shall take effect upon the acceptance of its provisions by the said company, and the license tax to be paid under it shall be estimated upon its gross earnings from and after February 1, 1894."

The railway company paid its license tax of $50 per car until the ordinance above quoted took effect, and after that paid the tax of 2½ per cent. on its gross earnings. The tax year begins on September 1 of the preceding calender year. The taxes for 1894 are, therefore, assessed as of September 1, 1893. The city sues in these actions for the ad valorem tax on appellee's property and franchises, levied under the new Constitution and the statutes enacted thereunder. During the time covered by this tax the railway company paid to the city as license taxes at the rate of $50 per car the following sums:

October 12, 1893	$1,020 78
November 15, 1893	1,070 16
December 15, 1893	995 83
January 11, 1894	978 54
February 5, 1894	954 17
Total	$5,019 48

After the ordinance levying the tax of 2½ per cent. on the gross earnings was enacted, and under it the railway company paid to the city the following sums of taxes:

May 31, 1894	$27,892 82
January 29, 1895	27,186 89
February 1, 1895	2,233 84
January 29, 1896	32,204 30
January 21, 1897	30,863 06
Total	$120,379 91

The court on final hearing credited the railway company by the sums so paid on the taxes herein sued for, and of this the city complains. It is insisted that the tax of $50 per car was a bonus agreed to be paid the city for the use of its streets and that the railway company is not entitled to credit for the money so paid on its ad valorem taxes sued for. In support of this position we are referred to Louisville City Railway Co. v. City of Louisville, 4 Bush, 478; City of Newport v. South Covington Street Railway Co., 89 Ky., 29, and Fidelity and Casualty Co. v. City of Louisville, 106 Ky., 207.

The tax of $50 a car was part of the scheme of taxation devised under the old charter of the city; that charter expired with the adoption of the new act for the government of cities of the first class. This act contained all the law on the subject and was a substitute for the old charter and all of its provisions. After it took effect, taxes could only be levied under it. They could not be levied in part under it and in part under the old charter. The levies authorized by the new act were the only levies that could be lawfully made or which the taxpayer could be required to pay. The new system of taxation which it devised was substituted in its entirety for the old system of taxation in vogue under the old charter. While, by section 181 of the Constitution, a license or occupation tax may be authorized, and this power is conferred in sections 3011-3012, Kentucky Statutes, governing cities of the first class, no occupation or license tax was imposed by the general council under the power so conferred, and, therefore, in the absence of such action the railway company was not liable for a license tax during the time covered by the taxes sued for. It was not required to pay the $50 per car, for this was part of a scheme of taxation that had passed away, and it was bound to pay its ad valorem taxes on its property and franchises as other property holders. The ordinance allowing it to pay a tax of 2½ per cent. on its gross income in lieu of its ad valorem and other taxes, was void. Still the money paid under the void ordinance having gone into the city treasury, must be credited on the ad valorem taxes which were in fact due. The parties made a mutual mistake. It is apparent they were both in good faith. The money was paid by the railway company as taxes and the court having held that it must pay an ad valorem tax instead of a license tax or a tax on gross earnings, the money so paid must be credited on the taxes which were legally assessed. It is true that the $50 a car license tax was for the use of the streets of the city; but this use of the streets of the city is one of the franchises of the company which is taxed in its ad valorem assessment, and without it the other franchises would be of little value. It is, therefore, true that the same property is taxed under the ad valorem assessment of appellee's property and franchises that was sought to be taxed in the ordinance fixing the license tax of $50 a car, and it must be presumed that the one was intended as a substitute for the other. If it was desired to impose in addition, a license or occupation tax on appellee, this could be done by the action of the council under sections 3011-12, Kentucky Statutes. This was not taken. There can not be an ad valorem tax under the present system and at the same time a license tax under the old system. The tax of $50 a car was levied under an ordinance enacted under the old charter which is no longer in force, and, therefore, money paid under this ordinance after it had ceased to exist, must be treated as paid on the taxes which the defendant in fact owed. We, therefore, conclude that the circuit court properly allowed the credits referred to. The tax bill of 1894, as originally made out, was erroneous and was withdrawn. A new bill was made out on June 8, 1897. But in making out this tax bill, so far as the tax on the franchise went, the value of the franchise was not apportioned between the city and the county, although the line of railway lies partly in the city and partly in the county. The board of assessment and valuation in fact made the apportionment, but in certifying their action to the county clerk, the auditor certified the total amount of the assessment of the franchise as taxable by the city, instead of the amount which had been in fact apportioned to it. In the years 1895 and 1896 a different mistake was made in making out the tax bills. After ascertaining the total valuation of the property of the railway company they deducted from it the county assessment of its tangible property, and not the city assessment of the same property, although it was much higher than the county assessment. Thus the railway company was assessed twice for the same property, or the sum of the assessments against it was greater than the total amount at which its entire property was assessed. In Owensboro Waterworks v. Owensboro, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 2532, we held that the taxpayer was, in such case, entitled to have his franchise tax reduced to the amount which it should have been if the proper deduction had been made. The circuit court followed this decision and reduced the tax bills as there indicated. He also reduced the tax bill for 1894 to the true amount which was in fact apportioned to the city by the board of valuation and asessment; but he allowed no interest on these taxes, except from the date of the judgment. In doing this he departed from the rule laid down in the Owensboro case, for there the taxpayer was made to pay interest, notwithstanding the correction. (25 Ky. Law Rep., 484.) His ruling appears to be based on the line of authorities holding in cases of liens for street improvements, that no interest runs against the taxpayer until a correct apportionment is made. These cases are not in point, for there the taxpayer can not know what he is to pay until the cost of the improvement is apportioned to the property liable therefor. But here the taxpayer could have learned exactly what its taxes were from the records made by the board of valuation and assessment. It impeaches the record in the county clerk's office and shows it was incorrect, placing its taxes too high. But in showing this it shows precisely what its taxes ought to be and this it could have done when its taxes were due and could then have tendered the money to the city and stopped interest. We, therefore, conclude that interest should have been allowed on these taxes for the years 1894-5 6, from the time the second tax receipts (or those sued on) were payable. We see no other error in the judgment, and with this correction it is approved.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for a judgment as herein indicated.

HARVEY, &c. v. BELL, &c.

(Filed June 16, 1904.)

William Payne died testate in 1890. He had but one child, a daughter, who married Dr. W. P. Harvey and died before her father, leaving four children, William P., Sibbie May, Lila Kate and Frank Wayne Harvey, all of them of age at testator's death. William P. died in 1891 unmarried and without issue; Sibbie May married W. C. Bell and died in 1897, leaving surviving her one child, W. C. Bell, Jr.; Lila Kate married J. W. Loving, and died childless in 1899; Frank Wayne Harvey died July, 1902, unmarried and without issue, thus leaving the little boy, W. C. Bell, Jr., as the only representative in blood of the four grandchildren of the testator. The testator after making certain specific devises in trust to three of his grandchildren, Lila Kate, Sibbie May and Frank Wayne Harvey, made the following provisions:

"Seventh. I devise and bequeath three-fourths of all the residue of my estate, whether real, personal or choses in action, in trust to my aforesaid granddaughters and my aforesaid grandson, Frank Wayne Harvey, to be equally divided between them.

"Eighth. (Appointing W. P Harvey, the father of the devises, their trustee, with authority if he deems it best, to free the property from the trust at any time he may see proper.)

"Ninth. Should either of my said grandchildren, Lila Kate Harvey, Sibbie May Harvey or Frank Wayne Harvey die without issue of his or her body living, I devise the property herein devised to the one so dying, to be equally divided between the remaining ones or their issue.

"Eleventh. The other fourth of the residue of my property and estate (three-fourths of which is disposed of in the seventh clause of my will), I devise and bequeath to the children of my grandson, Wm. P. Harvey or their issue. Should my grandson, Wm. P. Harvey, die without child or children or their issue, the estate devised and bequeathed by this clause or section of my will, I devise to be held and disposed of as provided in the ninth clause of this my will."

Frank Wayne Harvey in December, 1898, sold and conveyed to W. E. Mitchell the two storehouses devised to him and an undivided one-third interest in 356 acres of land owned by testator, and afterwards he conveyed the same property to his father, Dr. W. P. Harvey, and also his interest in the real estate vested in his sister, Lila Kate, under said will. Under this will W. C. Bell, Jr., claims to be the sole owner of the property in controversy. W. E. Mitchell claims that Frank Wayne Harvey took the fee in the property conveyed to him and Dr. W. P. Harvey claims that the children took the estate devised to them in fee and that he, as heir at law of those who are dead without issue, is entitled to the interest they held in the property at their death. Held—

First. Where an estate is deivsed to one for life, with remainder to another, and if the remainderman die without children, then to a third person, the rule is, that the words "dying without children, or issue," are restricted to the death of the remainderman before the termination of the particular estate.

Second. Where there is no intervening estate and no other period to which the words "dying without issue," can be reasonably referred, they are held, in the absence of something in the will evincing a contrary intent, to create a defeasible fee, which is defeated by the death of the devisee at any time without issue then living.

Third. It must be presumed that the testator meant something when he devised part of his estate absolutely, and placed the remainder under elaborate limitations. The purpose of clauses eleven and twelve, was to secure the estate to testator's unborn great grandchildren, and illustrates the purpose of the eighth, ninth and tenth clauses which were all part of one plan to prevent his property falling to those who were strangers to his blood, by reason of the death of his grandchildren (then unmarried) without issue. We, therefore, conclude that the limitation as to the death of any of the grandchildren without issue, can not be restricted to a death in the lifetime of the testator.

Fourth. The provision of the will allowing the trustee to hand over all, or a part of the property, to the devisees, and free the same from the trust, does not indicate that the testator had it in his mind to empower the trustee to add anything to the title which the devisee took under the will, or to change in any way the plans which he had devised to secure the estate to his own blood.

Appeal from Mercer Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

This controversy involves the title to 356 acres of land in Mercer county and certain town lots in Harrodsburg, formerly owned by William Payne, who died testate in the year 1890. He had but one child, a daughter, who married Dr. W. P. Harvey, and died many years before her father, leaving four children, William P., Sibbie May, Lila Kate and Frank Wayne Harvey, all of them at his death, of age. William P. Harvey died on May 9, 1891, unmarried and without issue. Sibbie May married W. C. Bell and died on April 2, 1897, leaving surviving her one child, W. C. Bell, Jr. Lila Kate married J. W. Loving and died childless on February 12, 1899. Frank Wayne Harvey, on December 12, 1898, in consideration of $12,500, $7,300 paid cash and $5,200 to be paid in three years, conveyed to W. E. Mitchell two storehouses and lots in Harrodsburg and an undivided one-third interest in the 356 acres of land. On October 17, 1899, in consideration of $1 and other consideration, he conveyed to his father, Dr. W. P. Harvey, the same property; also his interest in the real estate vested in his sister, Lila, under the will of their grandfather. After this he died on July 8, 1902, unmarried and without issue. So that the little boy, W. C. Bell, Jr., is the only living representative in blood of the four grandchildren of the testator. It is insisted for him that he is, under the will of William Payne, the sole owner of the property in contest. It is insisted for Mitchell that Frank Wayne Harvey took in fee under the will, the property devised to him, and that Mitchell's title is, therefore, good. It is insisted for Dr. Harvey that the children took the estate devised to them in fee, and that he, as heir at law of those who are dead without issue, is entitled to the interest they held in the property at their death. The controversy turns on the proper construction of the will, which is as follows:

"Realizing the uncertainty of life, and being of sound mind and disposing memory, I, Wm. Payne, of Harrodsburg, Ky., do make this my last will and testament:

"1st. I direct my executor to sell all my personal property, except as hereinafter directed, collect all debts due me, pay all my just debts, and the residue he is to hold and dispose of as herein devised.

"2d. I hereby specifically devise to my granddaughter, Lila Kate Harvey, in trust as hereinafter named, two store buildings (here follows description).

"3d. I hereby specifically devise to my granddaughter, Sibbie May Harvey, in trust as hereinafter stated, two store buildings and lots (here follows description).

"4th. I hereby specifically devise to my grandson, Frank Wayne Harvey, in trust as hereinafter stated, my two store buildings and lots (here follows description).

"5th. I bequeath absolutely that all my beds, bedding, furniture, books and pictures, tableware be divided equally between my two granddaughters, Lila Kate and Sibbie May Harvey.

"6th. I bequeath absolutely to my grandson, Frank Wayne Harvey, my gold watch and chain and breech loading shotgun.

"7th. I devise and bequeath three-fourths of all the residue of my estate, whether real, personal or choses in action, in trust. to my aforesaid granddaughters and my aforesaid grandson, Frank Wayne Harvey, to be equally divided between them.

"8th. The property or interest in property herein devised or bequeathed to my said grandchildren, Lila Kate, Sibbie May and Frank Wayne Harvey, in trust, to be managed and controlled for their respective benefits by their father, W. P. Harvey, whom I hereby appoint my executor and their trustee, and desire that he shall act in both said capacities without bond or security. Said trust is qualified thus: If said W. P. Harvey deems it wise at any time, he may hand over all or any part of their property to said devisees, or any of them, at any time, and free the same from trust. The evidence that the same is so freed from trust shall be the written deed of said W. P. Harvey, filed and recorded as other deeds, both as to the realty and personalty so freed from trust. I also empower said W. P. Harvey to appoint his successor as trustee, but the freeing said property from trust is a power lodged only in said Harvey as trustee.

"9th. Should either of my said grandchildren, Lila Kate Harvey, Sibbie May Harvie, or Frank Wayne Harvey, die without issue of his or her body living, I devise the property herein devised to the one so dying to be equally divided between the remaining ones or their issue; or if all should so die without issue, then their respective shares I devise to ————.

"10th. Should the contingency arise as provided for in the next preceding (section 9) of this will, the property thus received by my said grandchildren or either of them, is to be in trust under the same powers as expressed in the 8th clause of this will.

"11th. The other fourth of the residue of my property and estate, three-fourths of which is disposed of in the 7th clause of my will, I devise and bequeath to the children of my grandson, Wm. P. Harvey, or their issue. Should my said grandson, Wm. P. Harvey, die without child or children or their issue, the estate devised and bequeathed by this clause or section of my will, I devise to be held and disposed of as provided in the 9th clause of this my will.

"12th. The said property I devise in the said 11th clause or section of this will, I put in the hands of my son-in-law, W. P. Harvey, as trustee to control and manage as he may deem best; and I hereby empower him, at his discretion, to use the income, issues or profits for the comfortable support and maintenance of my said grandson, Wm. Payne Harvey, during his life; but it is to be distinctly understood that I give my said grandson no interest in said income, issues or profits, leaving it wholly discretionary with my said trustee or his successor to use the said income, issues or profits in that way if he deems proper. I specially direct that said income, issues and profits can not be alienated or charged in any way by my said grandson, Wm. Payne Harvey, or any creditor of his; and I hereby specially declare and will that any attempt to alienate said income, issues and profits by said grandson, or any attempt to subject said income, issues or profits by any creditor of said William Payne Harvey, shall terminate the right to use any of said issues, income or profits for the support and maintenance of said Wm. Payne Harvey.

"13th. I hereby provide that if any of my devisees, or my said grandson, Wm. Payne Harvey, contests this will, or tries to cancel the same by any proceeding in court, then the provisions in this will as to such contestee shall be considered annulled, and such contestee shall have only $100 of my estate in lieu of the devise as to such; and in such event the lapsed devise or bequest of such is to go to those of my said grandchildren, Lila Kate, Sibbie May, Frank Wayne Harvey, who do not contest, to be held in the same way as the devise to them so taking. Should my grandson, Wm. Payne Harvey, so contest my will, then and in such event, the discretionary power lodged in my trustee as to said income, issues and profits, is taken away from said trustee, and in such event the said income, issues and profits are to be paid over to the devisees not contesting.

"14th. I hereby empower my said executor and trustee to sell any or all of said real estate specifically or generally devised and reinvest the same either in or out of this State, the reinvested property to be held on the same trusts as the original."

The circuit court adjudged the property to W. C. Bell, Jr. Appellants maintain that the condition as to the death of the devisees without issue is limited to their death in the lifetime of the testator, and rely on section 2342, Kentucky Statutes: "Unless a different purpose appear by express words or necessary inference, every estate in land, created by deed or will without words of inheritance, shall be deemed a fee simple, or such other estate as the grantor or testator had power to dispose of."

At common law words of inheritance were essential to the creation of a fee and great strictness was applied in the enforcement of the rule. (2 Blackstone, 108.) To remedy this it was enacted in this State by section 11 of the act of 1796, as follows: "Every estate in lands which shall hereafter be granted, conveyed or devised to one, although other words heretofore necessary to transfer an estate of inheritance be not added, shall be deemed a fee simple, if a less estate be not limited by express words or do not appear to have been granted, conveyed or devised by construction or operation of law." (1 M. & B., 448.)

In the revision of 1851 the verbiage was changed as follows: "Every estate in land created by deed or will without words of inheritance, shall be deemed a fee simple or such estate as the grantor or testator had power to dispose of, if a less estate be not limited by express words or by necessary inference." (2 Stanton's Revised Statutes, 227.)

In the revision of 1873 this was again changed and put in the present form. (General Statutes, 824.) The rule is that the mere change of words in a revision is not to be regarded as intended to change the existing law, unless the new phraseology purports an intention to work a change in the sense. (Overfield v. Sutton, 1 Metcalfe, 624.) The idea conveyed in all three of the forms above given seems the same, and we are satisfied the legislature had not in mind in changing the form of the provision, making any change in the other rules of law governing the construction of wills.

Appellee also relies on section 2344, Kentucky Statutes: "Unless a different purpose be plainly expressed in the instrument, every limitation in a deed or will contingent upon a person dying without heirs or without children or issue or other words of like import, shall be construed a limitation to take effect when such person shall die, unless the object on which the contingency is made to depend is then living, or if a child of his body, such child be born within ten months next thereafter."

This provision means that unless a different purpose is expressed, every limitation in a deed or will contingent upon a person dying without issue, shall take effect when this person shall die, unless the issue (the object on which the contingency is made to depend) is then living, or, if a child of his body, be born within ten months thereafter. It was first enacted in the revision of 1851. (Stanton's Revised Statutes, 227.) By the act of 1796 estates tail were made estates in fee simple. (1 M. & B., 442.) This provision, with a similar change of form to that above referred to, was brought over into the Revised Statutes (2 Stanton, 227), thence into the General Statutes and our present revision. (General Statutes, 825, Kentucky Statutes, section 2343.)

But under the act of 1796 there was a prolonged controversy whether the words, dying without issue, referred to an indefinite failure of issue and so created an estate tail. To settle this question and prevent such devises being held estates tail and thus being turned into a fee, the legislature enacted the provision above quoted. The statute simply abolishes the common-law rule by which such words were construed to refer to an indefinite failure of issue, and makes the estate to depend only on the failure of issue at the death of the person named. At the time of its enactment it was so construed by this court, and this contemporaneous construction can not now be departed from. (Daniel v. Thompson, 53 Ky., 533; Hart v. Thompson, 43 Ky., 482, and cases cited.)

We, therefore, conclude that the rights of the parties are not affected by either of these provisions, and are to be determined by the general rules governing the construction of wills. In the elaborate argument made by the distinguished counsel, many authorities are relied on as to the proper meaning of words of survivorship, and as there seems to be an apparent conflict in the decisions of this court on the subject, we have examined them with care. We find that while there are in some of the opinions dicta not readily to be reconciled, the decisions themselves are more harmonious, and may be summed up as follows:

1st. Where an estate is devised to one for life, with remainder to another, and if the remainderman die without children or issue, then to a third person, the rule is that the words, dying without children or issue, are restricted to the death of the remainderman before the termination of the particular estate. Thus in Birney v. Richardson, 35 Ky., 424, the testator devised the estate to his wife for life or during her widowhood and at her death or marriage, to be equally divided by his executors between his children, directing that if "any or either of the above-mentioned children should die without a lawful heir begotten of their body, then his or her part of the estate to be equally divided among my surviving children." The children were at the time infants. The widow married about two years after the testator's death. After this a daughter married and subequently died without issue. It was held that her estate became absolute on the marriage of her mother and was not defeated by her subsequent death without issue. In Wren v. Hines, 59 Ky., 129, the testator directed the dividends on his bank stock paid to his widow until the youngest child arrived at age, adding this: "It is my will and desire that when my youngest child shall arrive at the age of twenty-one years, the $12,000 set apart in bank stock, shall be equally divided among all my surviving children or their heirs." One of the daughters married and died without issue during the life of the widow and before the youngest child was twenty-one years of age. It was held that the death, without issue, before her mother and before the youngest child was of age, defeated her interest in the estate. (Pool v. Benning, 48 Ky., 623; Mercantile Bank v. Holland, 83 Ky., 481; Ferguson v. Thompson, 87 Ky., 519; Dickison v. Ogden, 89 Ky., 162; Pruitt v. Holland, 92 Ky., 641; Lewis v. Shropshire, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 33; Baxter v. Isaacs, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1618.)

2d. On the same principle, where property is devised to one or more infants and is to be held by their trustees or guardians until they are twenty-one years old and then to be turned over to them or divided between them, with the proviso that if they die without issue it shall go to the survivors, or if all die to a third person, it has been held that the limitation as to dying without issue is to be limited to a death in infancy before the period of distribution. (Hughes v. Hughes, 51 Ky., 115; Thackston v. Watson, 84 Ky., 206; Trabue v. Terry, 10 Ky. Law Rep., 345; Wilson v. Bryan, 90 Ky., 482; Jones v. Moore, 96 Ky., 273; Kephart v. Hieatt, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 1602.)

3d. And where, by the will the devise is to a class and the period of division is postponed even where the devisees are not infants, it has been held that the limitation as to dying without issue, must be confined to a death without issue before the period of division fixed by the will. (Duncan v. Kennedy, 72 Ky., 580; Webster v. Webster, 93 Ky., 682.)

4th. On the other hand, where there is no intervening estate and no other period to which the words, dying without issue, can be reasonably referred, they are held, in the absence of something in the will evidencing a contrary intent, to create a defeasible fee which is defeated by the death of the devisee at any time without issue then living. Thus in Hart v. Thompson, 42 Ky., 482, the devise was: "My will and desire is that all my estate, both real and personal, be equally divided amongst my said nine children, then living or their lawful heirs if dead, and if either of my nine children should die without heirs of their body, lawfully begotten, that their part, so allotted and given them as aforesaid, be equally divided amongst my other children then living."

One of the devisees died a single man and without issue a few years after his father, leaving a will by which he devised his share of the property. It was held, in an opinion by Judge Ewing, that he took a defeasible fee which was defeated by his death without issue, and that his share passed to the other children then living. The same rule was followed in Deboe v. Lowen, 3 B. Monroe, 616, Judge Marshall writing the opinion, where the devise was to the children of the testator with this qualification: "It is also my will that if any of my children die without lawful heir or heirs, the property hereby willed go to my surviving children." The question was again presented in Daniel v. Thompson, 53 Ky., 533, where the will read: "It is my wish that all the property that may be included in this my last will and testament to my sons, C. R. and J. R. Thompson, in case either or both dying without leaving a lawful heir begotten of their own body, in that case the property so left shall be equally divided among their sisters or their legal representatives."

C. R. Thompson sold and conveyed to Henry Daniel the land devised to him and thereafter died unmarried and without issue. The children of the sisters sued Daniel for the land and recovered. The case was twice argued orally, and in an elaborate opinion by Judge Marshall the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed. In Harris v. Berry, 70 Ky., 113, the testator devised his estate to his fifteen children, providing: "Should any of my children die before they attain lawful age or without lawful issue, the portion of my estate bequeathed to them to be equally divided between the survivors." One of the sons died after the testator without issue and after reaching his majority. It was held that his share went to the other children or their representatives. In Sale v. Crutchfield, 71 Ky., 636, the testator devised to his son, Edmund Lampton eight acres of land in Louisville, providing: "And if said Edmund shall die without lawful issue, it is my will and desire, and I do hereby direct that the estate herein devised to him shall go to his sisters in equal portions, and if either or both of them be then dead, to the child or children of such dead sister, the children taking the share of the dead parent."

Edmund Lampton sold off the land in lots and many years afterwards died childless. After his death the surviving sister and the children of the one who had died, sued his vendees for the property. On an elaborate review of the authorities the judgment in their favor was affirmed. In Crozier v. Cundall, 99 Ky., 202, the testator devised certain property to his daughters, Almyra and Patsey "to them and their heirs forever," with this clause qualifying the devise: "In the event that either of my daughters, Patsy or Almyra, should die without bodily issue, then such portion of my estate as is devised to them shall revert back to and be equally divided between the rest of my children and the children of those who are dead." Almyra sold part of the land devised to her. Both Almyra and Patsy died without issue, leaving wills disposing of their estates. It was held that they took only a defeasible fee and that the property passed under their fathers' will. (Moran v. Billshay, 8 Bush, 484; Best v. Conn., 10 Bush, 36; Parrish v. Vaughn, 12 Bush, 97; Bayless v. Prescott, 79 Ky., 252; Hood v. Dawson, 98 Ky., 285; Dorsey v. Maddox, 103 Ky., 253; Turpin v. Turpin, 4 Ky. Law Rep., 488; Hayden v. Wilson, 4 Ky. Law Rep., 827; Ecton v. Smith, 6 Ky. Law Rep., 216; Varble v. Phillips, 14 Ky. Law Rep., 363; Collins v. Thompson, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 1194; Smith v. Ballard, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 1290.)

In Birney v. Richardson, 5 Dana, 424, which involved only personalty, this was said: "The dying without issue seems to have been intended not as a qualification of the right of each legatee after actual distribution among them, but an explanation merely as to the mode of division." Also this: "Had the bequest been direct and immediate to the testator's children as tenants in common, then the only question as to dying without issue would have been, whether it meant a death in the testator's lifetime, or at any time, however remote. And nothing else appearing to aid in the interpretation, the law would incline to construe 'dying without issue' as meaning the death of the legatee without issue in the testator's lifetime."

In Wren v. Hines, which was also a controversy as to personalty, it was again said: "Where a devise is made to several persons as a class with words of survivorship annexed, it becomes material to determine, in order that a proper construction may be given to the devise, to what period the words of survivorship are intended to refer. If the gift is to take effect in possession immediately after the death of the testator, the uniform rule of construction is, to refer the words of survivorship to that event and to regard them as intended to provide against the contingency of the death of the object of the testator's bounty in his lifetime. In such a devise, when made to several persons by name, there is no other period to which the words could be made to refer."

But in these cases the question was not before the court because the devises were not direct. In the case of direct bequests of personalty which the court evidently had in mind, the rule stated obtains; for it perishes with the using and the testator is not presumed to look beyond the distribution he desires his executor to make. But in devises of real estate, as shown in the cases cited, the rule is different; and in these, words of survivorship will not be referred to death without issue in the lifetime of the testator, unless there is something in the will showing this was his meaning. It is alleged here in the petition, to which the court sustained a demurrer, that the testator left an estate of about $60,000, $10,000 in personalty and $50,000 in land. The allegations of the petition must be taken as true on demurrer, and we have, therefore, a case where both realty and personalty are involved, and where both are, by the will, placed in the hands of the trustee, the personalty standing as the realty and not being directed to be distriubted by the executor to the devisees.

Appellants rely on Wills v. Wills, 85 Ky., 486; Carpenter v. Hazelrigg, 103 Ky., 534, and Jackman v. Jackman, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 2245. In the Wills case it was held that the devisee did not take a defeasible fee, but either a life estate or a fee simple; and then from a comparison of all the provisions of the will, the conclusion was reached that the testator intended to pass to the devisees, who were his children, the property in fee. In Carpenter v. Hazelrigg and Jackman v. Jackman the property was devised to a class and directed to be divided between them. The devisees survived the period of division and these cases may be rested on the ground that the dying without issue was intended merely as a guide to the mode of division. The dicta above referred to were alluded to in the Wills and Carpenter cases, although they involved real estate; but these cases plainly were not intended to announce a new rule, or to depart from the principles theretofore laid down, and they are not to be understood as conflicting with the previous decisions of the court. All the cases recognize the rule that where there is any period to which words of survivorship can be reasonably inferred, they will be so construed. All the cases also recognize the rule that in the end all rules of construction are but means of ascertaining the testator's intention, and that when this is apparent from the whole will it must be enforced. No procustean rule can, therefore, be laid down as to the construction of words of survivorship. For while the words in one clause may have a well defined legal meaning, there may be other things in the will making it manifest that the testator actually used the words in a different sense, and when this is the case the rights of the parties must be determined by the meaning of the will taken as a whole. It is rare that two wills are exactly alike, and so after all rules of construction are often difficult of application. From this arises much of the apparent confusion in the decisions.

Under these principles, how stands the case before us? Did the testator contemplate the death of the devisees without issue in his lifetime, or intended the words of survivorship only to apply in this event?

In the 5th and 6th clauses of his will the testator uses the words "I bequeath absolutely." In all the other clauses words of different effect are used; thus showing that he had in mind the difference between an absolute devise and a limited estate; for in all other clauses the devises are not absolute, but limited. No part of the will took effect until the testator's death, and it must be presumed the testator meant something when he devised part of his estate absolutely, and placed the remainder of it under elaborate limitations. Section 4839, Kentucky Statutes, provides: "A will shall be construed with reference to the real and personal estate comprised in it, to speak and take effect as if it had been executed immediately before the death of the testator, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will."

By the 11th clause of the will the testator devises one-fourth of the residue of his estate to the children of Wm. P. Harvey or their issue, subject to a provision for his support, and should he "die without child or children or their issue," this part of the estate is to go as provided in the ninth clause. Wm. P. Harvey then had no children, and so far as appears, was unmarried. It was possible he might marry, have children, and yet survive all his children or grandchildren. Yet it is incredible that the testator, his grandfather, in making the will, could have contemplated all this occurring in the testator's lifetime. The property devised in the 11th clause is, by the 12th clause, charged with the support of Wm. Payne Harvey, which must of necessity refer to a support after the death of the testator. By the 13th clause if any of the devisees contested the will their part of the estate should go to the others not contesting "to be held in the same way as the devise to them so taking." There could be no contest of the will until the testator's death, and in this event the contesting devisee lost his devise, yet it did not then pass to the others absolutely, but "to be held in the same way as the devise to them," thus showing that the testator had in mind in "the devise to them" conditions which were to extend beyond his death. This is emphasized by the last of the 13th clause requiring the trustee, if Wm. Payne Harvey contested the will, to pay over to the other devisees the income from the fourth of the estate devised in the 11th and 12th clauses, the distinction being here sharply made between the income and the corpus of the estate in a contingency which must occur, if at all, after the lifetime of the testator.

By the 10th clause it is stipulated that if the contingency provided for in the 9th clause arises, that is, if any of the devisees die without issue and this share go to the others, then "the property thus received" is to be in trust under the same powers as expressed in the 8th clause. The devisees could receive nothing under the will during the lifetime of the testator, and if he had had in mind only a death in his lifetime, he would simply have directed a division of the estate among the survivors; for in this event they would have taken directly, but the use of the words "the property thus received," shows the testator contemplated the devisees might receive property under the 9th clause after the division directed in the 7th clause was made. The devisees were all of age and if the testator had not in view preserving the estate for his own blood as against the collateral heirs of the devisees, all then unmarried, the whole fabric thus constructed by the will was meaningless. The purpose of clauses 11 and 12 was to secure this part of the estate to the testator's unborn great-grandchildren, the children of Wm. Payne Harvey. The devise to these possible great-grandchildren illustrates the purpose of the 8th, 9th and 10th clauses which were all part of one plan. The testator aimed to prevent his property falling to those who were strangers to his blood, by reason of the death of any of his grandchildren (then unmarried) without issue. With this view he directed in the 10th clause that the property falling to the survivors by reason of the death of any of the devisees without issue as provided in the 9th clause, should be held under the same trusts as the property originally falling to them. He seems to have entertained the design of providing to whom the property should go if all his blood became extinct, but the blank left for this purpose at the end of the 9th clause, for some reason was never filled; yet this evidences his purpose that the property should not go to others as long as any of his blood remained. We, therefore, conclude that the limitation as to the death of any of the grandchildren without issue, can not be restricted to a death in the lifetime of the testator.

It remains to determine whether there is any other period to which it may be reasonably referred. The 8th clause creating the trust, as shown, contains these words: "If said W. P. Harvey deems it wise at any time, he may hand over all or any part of their property to said devises, or any of them, at any time, and free the same from trust. The evidence that the same is so freed from trust shall be the written deed of said W. P. Harvey, filed and recorded as other deeds, both as to the realty and the personalty so freed from trust. I also empower said W. P. Harvey to appoint his successor as trustee, but the freeing said property from trust is a power lodged only in said Harvey as trustee."

By a deed executed on March 11, 1898, Dr. Harvey, as trustee, conveyed to Mrs. Loving, in fee simple and free of the trust, both the realty and personalty devised to her in the will; and on March 16, 1898, he executed a similar deed to Frank Wayne Harvey. The deeds set out the provisions of the will and in each the granting clause is as follows: "Now in consideration of the above the party of the first part sells, aliens and conveys, and likewise frees and relieves from every character of trust, both as to the realty and personalty, and invests the party of the second part with a fee-simple title to the following estate (here follows description of land in controversy)."

The question is raised that at least the dying without issue as provided in the will, must be limited to the continuance of the trust and that these deeds invested the grantees with the absolute fee; that this was the intent of the deeds is evident, but when Mrs. Loving died she left a will devising her part of the estate to her husband; there was a contest over her will and in the settlement of this contest it was agreed, on March 17, 1899, that the personalty should go to her husband, the contract being based on the following recitals:

"Whereas, Mrs. Lilah Harvey Loving, late wife of the undersigned J. W. Loving, departed this life February 14, 1899, residing at Campbellsville, Taylor county, Ky., leaving a last will, which is not yet probated, in which the undersigned, J. W. Loving, is the principal devisee, she dying without issue, and appointing said Loving her executor without bond; and, whereas, under the will of her grandfather, William Payne, none of the real estate mentioned in said will passed to her only for and during her life, but only personalty owned by her at her death; and, whereas, the said Loving and the undersigned, W. P. Harvey, the father of the said deceased, Frank W. Harvey, and W. Conn Bell, Jr., represented by his father, W. C. Bell, are the only persons interested in the distribution of her estate," etc.

The trustee had only such power as the will conferred on him and his deeds are inoperative in so far as they are not authorized by the will. The construction placed by the parties on the will is not conclusive; for the proper construction of the instrument is a question of law for the court. We must, therefore, determine whether the testator contemplated that the termination of the trust under the 8th clause should defeat the limitation under the 9th clause as to the real estate. The case of James v. Moore, 96 Ky., 274, is relied on by appellants on this point. But that case is simply in line with the first and second clauses of cases above cited. Part of the estate went to the widow for life and at her death to her son, if living, and if not to certain collaterals; the remainder of the estate was placed in the hands of the guardian of the son to be held for his benefit, with the provision that if he died without issue the estate should go to certain collaterals. The son was at the time an infant a few months old. As to the estate which went to the widow for life it was held that the son, if living at her death, took it then absolutely; and as to the part of the estate placed in the hands of the guardian for the son, it was held that his title became absolute when he became of age and the estate was distributed to him. The purpose of the testator in the case before us in providing that the trustee might hand over all, or any part of the property to the devisees and free the same from trust does not seem to have been to change in any way the estate which, by the will he vested in the devisees. He seems to have contemplated that as the grandchildren married and settled in life, it would be proper for the trustee if he saw fit to turn over to them the property devised. As to the personalty, if it was turned over by the trustee to the devisees and was consumed by them, no one could complain. But in simply authorizing the trustee to free the property of the trust, the testator does not seem to have had in mind empowering him to add anything to the title which the devisees took in the real estate under the will, or to change in any way the scheme which he had devised to secure the estate to his own blood. The trustee was the father of the devisees. The testator had in mind that the father would consult the true interests of his children, and would hand over their estate to them as their real interest might require. But the father was also the heir-at-law of his children if they died without issue, and the testator evidently contemplating this, undertook, by his will, to prevent the property devised passing under the statute of descent in case any of the devisees died without issue, and in authorizing the father to free the property of the trust which he created to carry out his purpose of preserving the estate, it can not be presumed that he contemplated empowering the trustee to set at naught the settled purpose which he manifested to secure his estate to his possible great grandchildren.

We, therefore, conclude that the circuit court properly held that W. C. Bell, Jr., took, under the will, the entire title to the real estate referred to.

Judgment affirmed.

HOUGHTON v. LOUISVILLE RAILWAY CO.

(Filed June 16, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Street railroad—Negligence of conductor—Starting car as passenger was alighting—Instructions—In an action by a passenger against the Louisville Railway Co. for an injury caused by the alleged negligence of defendant's servants in starting the car while plaintiff was alighting therefrom, the evidence being conflicting as to which side of Fourteenth street on Main street, that the car stopped, the court instructed the jury as follows: "If the jury believe from the evidence that at or about the time and place complained of, the car of the defendant railway company on which plaintiff was riding, stopped for the purpose of allowing plaintiff or other passengers to alight therefrom, and that while plaintiff was in the act of alighting from said car, the same was started by defendant's agent in control of said car, and thereby plaintiff was thrown to the street and injured, they shall find for the plaintiff; but if the jury shall believe from the evidence that the said car did not stop for the purpose of allowing plaintiff or other passengers to alight therefrom, and that while said car was in motion plaintiff attempted to alight therefrom and was thereby thrown to the street and injured, they shall find for the defendant." It is clear that the jury could not have returned a verdict for the plaintiff unless they believed the car was stopped for the purpose of allowing the plaintiff or other passengers to alight from the car. Held—That plaintiff's right to recover does not depend upon the question as to whether the car was stopped on the east or west side of Fourteenth street. If it was stopped on either side to allow passengers to leave it, and was suddenly started forward while plaintiff was in the act of alighting, and she was thereby thrown to the ground and injured, she is entitled to recover. Although it was the custom to stop the car on the east side to allow passengers to leave it, yet if it came to a full stop on the west side, and plaintiff believed it had stopped to allow passengers to alight, she can recover if those in charge of the car suddenly started it forward, and injured her, when known, or by the exercise of proper care could have known, she was alighting therefrom, and the jury should have been instructed as indicated herein.

Matt O'Doherty for appellant.

Fairleigh, Straus & Fairleigh and R. L. Greene for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, Third Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The appellant instituted this action against the appellee for a special injury alleged to have been inflicted by the servants of the appellee who were in charge of its street car. It is averred in the petition that the plaintiff was a passenger on one of its cars which was going eastwardly on Main street, in the city of Louisville; that before it reached Fourteenth street she notified the conductor in charge of the car that she wished to get off at the railroad depot on the north side of Main street, near Fourteenth street; that when the car reached the depot it was stopped; that she thereupon arose from her seat and started to alight from the car, and while doing so the defendant's agents and servants in charge of the car, by gross negligence caused the car to move suddenly forward, and that she was thereby thrown from it to the street, and received the injuries of which she complains.

The plaintiff introduced herself and sister as witnesses, and they testified that they took a car at Sixth and Walnut streets which carried them to Eighteenth street, there they transferred to an Eighteenth street car; that after they got on the last named car, they apprised the conductor that they wanted to get off at Fourteenth street to catch the "dinkey" train; that the conductor advised them that he would get there in time to do so, and said that "the car would not be apt to stop until it reached Fourteenth street." They further testified that when the car was crossing Fourteenth street they felt the car slacking speed, and they picked up their bundles and when the car came to a standstill they started to the platform, and as the plaintiff was alighting from the car, it started suddenly, and threw her to the street, inflicting very serious injuries upon her, from which she had not recovered when this case was tried. The defendant introduced as witnesses three ladies who were passengers on the car in question, and who testified that the car did not stop from the time it crossed Fifteenth street until it was crossing Fourteenth street, and not until after plaintiff stepped off of the car while in motion and received the injuries. The testimony of the plaintiff and sister tended to show that the car stopped on the east side of Fourteenth street. The testimony of the three lady passengers tended to show that it did not stop on the west side of Fourteenth street, or at all, until it stopped to pick up the plaintiff after she had fallen. Appellee then introduced William H. Brightman and R. L. Rice, respectively, motorman and conductor of the car from which the plaintiff fell. They testified that they stopped on the west side of Fourteenth street on account of the railroad track on that street. So we have a conflict in the evidence both between that of the plaintiff and that of the defendant and also a conflict in the testimony offered by the defendant.

We have gone into detail as to the evidence with a view of considering the question as to whether the court properly instructed the jury. The court gave the jury instructions as follows: "If the jury believe from the evidence that at or about the time and place complained of the car of the defendant railway company on which plaintiff was riding, stopped for the purpose of allowing plaintiff or other passengers to alight therefrom, and that while plaintiff was in the act of alighting from said car, the same was started by the defendant's agent in control of said car, and thereby plaintiff was thrown to the street and injured, they shall find for the plaintiff; but, if the jury shall believe from the evidence that the said car did not stop for the purpose of allowing plaintiff or other passengers to alight therefrom, and that while said car was in motion plaintiff attempted to alight therefrom and was thereby thrown to the street and injured, they shall find for the defendant. If the jury find for the plaintiff, they will award her such sum in damages as will fairly and reasonably compensate her for mental and physical suffering endured and to be endured by her, if any, as the direct result of her injury, and for the roduction, if any, in her power to earn money, resulting directly from said injury, in all not to exceed the sum of $20,000, the amount claimed in the petition. If they find for the defendant, they will say so, and no more."

It is clear that the jury could not have returned a verdict for the plaintiff, unless it believed the car was stopped for the purpose of allowing the plaintiff or other passengers to alight from the car, and while the plaintiff was in the act of alighting therefrom the car was started and she was thereby thrown on the street and injured. Under this instruction, although the car was stopped on the west side of Fourteenth street, and the plaintiff believed that it was stopped to allow her and other passengers to alight therefrom, and while attempting to do so it started, still there could be no recovery although the conductor may have been guilty of the grossest kind of negligence in failing to look after the safety of the plaintiff, or in failing to use any care to guard the passengers against such an accident. Plaintiff's right to recover does not depend upon the question as to whether the car was stopped on the east or west side of Fourteenth street. If it was stopped on either side to allow passengers to leave it, and was suddenly started forward while she was in the act of alighting, and that she was thereby thrown to the ground and injured, she is entitled to recover. Although it was the custom to stop the car on the east side of Fourteenth street to allow passengers to leave it, yet if it came to a full stop on the west side of the street and the plaintiff believed that it had stopped to allow passengers to alight from it, she can recover, if those in charge of the car suddenly started it forward and injured her, when they knew, or by the exercise of proper care could have known, she was alighting therefrom. The conductor testified that after the car stopped he left the rear platform and went forward to change the register. The plaintiff and her sister testified that he had left the rear end of the car and was talking to the motorman when the car stopped, and was at the front end of the car when she attempted to alight from it. The conductor said it was not proper to leave the rear end of the car when it was stopped. The motorman testified that he had a signal to stop, and did so; that he did not start the car until he receive the signal to go ahead. From the evidence the conductor must have been at the front end of the car when he gave the signal to start. It is evident that the plaintiff was in the act of alighting from the car when it started, because she and her sister so testified, and the evidence of the defendant shows that she was found about ten feet to the rear of the car, and the motorman testified that the car had gone about ten feet when it was stopped.

In addition to the questions submitted by the court to the jury by instruction No. 1, the court should have told it that although it may believe from the evidence the car was not stopped on the west side of Fourteenth street for the purpose of allowing passengers to leave it, still if it did stop there, and that the plaintiff while it so stood upon the track went upon the platform, and attempted to leave the car, and that the defendant's servants or either of them in charge of the car started it forward when they, or either of them knew, or by the exercise of proper care could have known, that the plaintiff was attempting to alight therefrom, and that she was thereby caused to fall to the ground, and receive the alleged injuries, the jury should find for her.

Instructions Nos. 1 and 4 offered by the plaintiff should have been given. They define the kind of care which the defendant owed to the plaintiff as a passenger, and the kind of care she should exercise for her own safety. (Louisville City Railway Co. v. Weams, 80 Ky., 420; Davis v. Paducah Railway and Light Co., 24 Ky. Law Rep., 137.)

The judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Whole court sitting.

Chief Justice Burnam and Judge Hobson dissent in part.

Judge Hobson delivered the following dissenting opinion:

I concur in the reversal in this case, but I do not concur in so much of the opinion as allows a recovery if the conductor, by ordinary care, might have known that the plaintiff was leaving the car, without any qualification as to the circumstances under which he should exercise care for this purpose. The rule is, as I understand it, that where the circumstances are such when a stop is made that the conductor in the exercise of proper care should anticipate persons alighting from the car, he should not start it without exercising proper care to see that they are safe. But I do not understand that where there has been no signal given by a passenger for the car to stop and the conductor has no reason to anticipate that any one will leave the car, he should be on the outlook for passngers getting off when the car stops, because there is a wagon in front, or for any other temporary reason. In Belt Electric Line v. Tomlin, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 433, which was a case like this, the following instruction was approved: "If the jury believe from the evidence that the car did stop opposite the side door of the Clarendon Hotel, but that such stop was not for the purpose of letting off passengers, and was not at such place or under such conditions that the plaintiff had a reasonable right to suppose that an opportunity would be afforded to alight; and that, while the car was so stopped, the plaintiff attempted to alight, without the knowledge of or notice to the employes in charge of the car, and that the car was started while he was in the act of getting off, without the knowledge of or notice to such employes that he was so doing; and that their failure to become aware of his getting off was not due to a failure on their part to exercise ordinary care, then the defendant is not liable, and the jury should find for it."

The same principle was again followed in Louisville Railway Co. v. Rannaker, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 250, where this instruction was approved: "But if the driver saw her when she was about to leave the car and knew, or ought to have known as a prudent man, that such was her purpose, then it was not necessary for her to give him further notice."

In 3 Thompson on Negligence, section 3526, the rule is thus stated: "And although the car may come to a stop, yet if it is not at a place at which passengers are accustomed to alight, but if the stoppage is made under a regulation of the company before crossing another track to avoid the danger of collision, it is not an invitation for a passenger to alight, and if a passenger so alighting is hurt by reason of the car starting forward, the company will not be liable in the absence of statutes imputing special fault to those in charge of the car."

It seems to be evident in this case that the stop was made on the west side of Fourteenth street before crossing the railroad track to avoid danger of collision, and that plaintiff attempted to get off the car when stopped for this purpose alone. Her sister got up with her and the conductor knew they wanted to get off at Fourteenth street. Whether, as a prudent person, he should have anticipated their leaving the car when this stop was made was a question for the jury, but he should not be required to keep a lookout for passengers leaving the car, unless, as a reasonable person, he should have anticipated that they would understand the stop was made for them to alight, or should have anticipated under the circumstances attending the stop, that passengers would get off.

I, therefore, dissent from the opinion.

Chief Justice Burnam and Judge O'Rear join in this dissent.

EVENING POST CO. v. SMITH.

(Filed June 16, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Helm, Bruce & Helm for appellant.

Wm. Cromwell, J. H. Hazelrigg and Molloy & Utley for appellee.

Appeal from Lyon Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

This case is affirmed by an equal division of the court: Judges Paynter, Hobson and Nunn for affirmance; and Chief Justice Burnam and Judges O'Rear and Barker for reversal. Judge Settle, being of kin to appellee, did not sit in the case.

COMMONWEALTH, BY, &c. v. UNION REFRIGERATOR TRANSIT CO.

(Filed June 16, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Henry L. Stone and Samuel B. Kirby for appellant.

Humphrey, Burnett & Humphrey and Forcht & Field for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division.

Judge Barker delivered the following response to petition for rehearing.

As the record shows, without contradiction, that appellee owned two thousand cars of the value of $200 each on the assessment day of each year in which they are sought to be taxed by this proceeding, the opinion is extended so as to require the lower court, upon the return of the case, to enter a judgment against appellee for the amount due upon the above-named property for taxes for the respective years, at the legal rate of taxation for each year, with legal penalties.

The petition for rehearing is overruled.

CONNOR v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed June 16, 1904.)

1. Homicide—Conflicting evidence—Sufficient to convict or acquit—Jury—Judges of facts—The defendant was indicted for murder and convicted by the jury of voluntary manslaughter and his punishment fixed at ten years in the penitentiary. The evidence was such as would authorize the jury to either convict or acquit the defendant, and in such cases it has often been held by this court that it will not reverse on the facts where there is sufficient evidence to go to the jury.

2. Instructions—Errors are complained of in the instructions as follows: Instruction No. 2 as given, required the jury, apparently, to find from the evidence to the exclusion of a reasonable doubt, that the shooting was not done maliciously or with malice aforethought, in order to reduce the crime from murder to manslaughter. This error was not material as the jury found the defendant guilty of manslaughter, but would have been material if the jury had found him guilty of murder.

3. "Safe means of avoiding danger"—Complaint is made of these words in third instruction. "And he believed he had no safe means of avoiding said attack." This court has in several cases condemned the use of the word "escape" in self-defense instructions, but the word "avoid" has been several times sanctioned.

4. Retreat—Question for jury—The defendant asked that the following words be inserted in instruction No. 4 after the words safe means of avoiding said danger, viz.: "Then the defendant was not obliged to retreat but had the right to stand and repel the assault." The court properly refused to modify the instruction. The right of self-defense is but the right of necessity. The rule now is that whether one should stand his ground or give back is a question for the jury, and that he may properly follow that course which is apparently necessary to save himself from death or great bodily harm.

5. Fair trial—On the whole case we conclude that appellant has had a fair trial and no legal reason appears for disturbing the verdict of the jury.

Sweeney, Ellis & Sweeney and C. M. Finn for appellant.

N. B. Hays and Loraine Mix for appellee.

Appeal from Daviess Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

On December 25, 1902, W. M. Parsons insulted Ben Cutler in a saloon in Owensboro. Cutler struck Parsons, and thereupon a fight ensued between Parsons and Ben Cutler and his brother, Fred. Parsons was forced to the back part of the room and was pretty badly beaten up, when the bartender and a man named Davidson intervened and took from Ben Cutler a chair with which he was about to strike Parsons, throwing him back toward the center of the room. Appellant, Connor, who had taken no part in the fight, was standing near the bar counter. As to what followed the proof is somewhat conflicting. The proof for Connor is to the effect that Ben Cutler, with a knife in his hand, advanced on him threatening to kill him and that he retreated behind the counter and got a pistol there and shot Ben Cutler with it after twice calling upon him to stop, just as he was about to come around behind the counter.

The proof for the Commonwealth tends to show that Connor had the pistol in his hand and was out in front of the counter before Ben Cutler was thrown around, and that he first aimed at Fred Cutler, and when he dodged down, shot Ben. Ben Cutler died almost immediately. The numerical weight of the evidence sustained the defendant's version of the affair, but the jury found him guilty of manslaughter and fixed his punishment at ten years in the penitentiary. Parsons and the Cutlers were all drunk; Connor was sober, was about thirty years of age, and so far as appears was on good terms with all of the parties. While the evidence would have sustained a verdict for the defendant, the jury saw and heard the witnesses. There was sufficient evidence to go to the jury, and it has often been held that this court will not reverse in criminal cases, on the facts. We need not, therefore, discuss the evidence but only state so much of it as is material in determining the objections urged to the instructions of the court to the jury. In instruction 1 the court defined the crime of murder. Then he gave instruction 2 in these words: "The court further instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence to the exclusion of a reasonable doubt, that in the county of Daviess, and before the finding of the indictment herein, the defendant did unlawfully, willfully and feloniously kill and slay one Ben Cutler by shooting him to death with a pistol loaded with powder and ball, or other hard substance, of which shooting and wounding said Ben Cutler did die within a year and a day thereafter, but they further believe from the evidence to the exclusion of a reasonable doubt, that said shooting was not done maliciously and with malice aforethought, but do believe beyond a reasonable doubt that same was not done in his necessary self-defense, or what appeared to him at the time to be his necessary self-defense, but was done in a sudden heat and passion, or sudden affray, and under such provocation as was reasonably calculated to excite an ungovernable passion, then they should acquit him of the charge in the indictment, and find him guilty of voluntary manslaughter, and fix his punishment at confinement in the penitentiary for a period of not less than two years, nor more than twenty-one years, in the discretion of the jury."

The court apparently meant to tell the jury that if they believed from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant shot and killed Ben Cutler, and had a reasonable doubt as to whether the shooting was done with malice aforethought, but believed from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the shooting was done in a sudden heat and passion or sudden affray, and not in his necessary or apparently necessary self defense, they should find him guilty of voluntary manslaughter. The instruction as given required the jury, apparently, to find from the evidence to the exclusion of a reasonable doubt, that the shooting was not done maliciously or with malice aforethought in order to reduce the crime from murder to manslaughter, and if the jury had found the defendant guilty of murder the error would be material. But the jury only found him guilty of manslaughter. All the instructions given by the court must be read together. Instructions 5 and 6 are as follows:

"5. The court further instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence to the exclusion of a reasonable doubt, that the defendant is proven guilty, but entertain a reasonable doubt as to whether he is proven guilty as to the offense defined in the first instruction, or the one in the second instruction, they should find him guilty of the less offense, and should fix his punishment for the less offense.

"6. The court further instructs the jury that the defendant is presumed innocent until proven guilty to the exclusion of a reasonable doubt, and this presumption attends him at every stage of the trial, and if the jury entertain a reasonable doubt as to whether the defendant is proven guilty, they should acquit him."

It will thus be seen that the court told the jury that the defendant is presumed innocent until proven guilty to the exclusion of a reasonable doubt; that this presumption attends him at every stage of the trial, and that if they had a reasonable doubt as to whether he was proven guilty of murder or voluntary manslaughter, they should find him guilty of the less offense.

There was no question under the evidence that the defendant shot and killed the deceased, in a sudden affray. The only real question in the case was, whether the shooting was done in self-defense. The verbiage of instruction 2 could not have misled the jury on this question. As to self-defense, the court gave these two instructions:

"3. The court further instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence to the exclusion of a reasonable doubt, that the defendant killed one Ben Cutler by shooting him to death with a pistol loaded with powder and ball, or other hard substance, but they further believe from the evidence that at the time of said shooting and killing the defendant was engaged in a sudden affray with said Cutler, and was being attacked by said Cutler, and the defendant believed he was then in danger of suffering great bodily harm, or death, at the hands of said Cutler, and he believed he had no safe means of avoiding said attack, or to him apparently safe means of avoiding same, and the defendant shot said Cutler in his necessary self-defense, or what appeared to him under the circumstances to be his necessary self-defense, considering all the circumstances and surroundings at the time of said shooting, they should find him not guilty, on the ground that said killing was done in self-defense.

"4. If the jury believe from the evidence that at the time defendant shot and killed deceased he was being assaulted or menaced by the deceased, and he (defendant) believed, and had reasonable grounds to believe from the character of the deceased, his previous threats, if any proven, and from the circumstances of the meeting, and the nature of the assault or menace that he (defendant) was then and there in danger of loss of life or suffering great bodily harm, and he believed, and had reasonable grounds to believe, that he had no safe, or to him apparently safe, means of avoiding said danger, then the defendant had the right to use such force as was necessary, or to him apparently necessary, to repel such assault, and protect himself from such danger; and if he shot deceased under such circumstances, the jury should acquit defendant on the grounds of self-defense."

Complaint is made of these words in instruction 3: "And he believed he had no safe means of avoiding said attack, or to him apparently safe means of avoiding same."

This court has, in several cases, condemned the use of the word "escape" in self-defense instructions; but the word "avoid" has been several times sanctioned. (Hughes v. Commonwealth, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 501; Arnold v.

Commonwealth, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1566; Barnes v. Commonwealth, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 1802.)

The objection to instruction 4 is that the defendant asked that the following words be inserted in it after the words "safe means of avoiding said danger:" "Then the defendant was not obliged to retreat, but he had the right to stand and repel such assault." The court properly refused to so modify the instruction. The right of self-defense is but the right of necessity. A man may not slay another in defense of himself unless necessary to secure his own safety. It is true that when attacked by another feloniously, he is not obliged to retreat, for this often would be but to increase his peril; still the apparent necessity is the measure of his right to slay the assailant. Where a man is attacked in his home, and in a few other like cases, the instruction referred to has been given, but there was nothing in this case requiring any other rule than that laid down in the instruction that the defendant had the right to use such force as was necessary, or apparently necessary, to protect himself. This left the jury to determine from all the evidence whether it was necessary for the defendant to shoot the deceased when he did, or whether he had other apparently safe means of securing his safety. They were thus left to determine whether he should have stood his ground, or given back before shooting. It used to be laid down as the rule that before killing his assailant the assailed, to be justified on the ground of self-defense, must retreat to the wall, and only slay him as a last resort, when he could retreat no further. But the rule now is that whether he should stand his ground or give back is a question for the jury, and that he may properly follow that course which is apparently necessary to save himself from death or great bodily harm. The case of Oder v. Commonwealth, 80 Ky., 33, was overruled in Reynolds v. Commonwealth, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1743. The verdict of the jury shows that they did not credit the defendant's version of the transaction, but came to the conclusion, as no reason was shown for an attack by Ben Cutler on appellant, that the latter in the remark he made as he was thrown around by Patterson had in mind some one in the difficulty with him, and that it was unnecessary for appellant to shoot him as he did. Had they believed appellant's version of the shooting they would have acquitted him as readily under the instruction given by the court as under that asked by him. On the whole record, therefore, we conclude that appellant had a fair trial on the merits of his case, and no legal reason appears for disturbing the verdict of the jury.

Judgment affirmed.

FIDELITY TRUST CO., &c. v. LOUISVILLE GAS CO.

BOONE v. SAME.

(Filed June 18, 1904.)

1. Corporations—Right to incur indebtedness—The Louisville Gas Co. owns $1,600,000 of the bonds of the Louisville Lighting Co., on which there is an indebtedness of about $800,000 to certain corporations who have agreed to take in payment thereof the lighting company's bonds at $102 due October 1, 1918, if guaranteed by the Louisville Gas Co., as follows: "For value received the Louisville Gas Co. hereby guarantees the payment of all coupons on this bond maturing on or prior to October 1, 1918, as and when the same may mature. It further agrees to purchase this bond at par on October 1, 1918, if so requested by the holders not less than sixty days prior thereto." Held—That there being nothing in the charter of the Louisville Gas Co. to prohibit such guarantee or the incurring, of such liability, it may legitimately make such guarantee.

2. Charter of gas company—Limitation on power to incur indebtedness—The provision of the charter of the Louisville Gas Co., that it may issue bonds for $500,000, and execute a mortgage on its property to secure them, to be used in improving its plant, is not a limitation on its power to contract any other kind of indebtedness in the execution of the purposes of its organization.

3. Right to borrow money—All corporations, other than those organized for governmental purposes, have the right to contract debts or borrow money for the purpose of accomplishing the purposes of their organization; and this power exists although not expressly granted by their charters, as fully as is possessed by individuals. This power is only limited by the provisions of their charter or by statute.

DuRelle & McHenry for appellants.

Strother & Hardin for appellant Boone.

Humphrey, Burnett & Humphrey for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, Second Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The matter in controversy is as to the right of the Louisville Gas Co. to guarantee certain bonds of the Louisville Lighting Co., which the first-named company owns. The Louisville Gas Co. was chartered by an act of the legislature, approved March 16, 1888. There are two acts amendatory of its charter, one approved April 26, 1890, and the other May 3, 1890. By the charter the gas company's capital stock may be $4,000,000 and all of it has been sold, except $400,000, so it will be seen that its capital stock is $3,600,000. Previous to the enactment of the amendments to its charter it was supplying the city of Louisville and the citizens thereof with gas. The city of Louisville owns about one-fourth of the capital stock of the gas company. There being a demand that the city be lighted with electricity, the city and the gas company joined in a request to the legislature to pass the amendatory act. By section 1 of the act approved May 3, 1890, it is provided that "the general council of the city of Louisville and the board of directors of the Louisville Gas Co. having assented thereto, that the act entitled 'An act to incorporate the now existing Louisville Gas Co. and grant it a new charter,' be, and it is hereby, amended as follows: The said company shall have all the power and authority necessary for the manufacture, distribution and sale of electricity for illumination; and to that end may purchase, hold and sell all real and personal property, including stock in other companies, necessary or convenient to the conduct of such business."

By virtue of this provision of the charter the plaintiff bought the stock of a corporation called the Louisville Electric Light Co. It expended in the purchase of land and the erection of an electric light plant more than $1,200,000.

Afterwards the electric light company, by lawful authority, consolidated with the Citizens Electric Light Co. and the name of the company formed by the consolidation of the two companies is the Louisville Lighting Co. As a result of, and as a consideration for, the consolidation the gas company received $1,600,000 of the bonds of the Louisville Lighting Co., and they are secured by a mortgage. The right of the gas company to acquire and own the $1,600.000 of bonds is not questioned.

In the erection of the electric light plant and otherwise, the gas company contracted a debt of about $800,000, and about $770,000 of which is due the Fidelity Trust Co., National Bank of Kentucky, German Bank and German Insurance Bank. The gas company desired to discharge its indebtedness and the institutions named agreed with the gas company to take the lighting company's bonds at $1.02, sufficient to discharge their debts. The gas company agreed to make a guarantee on the bonds as follows: "For value received the Louisville Gas Co. hereby guarantees the payment of all coupons on this bond maturing on or prior to October 1, 1918, as and when the same may mature. It further agrees to purchase this bond at par on October 1, 1918, if so requested by the holder not less than sixty days prior thereto."

The question having arisen as to the right of the gas company to deliver the bonds with the above guarantee, this action was instituted to have the question determined. The Louisville Gas Co. is a trading corporation, its chief business being to manufacture and sell gas and electricity. The rule is well recognized that corporations, other than those organized for governmental purposes, have the right to contract debts or borrow money for the purpose of accomplishing the purposes of their organization. This power exists, although not expressly granted by their charters, as fully as possessed by individuals. They also have the power to give the customary evidences of debt and the customary security therefor. This power is only limited by provisions of their charters or statute. It would be a meaningless thing to grant a corporation a charter empowering it to conduct a certain enterprise, and then say that the right to obtain the means necessary to the execution of the purposes of its organization was impliedly denied by the charter.

In section 760, 3 Cook on Corporations, it is said: "The power of a corporation to borrow money is implied, and exists without being expressly granted by charter or statute. * * * Common law places no limit upon the amount which the corporation may borrow. The amount borrowed may be greater than the capital stock. * * * Although a gas company has no power to issue bonds in excess of its capital stock, yet this does not restrict its right to issue notes."

In section 761 it is said: "The power of a corporation to sell and endorse notes received by it in connection with its own business, is of course, undoubted. It is a part of the every day business of most corporations."

In 7 Thompson on Corporations, section 8340, it is said: "In the United States, in the absence of statutory provisions, the power to emit negotiable paper is regarded as one of the incidental or implied powers of every private corporation. The power necessarily follows from the power to borrow money, or to become indebted in any lawful way. This is nothing more than giving that form of security for a debt which is exacted by ordinary business usages. Nor is this power affected by constitutional provisions or statutes imposing restraints upon the issuing of stocks or bonds."

The conclusion can not be avoided that the gas company to carry out the purposes of its organization (unless denied by its charter), has the right to contract debts, borrow money and give customary evidences of debt. It is urged that because the charter of the gas company provides that it may issue bonds for $500,000, and execute a mortgage on its property to secure them, and that their proceeds shall only be used in improving the plant, that it hereby limits its power to contract any other kind of indebtedness or liability. Those who prepared the charter and its amendments and the legislature knew the meaning of the words and terms employed in defining the power and limitations on the power of the corporation. If it had intended to limit the amount of indebtedness it should contract to the $500,000 of bonds, it would have been quite easy to have so said. As the limitation is only as to a bonded indebtedness which may be secured by mortgage, the necessary implication is that no limitation was intended to be placed on its power to contract other indebtedness which like corporations may legitimately contract in the execution of the purposes of their organization.

The charter of a corporation read in connection with the general law applicable to it is the measure of its power.

In Greenbay & N. R. Co. v. Union Steamboat Co., 107 U. S., 100, the court said: "The charter of a corporation, read in connection with the general laws applicable to it, is the measure of its powers; and a contract manifestly beyond those powers will not sustain an action against the corporation. But whatever, under the charter and other general laws reasonably construed, may fairly be regarded as incidental to the object for which the corporation is created, is not taken to be prohibited."

This rule of construction is approved in Rhorer, Receiver v. Middlesborough Town and Land Co., 103 Ky., 150. In Merchants National Bank v. Citizens Gas Light Co., 159 Mass., 505, the court had under consideration a question very similar to the one here for solution. It was an action on a promissory note.

The statute construed reads as follows: "No gas company, unless specially authorized by the legislature, shall hereafter issue any bonds at less than the par value, nor for an amount exceeding its capital actually paid in, and applied to the purpose of its incorporation. The proceeds of all bonds issued shall be applied to the payment of obligations incurred for the enlargement or extension of the works and the purchase of real estate for the use of the company, or for the payment of liabilities existing at the time of the passage of this act. A company may, upon vote of a majority in interest of its stockholders, at a meeting duly called for the purpose, issue bonds in accordance with the provisions of this section, to bear interest at not exceeding 6 per cent. per annum, and may secure the payment of principal and interest which shall accrue by a mortgage of its franchise and other property."

The court said: "The defendant corporation's first request for instructions relates to the effect of statutes of 1886, chapter 346, upon the power of defendant corporation to issue promissory notes. The third section of that statute relates to the issue of bonds by gas companies, and gives the company the right to secure bonds issued in accordance with the provisions of the section by mortgage of the franchise and property of the company; but we find nothing in the charter which affects the right of such company to issue promissory notes when convenient or necessary in the prosecution of its business."

The Constitution of California prohibited corporations from increasing their stock and bonded indebtedness, except in a specified manner. A corporation contracted a debt, executed its note therefor and a mortgage to secure it, without doing that which the statute required to be done before increasing its bonded indebtedness. In an action to enforce the payment of the debt the court in Underhill v. Santa Barbara Co., 93 Cal., 300, among other things, said: "Manifestly it is not the intention of the Constitution to prohibit the increase of all kinds of indebtedness since the prohibition of a particular kind implies that there may be indebtedness of another kind."

In Clark & Marshall on Corporations, section 179, it is said: "A limitation of the amount of a particular kind of indebtedness does not apply to other kinds of indebtedness."

We conclude that the gas company had the authority to contract the debts due the appellants.

It is conceded that the gas company was authorized to consummate the deal which resulted in its rightful ownership of the $1,600,000 of the lighting company's bonds. As the gas company owns the bonds its right to sell them necessarily exists. It owes debts and it is under a legal obligation to pay them. In the judgment of the corporation it is best to sell the lighting company's bonds which it owns for that purpose. If it has the right to sell them, it certainly has the right to apply their proceeds to the payment of its debts. If it can apply the proceeds to that purpose, it can sell them to its creditors and thus discharge its debts. The bonds not having a market value can not be sold at their real value, unless the gas company gives the guaranty to which we have alluded.

As the gas company acquired the bonds in carrying out the legitimate purposes of its organization, and desire to sell them in furtherance of the same purpose, it follows that if the guaranty is necessary to make the proceeds available, it has the right to make it. It surely creates a personal liability. If it had the power to contract debts and thus create a personal liability, it certainly has the power to create another personal liability to meet the former one. An objection is made because the bonds did not mature until 1918. This objection can only go to the question of the advisability of creating an obligation to continue during that period, which question alone must be determined by the gas company. The objection can not go to the question of power, which we alone have under consideration. Notes executed by the gas company to the appellant for the debts which it owes them would be valid whether they were made payable one day or several years after date. If it held notes of customers, payable years after date, it could assign them to the appellants in payment of their debts. The assignment by operation of law would create a personal liability. In the instance cited as would be in the proposed guaranty, a personal liability would be created in the execution of the purposes of the organization and would be enforceable. The guaranty required the gas company to redeem the bonds if not paid. That fact can not affect the question of the power to create a personal liability. The purpose of the guaranty is to give a market value to the bonds and make them available. Suppose instead of selling the bonds with the guaranty, the gas company should execute its promissory notes to the appellants for the debts and pledge the bonds to secure them, certainly it would not be contended that a personal liability would not be created because the bonds were pledged as collateral. The difference in the liability between that arrangement and the proposed one is simply in form. In one instance the gas company would be required to pay notes which it had executed for the debts, in the other it would be required to pay its debts by the redemption of the bonds if not paid. The proposed guaranty by the gas company is not for the benefit of the lighting company, but for its own benefit. Therefore, the precise question is not here involved, as would be in a case where one corporation guarantees the bonds of another corporation for the latter's benefit. There are some instructive cases involving the power of corporations to make contracts and also guarantee the payment of another corporation's obligations, when to do so is beneficial to the former company by enabling it to promote its legitimate ends. In Railway Co. v. Howard, 7 Wall, 412, the court said: "Abundant proof exists in this record that railway companies may issue their own bonds to raise money to carry into effect the purpose for which they were created; and it is difficult to see why they may not guarantee the payment of such bonds as they lawfully received from cities and counties, and put them upon the market instead of their own, as the means of accomplishing the same end. Undoubtedly they may receive such bonds under the laws of the State, and if they may receive them, they may transfer them to others; and if they may transfer them to purchasers, they may, if they deem it expedient, guarantee their payment as a means of augmenting their credit in the market, and saving the corporation from the necessity of issuing their own bonds to accomplish the same purpose. Considered, therefore, as an open question, the court is of the opinion that the objection is without merit. Private corporations may borrow money, or become parties to negotiable paper in the transaction of their legitimate business, unless expressly prohibited; and until the contrary is shown, the legal presumption is that their acts in that behalf were done in the regular course of their authorized business."

In Frankfort Bridge Co. v. City of Frankfort, 18 B. M., 45, the court in effect held that if the charter and statutory law is silent upon the subject of the power to make a contract, it may be implied on the part of the corporation, when directly or indirectly necessary to enable it to fulfill the purposes of its existence.

In section 775, Cook on Corporations, 5th edition, it is said: "One of the most important and yet difficult branches of railroad corporation law is the question whether one railroad corporation may guarantee the bonds or dividends or another railroad corporation. After a great deal of litigation the rule has become established that such a guaranty is valid, provided it is based on valuable consideration, and the consideration is such as the guarantor has power to receive or invest in."

The case of Todd, &c. v. Kentucky Union Land Co., 57 Federal Rep., 47 (opinion by Judge Lurton), and the same case on appeal, 62 Fed. Rep., 335 (opinion by Judge Taft), supports our conclusion that the gas company has the right to guarantee the payment of the bonds. By a provision of the charter, the city of Louisville has an option to purchase the gas company's property at the expiration of the charter.

It is urged that if the liability resulting from the guarantee of the bonds exists at the time its right to purchase accrues, it would be embarrassed thereby. It is difficult to see how it will affect the rights of the city as a purchaser (not stockholder,) because the amount of outstanding liabilities would have to be deducted from the purchase price ascertained in the manner provided by the charter. However the question before us is not whether the city of Louisville will be able to become a purchaser of the property of the gas company, but it is whether the gas company proposes to exceed the power which we find it to possess when we read its charter in connection with general laws applicable to it. We concur in the conclusion reached by the learned circuit judge in his able opinion.

The judgment is affirmed.

COMMONWEALTH, BY, &c. v. BANK OF COMMERCE.

(Filed June 18, 1904.)

1. Taxation—Deposits in bank—Liability of bank for taxes thereon—In a proceeding by the auditor's agent to require the banks of this State to list for taxation and pay the taxes on funds deposited therein by its depositors, upon the theory that the property sought to be taxed belongs to the bank, or is held by it for others, and that it should be assessed regardless as to how it was acquired, or is held, we adhere to the conclusions of the court in the case of Deposit Bank of Owensboro v. Daviess County, 102 Ky., 214, "that banks are not required to pay taxes on the money deposited with them by their customers, or assets which represent it; and that under the law the depositors are required to pay the tax on the money so deposited," and it necessarily follows that the bank as quasi trustee, or bailee, or otherwise, is not under a duty to list the property sought to be assessed by such proceedings, and the same can not be maintained.

Taylor & Lucas for appellants.

Dodd & Dodd and Humphrey, Burnett & Humphrey for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, Third Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

Through Frank A. Lucas claiming to represent the Commonwealth as auditor's agent three proceedings were instituted against the appellee to compel it to list for taxation of the date of September 15, 1899, notes secured by mortgage of the fair cash value of $———; other notes of the fair cash value of $———; certain accounts of the fair cash value of $———; cash on hands of $———; cash on deposit with other banks or due from other banks of $———; certain sums due as overdrafts from sundry persons and corporations of $———; certain bonds and stocks of the value of $———, and in the aggregate of the fair cash value of $4,008,125.34. By each of the proceedings it is sought to compel the appellee to list the same kind of property for taxation for the years 1900, 1901, 1902 and 1903, but the aggregate amount varying with the years. We shall designate for convenience the proceedings by numbers. By proceeding No. 1, the plaintiff seeks to compel the appellee to list the property sought to be taxed, upon the theory that the appellee owns it and that it has been omitted from assessment to it. By the second proceeding it is sought to compel the appellee to list the property in question as trustee. By the third, to list it as bailee in possession. By agreement the three proceedings were heard together. It was eminently proper to hear them together, because the same property is sought to be taxed for each of the years named.

The cash and assets sought to be assessed were acquired with money deposited by the bank's depositors or in part by the money which was paid by the stockholders and the accumulations thereon, or by the money derived in both of the ways named. For the bank it is contended that it is an effort to tax the money deposited by its depositors. For the appellant it is claimed that this is a misstatement of the purpose of the proceedings, that plaintiff only seeks to tax certain assets of the bank. The plaintiff does not in terms state how the bank derived the property sought to be taxed, but when we take the three statements together it may fairly be concluded that it is the purpose to tax property derived from sums deposited by appellee's depositors. This conclusion is supported by the fact that the bank's capital stock, surplus and undivided profits were assessed by the board of equalization in fixing its franchise tax. The correctness of that assessment is not questioned, and it is admitted that it paid its tax due thereon. It is the theory of the appellant that the property sought to be taxed belongs to the appellee or is held by it for others, and that it should be assessed regardless of the question as to how it was acquired, or is held.

The claim that the property should be assessed as omitted property is based upon sections 171, 172 and 174 of the Constitution, and section 4020, Kentucky Statutes. Section 171, in speaking of taxes, provides: "They shall be uniform upon all property within the territorial limits of the authority levying the taxes; and all taxes shall be levied and collected by general laws."

Section 172 provides: "All property, not exempted from taxation by this Constitution, shall be assessed for taxation at its fair cash value."

Section 174 provides that: "All property, whether owned by natural persons or corporations, shall be taxed in proportion to its value, unless exempted by this Constitution; and all corporate property shall pay the same rate of taxation paid by individual property."

Section 4020, Kentucky Statutes, was enacted pursuant to the provisions of the Constitution. A bank does not keep the funds arising from the contributions of shareholders and depositors separate, therefore, the only way to approximate the amount which each class may have contributed to the cash on hand and to the purchase of notes, bills of exchange, etc., is by proportion. Evidently the auditor's agent in his calculations segregates the items of value which produces the total credits of the bank, and thus ascertains the value of the alleged omitted property. The amount thus ascertained is the proportion of the contribution made by the deposits. The law in the affairs of State and men regards the substance of things; while the auditor's agent does not eo nomine seek to assess the appellee's deposits, but he in effect does so. The legislature was confronted by a condition. In its wisdom it knew that banks and similar institutions are necessary to conduct the business affairs of the State. It likewise knew to establish and conduct a bank it was necessary that persons should contribute a banking capital and that persons should deposit their money therein. It knew that persons would not contribute their money to acquire a banking house, equip it with vaults, safes and furniture, and put it in charge of salaried officers and clerks, if there were to be no depositors. Necessarily those who contributed to the capital and those who might contribute to the deposit account were under a duty to pay taxes. The question then necessarily arose as to how this burden of taxation should be borne. The legislature recognized it had a delicate and difficult question for solution. Presumably it recalled the legislative history of the State on the subject of bank taxation and the public necessity for solvent banks and financial institutions. It likewise knew that the Constitution required that taxation in so far as possible should be equal and uniform. It also knew that contributors to the capital stock and to the deposit account were equally necessary to establish and successfully conduct a banking or financial institution. It knew that contributors to the capital stock expected to make a profit in the conduct of the business and to be paid for the risks they assumed in handling the money of its depositors. It knew the depositors expected to be compensated for making the deposits by way of interest on them or by way of convenience or benefits in a business way. It knew that most of the depositors in banks could withdraw their deposits on demand and that, therefore, it was necessary to keep on hand money to meet such demands and it so provided. It was aware of the fact that in the case of the Commonwealth v. Gaines, 80 Ky., 495, in construing a statute authorizing the assessment of property in the possessory control of another, said: "The rule should not be misapplied to an absurd assessment of property which may be loaned to a neighbor for a day or that necessarily passes through different hands in its temporary use and which may be easily and properly assessed to the owner." It likewise was aware that in Spalding v. Commonwealth, 88 Ky., 140, the court held it would not be proper to charge officers, like receivers and sheriffs, with taxes upon funds transiently in their hands and which may happen to be held by them upon the particular day when the owner or possessor is chargeable with the taxes. It presumably knew that in Louisville & Evansville Mill Co. v. Barbour, 88 Ky., 78, the court had, under consideration the question, whether under a law requiring stockholders to list and pay taxes on their stock in corporations (it being alleged they had failed to do so,) and held the corporation could not be compelled to list and pay taxes on its property represented by the stock, as it would be double taxation, and that the legislature had no power to directly impose double taxation. Likewise the legislature presumably knew that after the decision in Louisville & Evansville Mill Co. v. Babbour, the law was changed and the corporation was required to pay taxes on its property, instead of the shareholders paying taxes on their stock, and the court in Whitaker, Auditor's Agent v. Brooks, 90 Ky., 68, held that the corporation, and not the shareholders, should pay the tax.

It has never been the policy of the Commonwealth to require bankers and banking institutions to pay taxes on their deposits, or on that part of them preserved in cash, or on the part invested in notes, bills of exchange, etc. So far as we are advised, no effort to do so has ever been made in a Constitutional Convention, or in any legislature assembled in the State.

Neither has any political party or association of voters, so far as we are aware, ever advocated the justness or advisability of such a provision in the tax laws of the State. It, therefore, is fair to conclude that the members of the several constitutional conventions and the many members of the legislatures which have assembled in the State, did not deem it a wise policy to engraft in the tax laws such a feature. Besides, it is proper to conclude that the sovereigns who were represented in the several constitutional and legislative bodies approved the action of those bodies, as they never demanded such legislation. In addition to this, the legislature has enacted laws from time to time which show such a system of taxation, in its judgment, should not be established. And the only time the court has spoken upon the question, it said that such a system of taxation was not provided by law, but that another and different one was established. If this feature of taxation is required by the Constituton, then we must ascribe to the Constitutional Convention a purpose to make necessary legislation which was never suggested, much less demanded, by the taxpayers of the State; the practical effect of which would be to put out of business State banks and trust companies, and likewise national banks, if they can be subjected to the same taxation as other moneyed institutions in the State. To illustrate: It is safe to say that the average tax rate for State, county, municipal and school purposes is $2 on each $100 of valuation. If a State bank has a capital stock of $25,000, and has a deposit of $100,000, the tax paid annually would $2,500, the equivalent of 10 per cent. on the capital stock of the bank. The effect would be to drive out of business a large number of financial institutions. To construe the law so as to have that effect would be to adjudge that the Constitutional Convention and legislatures intended to destroy much needed financial institutions, or that they heedlessly enacted a law without considering the consequences to flow from its execution. We are unwilling to adjudge in effect that the Constitutional Convention or the legislature ever had such a purpose or was so inconsiderate of the consequences of their acts. Suppose that the national banks can not be made to pay taxes on their cash, notes, bills of exchange, etc., but only on their shares of stock, surplus fund and real estate, and State banks and trust companies should attempt to do business under the proposed scheme of taxation, what would be the relative effect on these financial institutions? It can be best illustrated by taking a national bank with a like capital stock of a State Bank to which we have referred, to wit, $25,000 actual value, with a deposit account of $100,000. If the rate is $2 on each $100 of valuation, it would pay $500 taxes, while the State Bank would pay $2,500, exactly five times as much as would the National Bank. This would be the effect if both banks were located on the same street in the same city. It would require but little consideration of the question to reach the conclusion that national banks would not long have competitors doing business under charters granted by the State. With the Constitution of the State, the decisions of this court and legislative history of the State before it, the legislature solved the problem of taxation of banks, by requiring them to pay taxes on the shares of the capital stock, on their surplus fund, undivided profits, real estate and franchises, and by requiring the depositors to pay on their deposits. It is in effect urged that the requirements of the Constitution are not complied with when the depositor is required to list for taxation the money he has on deposit, because in law the relation of debtor and creditor is sustained between the bank and the depositor, and that a deposit when made becomes the property of the bank. The courts so hold in adjudging the rights between the parties in the settlement of the bank's affairs, or in passing upon the question involving the rights of the bank, its depositor and third persons. However, that does not prevent the legislature from regulating how the bank and its depositor shall share the burden of taxation on the fund created by their respective contributions. When it has done so, it has not violated the rule requiring uniformity and equality in taxation. Two striking examples of what the legislature can do with reference to the listing of property for taxation, etc., may be given. The statute makes the distiller liable for the taxes on whisky owned either by a resident or nonresident of the State, though it is actually in the custody of the United States Government. The national banking act provides that shares of stock in national banks shall be assessed for taxation. Of course they belong to the shareholders, and neither the corporation nor its officers have any interest in them. Notwithstanding that neither the corporation nor its officers owned the shares of stock, the legislature required certain officers of the bank to list them for taxation and to pay the tax thereon with the funds of the bank. This court sustained the validity of the act imposing a tax on whisky, and the act for the assessment and payment of the taxes on the shares of stock in the national banks. Besides, the Supreme Court of the United States has held acts similar to the last named act, valid. If it is competent for the legislature to enact the statutes referred to, and we think it is, it is equally so for it to preserve for taxation the fund contributed by the shareholders, accumulations on it, and the value of the franchise, and likewise preserve the deposits for taxation and make the bank pay on its contributions, etc., and the depositors on their contributions, instead of requiring the bank to pay on the assets acquired by the use of the moneys so contributed by both. The question involved is not a new one to this court. It thoroughly considered the question of the taxation of banks in the State in Deposit Bank of Owensboro v. Daviess County, 103 Ky., 214, where the court said: "The banks are not required to pay tax on the money deposited with them by their customers, or on assets which represent it. Owing to the particular character of the business which they conduct, they are quasi trustees of their depositors, and, under the law, the depositors are required to pay the tax on the money so deposited. The bank should be required to pay tax on the shares of capital stock, on their surplus funds, undivided profits, franchises and their real estate."

Many banks have been organized in the State since the decision of the court, and banking business has been adjusted to the conditions imposed thereby. We adhere to the conclusion that "banks are not required to pay taxes on the money deposited with them by their customers or assets which represent it, * * * and that under the law, the depositors are required to pay the tax on the money so deposited."

Having reached this conclusion, it necessarily follows that the bank, as quasi trustee or bailee or otherwise, is not under a duty to list the property sought to be assessed by these proceedings; hence, neither can be maintained.

The judgment is affirmed.

CITY OF LOUISVILLE v. GAST, &c.

(Filed June 18, 1904.)

1. Ordinances—Enacting two ordinances at same time—Validity—Under Kentucky Statutes, section 2777, providing "that no ordinance shall be passed until it shall have been read in full in each board, and free discussion allowed thereon, and no ordinance shall pass both boards on the same day, and no ordinance shall embrace more than one subject, which shall be expressed in its title," we should hesitate to hold, in the absence of an express statutory declaration on the question, that an ordinance was void for the reason that it was one of two ordinances which were passed by the council at the same time, relating to the same subject, there being no objection thereto by any member of the council.

2. Apportionment warrant—Work done as required—Failure of property owner to object—While there may be some doubt as to the validity of an ordinance where there were two ordinances passed by the council at the same time, relating to the same subject, yet under Kentucky Statutes, section 2834, providing that no error in the proceedings of the general council shall exempt from payment for work done on public ways, after the work has been done as required by either the ordinance or contract, where work has been done on a public way according to such ordinance or contract, without objection by the property owner whose property has thereby been benefitted, it is too late for him to object to the payment of the apportionment warrant and the enforcement of the lien therefor, after receiving the benefit of the work without objection.

H. L. Stone for City of Louisville.

Lane & Harrison for J. H. Brand.

Wm. Furlong, DuRelle & McHenry for Gast & Gosnell.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

This record presents the sole question as to whether or not the general council of cities of the first class have the power to pass two or more separate and distinct ordinances for original construction of public highways at the same time, there being no objection thereto by any member. The statutory law regulating the subject in hand is contained in the following sections of the Kentucky Statutes:

"Section 2777. No ordinance shall be passed until it shall have been read in full in each board and free discussion allowed thereon, and no ordinance shall pass both boards on the same day. No ordinance shall embrace more than one subject, and that shall be expressed in its title. No ordinance shall be altered or amended in any way except by repealing it.

"Section 2826. No public way shall be opened, narrowed, closed, or constructed, and no sidewalk shall be constructed or reconstructed, and no public wells or cisterns shall be dug and walled, except by ordinance recommended by the board of public works.

"Section 2834. * * * Payments (of apportionate warrants) may be enforced upon the property bound therefor by proceedings in court; and no error in the proceedings of the general council shall exempt from payment after the work has been done as required by either the ordinance or contract." * * *

There is no inhibition in the statute against the final passage of two or more ordinances at the same time, and by the same vote, although the legislative requirement as to the passage of ordinances is set forth with minute particularity in the statutes above quoted. It will be observed that no ordinance for the original construction of public highways can be enacted, except upon the recommendation of the board of public works (section 2826); that it shall not be passed until it shall have been read in full in each board, and free discussion allowed thereon; nor shall it pass both boards on the same day; that it shall not embrace more than one subject, and that shall be expressed in its title; that it shall not be altered or amended in any way, except by repealing it (section 2777); and if it be for an original improvement, it shall not pass both boards of the general council at the same meeting, and at least two weeks shall elapse between its passage from one board to the other. (Section 2834.)

With the leigslative will in regard to the passage of ordinances expressed with such minute particularity, it is inconceivable that, if it was intended that two or more ordinances should not be grouped together and passed by one vote, this prohibition would not have been expressly enacted.

In McQuillin on the Law of Municipal Ordinances, section 116, it is said: "The council generally acts by vote. In the absence of express provision, the vote may be given in any form which clearly expresses the will of the members. It may be by ballot, by resolution, by the adoption of a verbal motion or in any other manner. 'A vote is but the expression of the will of a voter; and whether the formula to give expression to such law be a ballot or viva voce, the result is the same; either is a vote.' Departure from the form prescribed for corporate action, as in the passage of an ordinance, will not affect the validity of such action unless the charter or governing law makes such formality vital, as by declaring the action or ordinance void unless the form prescribed be followed." In the case of Wright v. Forrestal, 61 Wis., 849, on this subject it was said: "Nor do we think the fact that the resolution was voted upon at the same time a vote was taken upon other resolutions vitiates the vote, and that, therefore, the resolution was never adopted by the council. All who have any knowledge of the proceedings of legislative bodies know that the practice adopted by the common council of the city of Milwaukee is a common practice in both branches of the legislature of this State, and of other States. To hold that this resolution was not adopted by the common council for the reason stated, would invalidate a very considerable part of the acts of our legislature. The practice may not be one to be approved, but we are unable to say that it is not a lawful practice. The statute does not say that a separate vote shall be taken and recorded upon each resolution or act passed by the council, but that 'the vote on the passage of every such resolution shall be taken by yeas and nays, and duly entered in the journal of proceedings.' Here the vote was taken on the resolution in the proper way, and the yeas and nays were entered, etc., as required by law. * * * If it be desirable that a separate vote should be taken upon resolutions of this nature by the common council, it is very easy for the legislature to so expressly direct."

This was said in a case involving the enforcement of a lien for the cost of street improvement. In the absence of an express statutory declaration prohibiting the passage of ordinances in the manner complained of in this case, we should hesitate to hold the ordinance involved herein void upon the ground contended for by appellees. But we do not mean to be understood as holding that, if a member objects, two or more ordinances may be lawfully voted on at one and the same time. But we are not required to rest this case wholly upon the foregoing principles; by section 2834, it is expressly provided that "no error in the proceedings of the general council shall exempt from payment after the work has been done as required by either the ordinance or contract."

Substantially, the question involved here arose in the case of Broadway Baptist Church, &c. v. McAtee, &c., 8 Bush, 508. In that case it was said: "It may well be doubted whether the general council did not err in failing to give the property owners an opportunity of having the improvement made by private contract. But the ordinance under which the work was done was a matter of public record, and every citizen or property holder to be affected had constructive notice of its adoption, and from the time the contractor commenced work it may be assumed that the appellants had actual notice, not only of the ordinance, but of the contract under which the work was being done. It does not appear that either of them labored under any legal disability."

If it was their intention to rely upon this alleged error as a defense to the claims the contractor would have against them for the assessments provided for by the ordinance to pay the cost of the improvement, it was their duty to have notified them of such intention. Under the circumstances it is peculiarly proper that the provision of the charter, to the effect that "no error in the proceedings of the general council shall exempt from payment after the work is done as required by ordinance or contract," should be applied to them. By failing to speak when it was their duty to do so, they must be held to have waived the right, intended to be secured to them by the charter, of making the improvements for the cost of which they were bound, by private contract

"We are of opinion that ordinances providing for the construction or reconstruction of public ways at the cost of property owners are not embraced by the provisions of the sixty-seventh section of the charter. But if they were, the error in failing to vote upon the ordinance under which this improvement was made, on two different days, is one which comes within the curative provision of section 12, just referred to. Ordinances providing for the improvement of streets, under the peculiar provisions of the charter of Louisville, are not void merely because the general council fails to follow strictly its delegated powers. Under the general rule of construction, the authority delegated to municipal corporations is to be strictly construed, and must be closely pursued. (Citing authorities.) But the sovereign power that delegates this authority may, when it sees proper, change or abrogate this rule of construction. So far as the improvement of public ways in Louisville and the assessment of taxaton to pay the cost thereof are concerned, this rule is abrogated, and a differnt one prescribed by the provision in question."

The law which this opinion construed was in all material respects the same as that under which the question at bar arose. The very end to be obtained by the enactment, that "no error in the proceedings of the general council shall exempt from payment after the work has been done as required by either the ordinance or contract," was the prevention of such questions as the one presented by this record. In order that the citizens and property owners may be fully advised as to the passage of ordinances, it is provided by section 2773, Kentucky Statutes, that "each board shall keep a correct journal of its proceedings, and immediately after the adjournment of each session the proceedings thereof shall be published once in one English and one German daily paper printed in the city and having the largest permanent circulation in said city," and by section 2774, "All ordinances shall be published in like manner as the proceedings of the general council." These provisions are carried into effect at great expense, and are manifestly for the protection of those to be affected by municipal legislation, and they cast upon the citizen the duty of keeping himself advised as to the proceedings of the municipal legislature to object to legislation adverse to his interest, and to point out irregularities and deviations from statutory requirements before they have been put in force. And this is especially true of the enforcement of ordinances for the original construction of public ways.

It was clearly the intention of the legislature, if property owners failed to object to the enforcement of an ordinance for the improvement of public ways in front of their property before the work was done by the contractor, to shut off all irregularity in the preliminary steps as a defense to his demand for payment after he has performed his work according to the terms of the ordinance and the contract. This being true, as the work had been done according to the terms of the ordinance and contract, the answer of appellees presented no defense to the cause of action set up in the petition of appellant Gast, and both his, and the city's demurrers should have been sustained.

Wherefore, the judgment, both as to the city and to Jacob Gast, is reversed, with directions to sustain the demurrers to the answer, and for further proceedings consistent herewith.

PHILLIPS v. PHILLIPS, EX'OR.

(Filed June 18, 1904—Not to be reported).

J. M. Roberson for appellants.

T. L. Edelen for appellees.

Appeal from Pike Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

We are asked in the petition for rehearing to extend the opinion so as to show that the judgment was not reversed as to those tracts of land which were bought by strangers to the record. We think this sufficiently appears from the original opinion. Tract number seven was bought by J. M. York and Tom Williamson, and two tracts of land were bought by J. M. York, James Hatcher, James Sowards and R. A. Heilliar. As to these tracts the judgment was not reversed.

WEISINGER, &c. v. McDONALD, &c.

(Filed June 18, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Robt. Harding for appellants.

R. P. Jacobs and Wm. Herndon for appellees.

Appeal from Boyle Circuit Court.

Judge Settle delivered the following response to petition for rehearing:

The question is made by the petition for rehearing that W. H. Kinnaird, administrator of Lucile Weisinger, deceased, is not a party to this appeal. We find on page 30 of the record an order which dismissed him as a party to the action, and this order was of course entered by the lower court before the appeal was taken. We were led to think him a party to the appeal as his name appears as a party in the statement filed with the record, naming the parties to the appeal. It is, however, not material to the decision of the appeal by this court that he should have been a party to the record. Appellants, upon the ground that Mary A. McDonald had illegally received and converted the proceeds of her infant daughter's real estate, to which they were entitled, no matter by whom paid to her, had the right to sue her alone to recover it, or to dismiss others whom they had sued with her, and seek a recovery against her alone. The judgment and opinion of this court can not of course affect Kinnaird as he was dismissed from the case in the court below.

A careful examination of the petition for rehearing has failed to indicate to our minds any error in the conclusions expressed in the opinion herein. Wherefore, the opinion is modified to the extent of declaring that it does not apply to Kinnaird, and the petition for rehearing is overruled.

WEBER v. GARDNER.

(Filed June 20, 1904—Not to be reported.)

W. T. Burch for appellant.

Samuel Avritt for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division.

Judge Settle delivered the following modification of opinion in response to petition for modification:

The opinion in this case directs the lower court, in the event the appellant shall fail to bring before the court the holders of liens upon the property in controversy by proper pleading, that they may assert such liens, that the court should again enter the judgment appealed from and reversed and "dismiss her petition."

The latter expression "dismiss her petition" was inadvertently written and improper, and that expression is withdrawn, and the opinion to that extent modified.

VOL. 26. SEPTEMBER 15, 1904. No. 6

COURT OF APPEALS OF KENTUCKY.

CRALLE v. JACKSON, &c.

(Filed June 18, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Wills—Construction—Vested title to land—Void limitation thereon—By the will of Emma V. Bland she provides as follows: "I give and bequeath to my daughter, Virginia Wise Bland, all my real estate wherever located, but it is my will that my husband, Patrick H. Bland, shall enjoy one-third, and my said daughter the other two-thirds of the rents, profits and income, from all my real estate, after the taxes, insurance, and other expenses on the property are all paid, and after the death of my said husband, I give, bequeath, and devise to my said daughter, all of my real estate wherever located absolutely, to do with as she likes. However, if my said daughter should die before my husband without a will or bodily heirs, then it is my will that my said husband take all of my real estate to sell, rent, or do with as he so desires. However, should my daughter die leaving heirs, it is my wish that my said husband shall enjoy the whole of the rents, profits and income from all my real estate, but that the real estate shall return to my said daughter's heirs after my said husband's death." Held—That by the terms of this will the testatrix has vested her daughter, Virginia Wise Bland, with an absolute fee-simple estate in all of her real estate subject to a charge in favor of her father of one-third of the net income. Under well recognized rules of construction the subsequent limitation attempted to be placed thereon is void, and the fee remains in the daughter subject to the claim of the father to one-third of the profits of the estate during his life. We are, therefore, of the opinion that a deed by Virginia Wise Bland and her husband, and her father, Patrick H. Bland, passes to the purchaser a complete fee-simple title to the land.

O'Neal & O'Neal for appellant.

C. H. Shield for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

This action was brought by appellees against the appellant to enforce a written agreement on his part to purchase and pay for a piece of real estate in the city of Louisville. The appellant admits the contract and avers a willingness to comply therewith, provided the deed tendered him by the appellees conveys a good title to the property. The decision of the question involves a construction of the will of Emma V. Bland, deceased, which reads as follows:

"I, Emma V. Bland, of Louisville, Jefferson county, Kentucky, being of sound mind and disposing memory, do hereby make this my last will and testament:

"I hereby give and bequeath to my daughter, Virginia Wise Bland, all of my personal property whatsoever.

"I also give and bequeath to my said daughter all of my real estate, wherever located; but it is my will that my husband, Patrick H. Bland, shall enjoy one-third, and my said daughter the other two-thirds of the rents, profits and income from all my real estate, after the taxes, insurance and other expenses on the property are all paid, and after the death of my said husband, I give, bequeath and devise to my said daughter all of my real estate wherever located, absolutely, and to do with as she likes. However, if my said daughter should die before my said husband, without a will or bodily heirs, then it is my will that my said husband take all of my real estate to sell, rent or do with as he so desires. However, should my said daughter die leaving heirs, it is my wish that my said husband shall enjoy the whole of the rents, profits and income from all my real estate, but that the real estate shall return to my said daughter's heirs after my said husband's death. I hereby appoint my husband, Patrick H. Bland, my executor without bond.

"Witness my hand this 9th day of February, 1898.

(Signed) "EMMA V. BLAND."

This will was written by testatrix, and is somewhat remarkable in its contradictions. The first paragraph thereof vests the daughter with an absolute fee simple estate. That is qualified in the next paragraph by a provision that the husband shall be entitled to one third the net profits and income thereof during his life. This is followed by another paragraph in which the daughter is given all of the real estate owned by testatrix, wherever located, absolutely, to do with as she likes. Up to this point, we think it clear that the will vests Virginia Wise Bland with an absolute fee-simple title to all of the real estate, subject to a charge in favor of her father of one-third of the net income. The next paragraph provides that if the daughter should die before the husband, without having disposed of the property by will or leaving bodily heirs, that the husband should take the real estate with power to sell, rent, or do with as he desires. In the next paragraph, it is provided that should the daughter die, leaving heirs, before her father, that he should enjoy the income of the real estate during his life and at his death it should return to the daughter's heirs. We think the word "heirs," as used in the will, mean children, and would ordinarily be construed as words of purchase. But, as testatrix, in the first paragraph of her will, has vested Virginia Wise Bland with an absolute fee-simple estate, under well recognized rules of construction the subsequent limitation attempted to be placed thereon is void, and the fee remains in the daughter subject to the claim of her father to one-third the profits of the estate during his life. We are, therefore, of the opinion that the deed executed by ginia Wise Bland Jackson and her husband, and by Patrick H. Bland, ses to the purchaser the complete fee-simple title. We are supported in conclusion by numerous decisions of this court, and other well recog- ed authorities.

Ball v. Hancock's Adm'r, 82 Ky., 113, this court said: "It has often held that a devise, gift or grant, generally or indefinitely with the er of disposition or absolute alienation, carries a fee unless the first er is vested with the life estate only, and the power of disposition is exed to the remainder."

he opinion in that case cites, with approval, 4 Kent's Commentaries, ion 319, in which the author says: "A devise of an estate generally and finitely with power of disposition over it, carries the fee."

nd also the case of Jackson v. Robbins, 16 Johnson, 588. In that case will devised: "All his real and personal estate whatsoever unto his , Sarah, to hold the same to her, her executors, administrators, and gns, but in case of her death without giving, devising and bequeathing vill, or otherwise selling or assigning the said estate, or any part thereof, he devised all such estate, or all such parts thereof as should so re- n unsold, undevised or unbequeathed, unto his daughter, Catherine r."

is limitation over in this will was declared void, Judge Kent saying: e power conferred upon the wife was an attribute of ownership and ed with it a fee. The limitation over must be either a remainder or xecutory devise, and it is impossible that it should be either. No re- nder can be limited upon an estate in fee."

Caleb v. Field, &c., 9 Dana, 347, this court held that a simple devise of nrestricted power of disposition, implied an absolute gift in fee. Jar- on Wills, page 666 "A right in the first devisee to dispose of the estate sed at his pleasure and not a mere power of specifying who may take, unts to an unqualified gift."

Ramsdell v. Ramsdell, 21 Me., 288, the court said: "It has become a ed rule of law that if the devisee or legatee have the right to dispose of roperty at pleasure, the devise over is inoperative."

McCallister v. Bethel, 97 Ky., 1, the devise was in trust for Joseph allister, and after his death to his children, if he had any, but if he none, that it should pass to any person Joseph might devise it to. ph died intestate and without children; it was decided that at his death and passed by descent to his heirs at law. The opinion in that case : "The distinguishing feature between a life estate with the power of osition, and an estate where the fee passes to the immediate devisee, ect to be divested upon the happening of a contingency, is that when state for life expressly given and the power of disposition not exercised he life tenant, all his interest in the estate ceases at his death; but n the fee is given in the first instance, as in this case, and the contin- y upon which the title is to be divested or restricted never happens, at the death of the person holding the fee, the estate devised passes by ent to his heirs at law if not disposed of by will, and the attempt to t the power of disposition by will only becomes nugatory."

is rule of construction was followed in Barth v. Barth, 18 Ky. Law Rep., 840. Clay v. Chenault, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1485; Ray v. Spears, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1334; Cox v. Anderson, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 721; Humphrey v. Potter, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1264, and is in conformity with the public policy as announced in section 2342 of the Kentucky Statutes.

Judgment affirmed

FUQUA v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed June 18, 1904.)

1. Homicidal—Cross-examination of Commonwealth's witness—Improper criticism by trial court—Abuse of discretion—On the trial of a defendant on a charge of murder, where a witness for the Commonwealth had undergone a searching and exhaustive cross-examination, the court remarked: "I think this examination has gone far enough, it is immaterial any way." While we think it was not error for the court to rule that the corss-examination on that point had gone far enough, we question the propriety of the after declaration "that the question or matter was immaterial." A trial court should always be careful not to give expression to views not intended for, or proper to be heard by, the jury. Section 598, Civil Code, which is applicable to trials in criminal cases, provides that "the court shall exercise a reasonable control over the mode of interrogation so as to make it rapid, distinct, as little annoying to the witness, and as effective for the extraction of the truth as may be, but subject to this control the parties may put such legal and pertinent questions as they may see fit." Under this section the discretion conferred upon trial courts is broad and should not be interfered with by a revisory court, unless its abuse has been made manifest. We have been unable to see in this instance anything in the record that leads us to believe the statement made by the court was prejudicial to appellant.

2. Testimony of a witness who has since died—Competency of official stenographer's notes—Section 4648, Kentucky Statutes, provides "that the testimony of any witness taken by the official stenographer in any court shall constitute a part of the record of the case, and may, in the discretion of the presiding judge, be used in any subsequent trial of the same case between the same parties where the testimony of such witness can not be procured, which fact must be made to appear satisfactorily to the court by the affidavit of the party desiring to use the same, or by his attorney; provided, that in criminal cases such testimony shall be so used only upon the consent of the defendant." We are of the opinion that this section was not intended to apply, and does not apply to a witness who is dead when his testimony, taken by the stenographer on a former trial, is offered to be used as evidence in a subsequent trial of the same case between the same parties, but applies alone to the testimony of living witnesses so taken and offered to be used, and whose presence and oral testimony can not be procured for use in the subsequent trial.

3. Same—It is admitted that William Davis testified on the first trial of appellant, and that he died before the second and last trial, and that his testimony on the first trial was correctly taken by the official stenographer, and was transcribed and duly certified by him and made a part of the record. As the stenographer, if familiar with the testimony given by Davis at the previous trial, might from mere recollection, have detailed it to the jury, we know of no reason why he should not have been premitted to read it from the official transcript made by him from stenographic notes taken by him at the time Davis testified. Manifestly it was and is more accurate than the memory of any human witness who may have heard Davis testify. It will do no violence to the appellant's rights to hold that the transcript of Davis' testimony read to the jury was competent evidence, and we so hold.

Thos. E. Moss and R. L. Greene for appellant.

N. B. Hays and Loraine Mix for appellee.

Appeal from McCracken Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

This is an appeal from the judgment of the McCracken Circuit Court, entered upon the verdict of a jury finding the appellant, Lon Fuqua, guilty of the murder of George Gray, and fixing his punishment at confinement in the penitentiary for life.

The indictment in the case charged Spot Polk and appellant with the murder—the former as principal, and the latter as aider and abettor. Separate trials were had, resulting in the same verdict as to each defendant. Appellant obtained in this court a reversal of the judgment of conviction upon the first trial, (Fuqua v. Commonwealth, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 2205.) and this appeal is from the second judgment of conviction.

The following statement of facts will serve to illustrate the manner of the homicide and the appellant's connection herewith. On the night of Sunday, December 19, 1901, the appellant, Spot Polk, Ida Gray, George Gray, the victim of the homicide, and others, were at the house of Fordy Simpkins, in the city of Paducah. George Gray left the company and went to the house of Sidney Hawkins. After he left Polk claimed to have discovered that he had lost $10, and was told by Ida Gray, who though of the same name was not related to George Gray; that the latter had stolen or taken it. Thereupon Polk, in company with appellant, left the Simpkins house in search of George Gray, first going to the house of George's sister, whom they found in bed, and by whom they were informed that George Gray was not in the house. Not satisfied of the truth of her statement, Polk entered and searched the house for George Gray, but, failing to find him, remarked to appellant, Fuqua, who was in hiding behind a tree in the yard, "he is not here." The two then left and went together to the house of Sidney Hawkins, where they found George Gray, who was at once accused by Polk of stealing his money. Gray said, "what money," and Polk replied, "Lon (meaning appellant), said you had my money." Gray said, "Lon is a liar, I have not got your money." He then put on his shoes, and said he would go with them and prove that he did not get Polk's money. Thereupon he, Polk, and appellant returned to the home of the Simpkins woman. Upon reaching the house of the Simpkins woman, Polk presented a pistol at Gray, saying, "give me my money." Gray said, "I didn't get your money, you can shoot me if you wish." Gray then said to appellant, "did you say I got that money?" Appellant replied, "I said I believed it," and further, "Ida said you got it." Gray applied an opprobrious epithet to appellant, who said: "If you say that again I will hit you." The epithet was repeated by Gray, and appellant then struck him. Gray returned the blow, went out of the house and got some bricks, which he started to throw at appellant, but was persuaded not to do so.

Later, George Gray left the Simpkins house and did not return. Appellant and Polk remained there all night and on the morning following (Monday) both were drunk. They left the house of the Simpkins woman that morning, and while walking near Bennett's saloon met the wife of Polk, who besought him to go home with her, but appellant urged him not to do so, but to enter Bennett's saloon. They did go to the saloon, upon entering which they saw George Gray sitting in the back room on a log near the stove. Gray, addressing Polk, at once said "Hello, Spot." Appellant, according to the testimony of Gray, taken later as a dying declaration, said: "Shoot the son of a bitch." Polk said nothing, but pulled out his pistol and began to shoot at Gray. Two shots were fired by him at Gray in the saloon, one of which took effect in Gray's back near the right lung. He ran out of the saloon, and was pursued by Polk, accompanied by appellant. Two more shots were fired at Gray by Polk as he fled down the street, and after this last shot was fired, appellant took the pistol of Polk, removed the empty shells, and the two went away together.

About twenty minutes after the shooting appellant, in reply to an inquiry from the wife of Polk as to the cause of the shooting, said: "The son of a bitch stole $10 from Spot. If he had rather die than give it up, let him die."

The evidence introduced by the appellant, especially his own testimony, was in many respects contradictory of that of the Commonwealth. But a careful examination of the record will, we think, show the facts of the homicide to be in substance, as above stated. In view of the facts, criticism of the verdict of the jury would, in our opinion, be unwarranted. Thirteen grounds for a new trial were filed by appellant in the court below. But we will consider only such of them as are urged in the brief of counsel for a reversal. It is insisted for appellant that the lower court, by interrupting the cross-examination of the first witness when introduced, and in saying, "I think this cross-examination has gone far enough, it is immaterial, any way," erred to the prejudice of appellant. An examination of the entire testimony of the witness in question will show that the cross-examination was searching and exhaustive. The question which seemed to have caused the interruption by the court was in regard to a matter which had been fully brought out. The information it sought had been freely testified to, in view of which, the question was, we think, unnecessary, but it can hardly be said that it was in relation to a matter that was immaterial.

We think it was not error for the court to rule that the cross-examination on that point had gone far enough. But we question the propriety of the after declaration of the court to the effect that the question was immaterial. A trial court should always be careful not to give expression to views not intended for or proper to be heard by the jury, as ordinarily his word goes further with them than anything that may be said by counsel. Much depends upon the manner of making a statement. A thing that is harmless in itself may be made harmful by the manner in which it is stated. We are, however, unable to find in this instance anything in the record that leads us to believe that the statement upon the part of the court, of which complaint is made, was prejudicial to the appellant.

Section 593, Civil Code, which is also applicable to trials in criminal cases, provides that "the court shall exercise a reasonable control over the mode of interrogation, so as to make it rapid, distinct, as little annoying to the ness, and as effective for the extraction of truth as may be; but, subject this control, the parties may put such legal and pertinent questions as y may see fit." * * *

The discretion conferred upon trial courts by the section supra is broad l should not be interfered with by a court of revisory power unless its se is made manifest. (Dean v. Commonwealth, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 1876.)

t is also contended that the court erred in permitting the stenographic ort of the evidence of William Davis to be read to the jury. This contenn is based upon section 4643, Kentucky Statutes, which is as follows: he testimony of any witness or witnesses taken by said (stenographic) reter in any court, or decision as aforesaid, shall constitute a part of the ord of the case and may, in the discretion of the presiding judge, be used any subsequent trial of the same case, between the same parties, where testimony of such witness or witnesses can not be procured, which fact st be made to appear satisfactorily to the court by affidavit of the party iring to use the same, or his attorney: Provided, that in criminal cases h testimony shall be so used only upon the consent of the defendant."

Ve are of opinion that the section of the statutes supra was not intended apply, and does not apply, to a witness who is dead when his testimony en by the official stenographer on a former trial, is offered to be used as dence in a subsequent trial of the same case between the same parties, that it applies alone to the testimony of living witnesses so taken, and ered to be used, and whose presence and oral testimony can not be proed for use in the subsequent trial.

t is admitted that the witness, Wm. Davis, testified in the first trial of ellant, and that he died before the second and last trial. It appears m the sworn statements of the stenographic reporter that the testimony Davis, the reading of which is complained of, was correctly taken down him stenographically at the first trial of appellant, and afterwards transbed upon a tpyewriter, and that the testimony thus taken was duly certi- by him officially and made a part of the record of the first trial of aplant. Why, then, should it not have been read as evidence upon the trial appellant? It has long been the law that in a subsequent trial of the ne case between the same parties, it is competent to prove or reproduce, the oral statements of others, the testimony upon a former trial of one ose death occurred after the giving of such testimony, and before the subuent trial. (Thomas v. Commonwealth, 14 Ky. Law Rep., 288; Walkup Commonwealth, 14 Ky. Law Rep., 887.) The reason of the law for recoging the admissibility of the testimony of a witness since deceased, is that was given under the solemnity of an oath and with an opportunity for ss-examination.

n Rice on Evidence, section 224, it is said: "The evidence of a witness ce deceased, on a former trial of the same case, may be proven on a subuent trial. His deposition then taken may be introduced either by the ate or by the accused. Such proof does not violate defendant's constitunal right to 'meet the witness face to face.' And his testimony then ven may be proved, if necessary, by the testimony of one who was present d heard it, who may state its substance, if unable to state its words. The t that a witness on such previous trial, who is still living is absent from the State, or beyond the territorial jurisdiction of the court, is not generally ground for the admission of his previous testimony." * * *

Where the witness is deceased, the authorities hold, in uniform accord, that proof of his testimony upon a second trial is admissible. This rule is bottomed upon necessity, and its aim is to prevent the defeat of justice. Upon the other hand, to admit proof of the testimony of an absent living witness given upon a former trial, would be to dignify secondary evidence, and to disregard that provision of the Constitution which guarantees to the defendant the right to be confronted by the witnesses. Hence the necessity for the enactment of the statute, which makes the transcript of the stenographers' report admissible as evidence in a civil action, under certain conditions, to prove the testimony of an absent living witness made in a previous trial in the same case, and between the same parties; such evidence not to be used, however, in a criminal case, except with the consent of the defendant. The only feature of this question that remains to be considered is as to the admissibility of the transcript of the official stenographer which was used in this case.

As the stenographer, if familiar with the testimony given by Davis at the previous trial might, from mere recollection, have detailed it to the jury, we know of no reason why he should not have been permitted to read it from the transcript made from the stenographic notes taken by him at the time Davis testified. Manifestly, it was and is more accurate than the memory of any human witness who may have heard Davis testify. On this subject we are not without authority. In Rice on Evidence, page 355, we find this statement of the law: "What a witness, since dead, has sworn upon a trial between the same parties, may be given in evidence either from the judge's notes, or from notes that have been taken by any other person who will swear to their accuracy, or the former evidence may be proved by any person who will swear from his memory to its having been given."

It will do no violence to the appellant's rights to hold that the transcript of Davis' testimony, read to the jury, was competent evidence, and we so hold. It is also contended by counsel for appellant that the trial court erred in admitting proof of the dying statement of George Gray. It is sufficient to say that this court on the former appeal held, and we now hold, that the statements of Gray which were admitted in evidence as dying declarations were competent. The evidence clearly shows they were made in extremis, and when the declarant had no hope or expectation of recovery, but believed that his dissolution was at hand. But it was also held on the former appeal, and we now hold, that the paper purporting to contain the dying declaration of Gray could not be read to the jury, as it was not read to or signed by him; but that the witnesses who heard what was said by the deceased on that subject might testify in regard thereto, and that the witness who wrote down the words might refresh his recollection by a reference to the memorandum made by him, in testifying to what was said on that subject by the deceased.

We gather from the record that the opinion of this court was adhered to by the trial court; that the paper referred to was simply used by Cross, who wrote it, to refresh his recollection, and we do not think that the fact that Cross or the Commonwealth's attorney once or twice incidentally referred to the paper as the dying declaration of Gray, though such references do not appear of record, was prejudicial to the appellant. Nor can we see that any part of the testimony of Cross was incompetent. The instructions seem to be proper in all respects; at any rate, there is no criticism of them to be found in the able and admirably written brief of counsel. We are unable to find in the record any ground of reversal.

Wherefore, the judgment is affirmed.

CITY OF LOUISVILLE v. McATEER, &c.

SAME v. LOUISVILLE WATER CO.

(Filed June 18, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Taxation of water company—The question for decision in this case is, whether the property of the Louisville Water Co. is liable for taxation by the city. The court holds that it is, as follows:

First. Section 171 of the Constitution requires that "taxes shall be uniform upon all property subject to taxation within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax, and all taxes shall be levied and collected by general laws." Section 170 provides that "there shall be exempt from taxation public property used for public purposes." "The express mention of one thing implies the exclusion of another." Although the stock of the water company is owned by the city and the property is used in supplying the citizens with water, the waterworks are not "used for public purposes" within the meaning of section 170, and by section 171 property owned by or on behalf of the public, but "not used for public purposes" is not exempt.

Second. Section 4020, Kentucky Statutes, provides: "All real and personal estate of persons residing in the State, and all corporations organized under laws of this State, whether the property be in or out of the State, including intangible property which shall be considered and estimated in fixing the value of corporate franchises as hereinafter provided, shall be subject to taxation unless the same be exempted from taxation by the Constitution." Section 2980, Kentucky Statutes, provides: "Each city shall raise a revenue from ad valorem taxes and a poll tax, and license fees, and to that end the common council of each city is hereby authorized and empowered to provide each year by ordinance, for the assessment of all real and personal estate within the corporate limit thereof, subject to taxation, for State purposes, and shall levy an ad valorem tax on same," etc. By ordinances duly adopted for each of the years in question, the city levied an ad valorem tax upon "all lands, improvements, personalty and franchises subject to taxation in the city of Louisville." These ordinances were comprehensive enough to embrace the property of the Louisville Water Co. if they would cover the property of any corporation.

Third. So long as the water company maintains a separate corporate existence, owning its corporate property and exercising its franchise, it ought to be managed and maintained as a separate concern, dealing at arm's length with the city on business principles, as other corporations in which the city owns an interest deals with it. No inequality nor injustice to the taxpayers can then occur from the city's operating this private corporation for the benefit mainly of those who can pay for its service.

Fourth. In this suit the city should credit upon appellee's tax bills, the reasonable price of the water it has used for the year for which the tax is being asserted and for which it may have paid. The basis of this credit should be upon just such terms as the court may find from evidence, if the parties can not agree upon it. Credit should be given in the city's tax bills for each years water rent so as to avoid penalties and interest, so far as such water rents may go to extinguish the annual bills.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

The question for decision in this case is whether the property of the Louisville Water Co. is liable for taxation by the city. For five years before the beginning of these suits the water company had not been assessed on any of its property for taxation for city purposes. It claims that its property is exempt from city taxation because the city owns all its stock, or did own all but one or two shares for the years in question. The Louisville Water Co. is a corporation created by an act of the legislature, approved March 6, 1854. Its location, and that of most of its property, is within the city of Louisville. Its business is to furnish water to the citizens of Louisville and vicinity, for which it charges rates based upon the quantity of water used. Many years ago the city, by authority conferred by the legislature and exercised by the city council, subscribed and otherwise acquired the great majority of the capital stock of the corporation, and now owns all of the stock. This stock is owned by the sinking fund commissioners of the city. The water company owes a large bonded debt, secured by mortgage on its plant. The income of the water company is used to pay the expenses of operating and maintaining the plant, then to pay the interest on its bonded debt, and then to provide a sinking fund for the ultimate payment of its debt. Rates to consumers are fixed so as to meet these fixed charges. No dividends are paid on the stock. The plan is and has been to operate the plant so as to place the price of water to consumers at the lowest possible figure. As the net income increases, rates are lowered. The contention of the water company in these cases is, that as the city owns all the stock, it in effect owns the plant; that to tax the plant is to tax the city, which it must pay by levying and collecting other taxes from its taxpayers, thus doing the absurd thing of going to the trouble and expense of taking money from one pocket to put it in the other.

It is not true in law that the owner of all the stock of a corporation owns the property of the corporation. (Dartmoth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat, 518; Fietsam v. Hay, 22 Ill., 293; 3 Am. State Rep., 492; People v. Watertown, 1 Hill, N. Y., 616; State v. Standard Oil Co., 49 Ohio St., 137, 34 Am. St. Rep., 541.)

Even if there was not the weight of authority for the last statement, the city would scarcely want to take the full effect of its contention; for if it did, then it would follow that the company's debt was the city's debt; adding the bonded debt of the water company of about one and one-half millions to the city's other authorized debt might operate to invalidate some of its recent bond issues. If upon a foreclosure of the mortgage upon the water plant it was insufficient to pay the bonded debt, the city would not care to e bound for the balance because it happened to own all the debtor corporaon's stock.

There is another fallacy in appellee's position: This is not an effort to tax ne capital stock or shares of the water company. If it were, then the queson would be here whether the city could tax its own property for its own ses. There is a marked distinction, though, between taxing the property a corporation, and taxing its shares of stock. (Cook on Stock and Stockolders, sections 7, 567; Bank of Commerce v. Tennessee, 161 U. S., 146; ennessee v. Whitworth, 117 U. S., 129.) Cases from other jurisdictions are ted as authority for the proposition that a municipality can not tax its wn property for city purposes. Strictly these cases are made to turn upon ne legislative intent, as, in our opinion, this one must also turn. It is enerally held that unless expressly authorized or directed by statute, it ill not be considered that a municipality was authorized or required to list s own property for taxation for its own purposes.

If it be conceded that taxing the plant of the water company, all the ares of which are owned by the city, is indirectly a taxing by the city of s own property, it brings us directly to consider the source of appellants' ower and the extent of its duty to tax alike all property within its jurisdic-on.

Section 171 of the Constitution of this State requires that taxes "shall be niform upon all property subject to taxation within the territorial limits the authority levying the tax, and all taxes shall be levied and collected general laws."

Section 170 of the same instrument creates and limits the exemptions from xation. It provides: "There shall be exempt from taxation public property sed for public purposes." This is the only reference to property owned by municipality. Property owned by or on behalf of the public, but not used r public purposes, is not exempt. "The express mention of one thing im-lies the exclusion of another" That the water company, if owned by the ty, is public property, is not questioned. But, although its stock is owned the city, and the property is used in supplying the citizens water, the aterworks are not "used for public purposes," within the meaning of secon 170, supra, and are subject to taxation for State and county purposes.
City of Louisville v. Commonwealth, 1 Duv., 295; Negley, Sheriff v. City of enderson, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1394; Same v. Same, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 912; lark, Sheriff v. Louisville Water Co., 90 Ky., 522.) In the case last cited this ourt said, in speaking of the dual character of a city's government, and of roperty owned by it: "A municipal corporation has a double character. In ne it acts strictly in its governmental capacity. In the other for the profit or onvenience of its citizens. Considered in the latter light, it occupies the attude of a private corporation merely, while in the former it is an arm of the tate government, or a part of its political power. It is an imperium in nperio. The property necessary to the exercise of those duties which are rictly governmental is exempt from taxation, but this is not so of that hich is held by the municipality for the comfort of its citizens, individually collectively, or for money-making purposes merely."

Following the requirement of section 171 of the Constitution, which de-nes property subject to taxation for State purposes, the statute is (section 4020, Kentucky Statutes): "All real and personal estate within this State, and all personal estate of persons residing in this State, and of all corporations organized under the laws of this State, whether the property be in or out of this State, including intangible property, which shall be considered and estimated in fixing the value of corporate franchises as hereinafter provided, shall be subject to taxation unless the same be exempted from taxation by the Constitution."

Louisville, a city of the first class, gets its authority for levying and collecting taxes under section 2980, Kentucky Statutes, in which is this provision: "Each city shall raise a revenue from ad valorem taxes, and a poll tax and license fees, and to that end the common council of each city is hereby authorized and empowered to provide each year, by ordinance, for the assessment of all real and personal estate within the corporate limits thereof subject to taxation for State purposes, and shall levy an ad valorem tax on same, not exceeding," etc.

By ordinances duly adopted for each of the years in question, the city levied an ad valorem tax upon "all lands, improvements, personalty and franchises subject to taxation in the city of Louisville."

These ordinances were comprehensive enough to embrace the property of the Louisville Water Co., if it would cover the property of any corporation subject to taxation within the city. It was not necessary to set out each piece of property, or the names of the owners, in the levy ordinance. The office of that ordinance was to fix the rate of taxation. Its subjects had already been fixed by the statute and the Constitution.

Thus we find an express authority for the city's levying this tax. It is made as clear as language could make it, without enumerating the particular property, or its owners. We might leave the case with this statement. But counsel have laid such earnest stress upon the proposition that the act of collecting this tax would be a foolish enterprise, taxing the city's property to support the city government, and, therefore, presumably not within the contemplation of the constitutional convention or the legislature in enacting the provisions above quoted, that we will notice briefly why the convention who framed the Constitution may have employed both the language and the thought we find in the exemption clause quoted from section 170, with the full purpose of having it applied as is here done. Probably the most prominent feature of the present Constitution is its effort to equalize the burdens of government upon all who enjoy its privileges. Class legislation, and special exemptions and rights which amount to that, are strictly forbidden, and guarded against. To grant the exemption claimed by appellee, even if we could by implication enlarge the exemption clause of the Constitution, would of itself work an unjust discrimination in favor of some and against others of the citizens of Louisville who are taxpayers.

It has already been noticed that the water company maintains a separate corporate existence, as if the city owned none of its stock. Only those who consume its water pay for it. Many thousands of citizens who are taxpayers do not patronize the water company at all, but depend for their water supply on private wells and cisterns, or upon the public wells. If the water company is compelled to pay a municipal tax, it must collect the money with which to pay it, not by taxation, but from its water rates—from its ustomers. This will result in those who use that water paying a slightly ncreased rate for it. It may be well supposed that many manufacturing oncerns, the owners of improved property, and the wealthy generally, are atrons of the water company. If the water company were not compelled o pay taxes to the city. it would need just that much less revenue from its ustomers. If this were all, it would not be so bad, though it could scarcely e said that it is just to tax everybody to buy a water plant which less than ll have the whole benefit of. But that is not all. For, the city is com-elled to raise annually by ad valorem taxation so much money to support ts fire department, its public parks, its schools, and its government gen-rally. If one class of property escapes taxation, to the extent of its value ll other classes that are taxed must bear the additional burden. Therefore, f appellee water company is not taxed by the city, an equivalent in the axes it would pay must be paid by other property and citizens. So that hose who do not, by reason of the location or nature of their property or or other cause, patronize the water company, have to pay an additional tax o maintain the city government, in order that those who do patronize the vater company may have cheap water; that would amount to the taking of ne person's property or the benefit of another. If the water company pays axes as other corporations are compelled to do, their sum will be appor-ioned among the various funds, e. g., a certain per cent. for school purposes, o much for police, and so on Thereby those who get the benefit of the vaterworks will contribute to it in rates, in the proportion they use the vater, enabling it to pay all its fixed charges, including taxes. If water vas furnished to everybody alike, by the city, as it does police and fire pro-ection, and the use of its streets, parks and schools, it would be just and roper that the waterworks should be maintained by general taxation, as re the public agencies and institutions named. In that event it would be ruly an idle thing for the city to collect taxes from its water company. The line of thought just presented brings us to this further proposition: If t were not contemplated that a city's property not used for public purposes, ut used as a private corporation, was not to be taxed by the city, on the round that the city would be thereby indirectly taxing itself, and that uch a thing is not to be thought of, then it would follow that if the city wned less than all the capital stock of any corporation within its limits, it hould not tax that corporation; at least, to the extent that it owned stock n it. This would result in the city's not taxing the gas company if it owns tock in it, as it doubtless does. And if its sinking fund commissioners ave invested part of the sinking fund in the stock of a bank within the ity, or in city railway stock, the property of those concerns ought not to e taxed, at least to the extent of the citys' stock. It is a historical fact hat certain of the State's sinking funds have for many years been invested n the shares of certain banks and other corporations in this State. It has ot been urged that on that account those institutions were exempt from tate taxes to any extent. The reason is obvious. Its application and the nalogy to the case in hand are equally clear.

The record discloses that for many years prior to the period of the default, ppellee water company had paid taxes to the city, and charged the city ontract rates for water furnished its various departments. The last contract does not seem to have been renewed, although some of the departments, notably the city schools and park board have been paying their water rates to the water company as heretofore. So long as the water company maintains a separate corporate existence, owning its corporate property and exercising its franchises, it ought to be managed and maintained as a separate concern, dealing at arm's length with the city on business principles as other corporations in which the city owns an interest, deal with it. No inequality among, nor injustice to the taxpayers can then occur from the city's operating this private corporation for the benefit, mainly, of those who can pay for its service.

In this suit the city should credit upon appellee's tax bills the reasonable price of the water it has used for the years for which the tax is being asserted, and for which it may not have paid. The basis of this credit should be upon just such terms as the court may find from evidence, if the parties can not agree upon it. Credit should be given on the city's tax bills for each year's water rents so as to avoid penalties and interest, so far as such water rents may go to extinguish the annual bills.

For the reasons indicated the judgment of the circuit court in the suit against McAteer, &c., refusing the mandamus against the board of equalization to compel them to pass upon the assessment of the water company's property as returned by the assessor, and the judgment of the circuit court in the franchise tax case, dismissing the city's petition, are each reversed, and they are remanded for proceedings consistent herewith.

Judges Paynter and Hobson dissenting.

CARPENTER, &c. v. TOWN OF CENTRAL COVINGTON.

(Filed June 18, 1904.)

1. Taxation—Special act—Road district—Turnpikes — Construction —Indebtedness—Fiscal court—Authority—Where a special act was passed in 1890, creating a road district in Kenton county, which was not to be operative in certain towns therein, and providing for the issuing of bonds to pay for the building of turnpikes therein, the bonds to be paid by taxation, one-half by the taxpayers owning property within one mile of the pike, and the other half by the balance of the county outside of the exempted towns, the fiscal court of Kenton county, under the present Constitution and Statutes, has the right to levy a tax on the respective districts named in the act, to pay said indebtedness.

2. Uniform taxation—Separate tax on each district—The fiscal court has no right to refuse to levy a separate tax on the road district for its half of the indebtedness, and instead, levy the whole sum on the county outside of the exempted towns, where, by the act, one-half of the burden should have been borne by the road district in which the turnpike was built. The requirement of section 171 of the Constitution means, that all taxes shall be uniform upon all property subject to taxation within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax.

3. Levy—Specifications—Purpose — Territory—Constitutionality—The authorities in levying the tax must specify the purpose for which it is levied; and when only a special district is liable for the tax, the levy should be so made as to indicate the territory on which it is to be made. In this way inct levies may be made by the same municipal authorities on different ricts, when necessary to meet their obligations, and there is nothing in Constitution forbidding this to be done.

Same—Bonds—The fact that under Kentucky Statutes, section 914, new ds have been issued by the Kenton county authorities for the old bonds t were issued under the act of 1890, payable in thirty years, does not inidate the new bonds, and the taxes authorized by the act of 1890, must evied on the districts named in said act to pay the new bonds.

Extending town boundary—Effect on territory admitted—Since the ption of the present Constitution, the town of Central Covington which xempt from paying the turnpike tax by the act of 1890, has extended its its under Kentucky Statutes, section 3664, taking in the property of the ellants which lay outside of any of the road districts, but within Kenton nty, and appellants claim that as the town had annexed them and they e required to pay town taxes, the town must assume their liability for turnpike tax. Held—That the town of Central Covington was expressly mpted by the act of 1890 from its operation; and when appellant's prop-y was annexed to said town it became a part thereof for all purposes, l, as to all liabilities thereafter created, stood just like the rest of the n. It is not liable, therefore, to taxation for the construction of a pike dertaken after the annexation, although it is liable for taxation for all se undertaken before its annexation. The territory annexed, being unin-porated territory, the town of Central Covington assumed no obligation annexing it under the statute.

Appeal from Kenton Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

By an act of May 13, 1890, the general assembly made all of Kenton county tside of the cities of Covington, Central Covington, West Covington and dlow, a district for the construction of turnpikes. The provisions of the t were not operative within the limits of the cities named, but applied to the rest of the county. The act allowed the creation of a road district the construction of a turnpike road to extend on each side one mile m the proposed road. It required the road and district benefited to be rveyed, and the persons owning property therein to be ascertained. When e cost of construction was determined, the board of county commissioners s required to issue ten bonds of the county of equal amounts for the gregate cost of the pike, payable in one, two, three, four, five, six, seven, ght, nine and ten years respectively, to be sold for not less than par, and e proceeds to be applied to pay for the construction of the road. The unty commissioners were required annually for ten years to levy a tax on property in the road district liable for assessment for State taxation, fficient to pay one-half of the bond and one-half of the interest on the nds due the following year. They were also required to levy annually for n years a tax upon all the property in Kenton county outside of the cities med, sufficient to pay the other half of the bonds as they fell due and the terest on the bonds. After the act went into effect a number of turnpikes ere built in Kenton county under its provisions, and bonds to pay for them were issued and sold as provided in the act. Subsequent to this, and after the new Constitution took effect, the town of Central Covington, extended its limits under section 3664, Kentucky Statutes, taking in appellants' property which lay outside of any of the road districts, but within Kenton county, and outside of the cities excepted from the operation of the act. Appellants then brought this suit against the town of Central Covington upon the idea that, as the town had annexed them and they were required to pay town taxes, the town must assume their liability for the turnpike tax. The question turns upon the proper construction of the statute, which is as follows: "The judgment shall, when entered, be certified to the legislative board of the city, who may thereupon annex to or strike from the city or town the territory described in the judgment, and such territory shall become, or cease to become, as the case amy be, a part of the town. But the persons owning the territory so annexed, nor the territory, shall be liable for any indebtedness of said town created prior to said annexation, nor shall any town assess or collect taxes on said property in said territory to pay any part of said indebtedness or liability." (Section 3666, Kentucky Statutes.)

"If any incorporated town be annexed to another, the town annexing the territory of another shall be bound for all debts and liabilities, and shall be the owner of all the corporate property, franchises and rights of such municipal corporation." (Section 3667, Kentucky Statutes.)

As the town has the option whether or not it will annex the territory sought to be taken in, it is provided that such territory shall not be liable for the payment of any indebtedness or liability created prior to the annexation; for it would be unjust to allow a town to create a debt and after it had received the benefit of the expenditure, annexed other territory against its consent and thus impose on it a liability for indebtedness already incurred. It is also provided that if an incorporated town be annexed to another, the town so annexing the other shall be bound for all its debts and liabilities and shall be the owner of all its corporate property. But this provision only applies where the existence of one corporation is merged in the other, and as the annexing town has the option to annex or not, it may not take in the other town where it is unwilling to assume its liabilities. This provision has no application where unincorporated territory is taken in by annexation. It only applies to the corporate debts and corporate property of "such municipal corporation" where one corporation is taken into another. The territory annexed in this case was unincorporated, and, therefore, the town of Central Covington assumed no obligation in annexing it under the statute. But it is insisted that the statute is in conflict with section 171 of the Constitution. This brings us to the second point raised in the case which will now be considered, in determining the meaning of section 171 of the Constitution.

After the present Constitution took effect, the county authorities of Kenton county, on the idea that all taxes levied by them must be uniform within the territorial limits of their authority, ceased to levy any taxes on the road districts in which the turnpikes were built, and levied the entire tax on the county of Kenton outside of the cities named. This placed upon appellants' property, which was not within any of the road districts, the ntire burden of the tax to pay the bonds; whereas by the act of 1890, under vhich the debt was created, one-half of the burden should have been borne by the road district in which the turnpike was built. Appellants complain of this increase of their burdens and it is insisted for appellees that section 171 of the Constitution required the county authorities to follow the plan they pursued. That section is as follows: "The general assembly shall provide by law an annual tax which, with other resources, shall be sufficient to defray the estimated expenses of the Commonwealth for each fiscal year. Taxes shall be levied and collected for public purposes only. They shall be uniform upon all property subject to taxation within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax; and all taxes shall be levied and collected by general laws."

It is reasonably clear from the Constitution that it was not intended by its makers to affect in any way indebtedness already incurred, or obligations already assumed by any of the municipalities of the State. In section 158, limiting the indebtedness of municipal corporations there is this proviso: "Provided any city, town, county, taxing district or other municipality may contract an indebtedness in excess of such limitation when the same has been authorized under laws in force prior to the adoption of this Constitution, or when necessary for the completion of and payment for a public improvement undertaken and not completed and paid for at the time of the adoption of this Constitution."

By section 2 of the schedule all obligations and other instruments entered into before the adoption of the Constitution to the State or any subdivision thereof, and all actions and causes of action, except as therein provided, shall continue and remain unaffected by the adoption of the Constitution. The act of May 13, 1890, had been submitted to the people and had been put into operation by a majority vote. By it, as shown, one-half the liability was placed on the road district and one half on the county district. There is nothing in the Constitution evincing a purpose to shift the obligation of one district to the other; on the contrary, it carefully takes away from the officers of municipalities the power to incur liabilities beyond the income or revenue of each year, without a vote of the people; and under its provisions the county of Kenton could not, without popular consent, assume the liability of the road districts. Among other things, section 157 provides: "No county, city, town, taxing district, or other municipality shall be authorized or permitted to become indebted, in any manner or for any purpose, to an amonut exceeding, in any year, the income and revenue provided for such year, without the assent of two-thirds of the voters thereof, voting at an election to be held for that purpose; and any indebtedness contracted in violation of this section shall be void. Nor shall such contract be enforceable by the person with whom made; nor shall such municipality ever be authorized to assume the same."

But aside from all this, the requirement of section 171 that taxes shall be uniform upon all property subject to taxation within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax, has no such meaning as supposed. In the case before us if the act of 1890 had directed that the bonds of the road district should be issued for one-half the cost of the pike, and the bonds of the county for the other half; that the county commissioners should make a levy on the taxable property of the road district to meet its bonds; and that they should make a similar levy on the property of the county to meet its bonds: the case would not be in substance different from that presented; for the obligation of the road district to pay one-half the debt is just as clear as if different bonds in fact had been issued. The road district is created by the act a quasi corporation and as such owed one-half the debt. The fact that the bonds were all issued in the name of the county was a mere matter of form, not affecting the substance of the transaction. If several districts of a county become indebted and issue bonds, a tax may be levied on these districts to pay the debt which they owe, although a similar tax is not levied on other parts of the county which do not owe the debt. The reason is that only property in these districts is subject to taxation for the purposes of these debts and the constitutional requirement is only that taxes shall be uniform upon all property subject to taxation within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax. In levying such a tax the county authorities act as the representatives of the people within the district which created the debt and the tax is uniform on all of them and on all property subject to taxation within the limits of the district. When, therefore, a town boundary is contracted the town authorities may still levy a tax on the old boundary for the debts created and at the same time levy in addition other taxes for current expenses and the like on the boundary left within the town. In the same way when a town boundary is extended tax to pay the existing indebtedness must be levied upon the old boundary. In other words, taxes for a specific purpose may be levied on the property which is taxable for that purpose and must be uniform throughout the district which is liable for the tax. But there is nothing in the Constitution to require that a municipality as a whole must levy taxes on the property of its entire territory to pay a debt for which the property in only one district of it is legally taxable. In section 180 of the Constitution it is provided: "Every act enacted by the general assembly, and every ordinance and resolution passed by any county, city, town or municipal board or local legislative body, levying a tax, shall specify distinctly the purpose for which said tax is levied; and no tax levied and collected for one purpose shall ever be devoted to another purpose."

The purpose of this provision is to protect the people in such states of case as above indicated. The authorities levying the tax must specify the purpose for which it is levied, and when only a special district is liable for the tax, the levy should be so made as to indicate the territory on which it is levied. In this way distinct levies may be made by the same municipal authorities on different districts when necessary to meet their obligations, and there is nothing in the Constitution forbidding this to be done. (Board of Education v. Louisville, &c., Ry. Co., 23 Ky. Law Rep., 376; Chambers v. Adair, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 373.)

We, therefore, conclude that the statute above quoted as to the liabilities of the town when territory is annexed is constitutional, and that the course pursued by the Kenton county authorities in levying the tax to pay the bonds entirely on the county district, was unauthorized. The act of May 13, 1890, is still in force. In O'Mahoney v. Bullock, 97 Ky., 774, this court had fore it the question whether a similar local act of May 8, 1890, for the ben-it of Fayette county was in force, and it was held that the act was not re-aled by the new Constitution, or by the acts passed in 1892, 1893 and 1894.

Pierce v Mason County, 99 Ky., 357, the same question was presented as a similar act in force in Mason county, and it was again held that such cal legislation was still in force. In that case the court said: "In order at no inconvenience might arise by reason of the alterations and amend-ents of the law by that instrument, it was deemed proper to provide that e Constitution left in force all laws of the Commonwealth with which it as not inconsistent. This provision, instead of emphasizing the alleged licy of hostility to existing special legislation, expressly continued it in rce unless inconsistent with the Constitution; and when it is admitted or comes manifest that a local or special act is not inconsistent with the nstitution, and has not been repealed by a general law, the question is ttled and the law stands. The positive mandate is against local and ecial legislation in the future, and, even if we concede that the Constituon breathes a spirit of hostility to past legislation of that class, it is exessly continued in force until repealed in the manner we have heretofore inted out."

The only legislation on the subject since these decisions were rendered is e "act to provide free turnpike and gravel roads," approved March 17, 96, the last section of which contains these words: "This act shall not real any local act or acts for any county or counties in this Commonwealth hich have been heretofore passed in aid of free turnpikes, but shall be an

The legislature thus plainly left in force all local acts on the subject. In chardson v. Boske, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1209, and the other cases following we had before us different statutory provisions, and it was held that the w legislation repealed the old provisions; but that conclusion can not be stained here as the old legislation is expressly left in force. But the act May 8, 1890, expressly excepted out of its operation the town of Central vington, and when appellants' property was annexed to the town it ame a part of the town for all purposes, and as to all liabilities thereer created stood just like the rest of the town. It is not liable, therefore, taxation for the construction of a pike undertaken after the annexation, hough it is liable to taxation for all those undertaken before its annexa-
n. The annexation of the territory to the town did not affect its existing bilities, but by its annexation it was taken into a municipality in which act of 1890 was not operative and, therefore, it is not subject, under that , to taxation where no liability had attached before its annexation. After annexation to the town it must pay taxes for municipal purposes and it not thereafter be made liable for improvements subsequently under-en in the county district under an act which is not operative as to it.

Section 914, Kentucky Statutes, provides: "Whenever any county, under s heretofore enacted, has issued bonds for turnpike road purposes, such nty may issue bonds in lieu thereof to mature in not more than thirty rs after their date, and bearing interest at not greater rate than such nds already issued; and any new bonds hereafter issued by any county for h purposes under such laws may be made to mature in like manner and r such interest.

"Taxes authorized by such laws heretofore enacted may be levied and collected as may be necessary to pay bonds or interest thereon issued as provided in this act. But this act shall not affect any law under which bonds for turnpike purposes are authorized to be issued, having a longer time than thirty years from their dates to mature."

After the passage of this statute the Kenton county authorities issued bonds under it, payable in thirty years, and took in the bonds issued under the act of 1890. It is insisted that this was unauthorized. But the bonds issued under the act of 1890 had been issued by Kenton county and were county bonds within the meaning of the statute quoted. We, therefore, conclude that the new bonds are valid, but that taxes authorized by the act of 189) must be levied and collected to pay the new bonds. The only purpose of the statute was to authorize bonds issued for a longer time. The second clause evinces a clear purpose not to change the burden of taxation in any way. (Catlettsburg v. Self, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 164.)

The board of commissioners of Kenton county have been abolished and their duties have been imposed upon the fiscal court. The fiscal court may, therefore, make such levies or perform such duties as the board of commissioners might have made or performed under the original act. The appellants have not been guilty of laches barring them of relief in equity. In so far as they have paid taxes they are without remedy, but each year's tax is a separate cause of action and the payment of the tax for one year does not bar the right to contest that for another year. The court should ascertain on final hearing how much of the taxes sued for, appellants should pay. In the condition of affairs they are not required to make a tender of any amount, as they can not know how much they are required to tender. A man is not required to make a tender in a case of this sort in order to obtain an injunction where he is unable to know how much he owes.

The judgment dismissing the petition as to the town of Central Covington is affirmed, but the judgment in favor of Kenton county is reversed, and on the return of the case to the circuit court the sheriff of the county and the members of the fiscal court will be made defendants to the action by an amended petition to be filed by the plaintiffs, and the court will, on final hearing enter such orders and judgments as will direct the officers in the discharge of their duties, and ascertain and determine how much of the taxes in controversy plaintiff should pay under the principles above indicated, and require the money paid to the sheriff.

WHEATLEY v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed June 18, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Homicide—Instructions—Malice—Shooting at one and killing another—Where the defendant in shooting at D., with whom he was engaged in a difficulty, but missed D. and killed W., who was a bystander, an instruction telling the jury that in order to find the defendant guilty of murder it was necessary for them to believe that appellant had malice toward and shot at W., was erroneous.

2. Same—Willful or intentional killing—Where, in an indictment against defendant for killing W., who was a bystander, and was killed by a shot intended for D., it was a prejudicial error in the instruction of the court, to require the jury to find that appellant shot at and killed W. in a sudden affray with him, or as the result of sudden heat and passion entertained by appellant toward W., whereas the sudden heat and passion, if any, which superinduced the shooting was entertained toward D. for whom the ball was intended that killed W. This instruction was further erroneous in that it omitted to tell the jury that in order to convict appellant of voluntary manslaughter, the killing must have been willful or intentional; that is, appellant must have purposely shot at D. when he fired the shot that killed W. and by killing W. he is liable to the same extent as though he had killed D.

3. Self-defense—Where appellant admits that he began the difficulty with D. by throwing a rock at him, and denies that he shot at D., or at all, or that he had a pistol, there is nothing upon which to base an instruction for self-defense and none should have been given.

Irwin & Irwin and R. L. Stith for appellant.

N. B. Hays and Loraine Mix for appellee.

Appeal from Hardin Circuit Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

Appellant was indicted in the court below for the murder of Wallace Wintersmith, but upon being tried he was convicted of voluntary manslaughter, and his punishment fixed, by verdict of the jury and judgment of the court, at confinement in the penitentiary for twenty-one years. From that judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

Only two of the numerous grounds for a new trial urged by appellant in the court below are now relied on by his counsel for a reversal, viz.: First, that the court erred in the instructions given the jury; second, in failing to give an instruction upon the law of self-defense. In determining the soundness or unsoundness of these contentions, recourse must be had to the evidence adduced at the trial. The evidence conduces to show that appellant began a difficulty on the streets of Elizabethtown with one Gus Dowell by throwing a rock at him. Appellant himself admits that fact, and one witness testified to having heard appellant make a threat against Dowell, on a previous occasion. According to the evidence the shooting and killing of Wintersmith occurred immediately following the throwing of the rock by appellant at Dowell. As to whether the shooting was done by appellant or Dowell the evidence was conflicting, that of the Commonwealth conducing to prove that the shooting was done by appellant. Upon the other hand the evidence introduced by appellant, including his own testimony, tends to show that it was done by Dowell. But the contention of the Commonwealth that the shooting was done altogether by appellant and at Dowell is supported by the greater number of witnesses. There is no doubt from the evidence that one of the shots fired on that occasion struck and killed Wintersmith, a disinterested and unoffending party who was on his way from a "merry-go-round" that was being operated in the neighborhood. He was shot from the left side and behind, the ball ranging forward, and was at the time not far from a line between Dowell and appellant, who were about forty-five feet apart. The position of Wintersmith, about which there is no dispute, as well as the manner in which the bullet entered his body, made it impossible for Dowell, who was in front of him, to have shot him. It does not appear from the evidence that either appellant or Dowell had anything against Wintersmith, and the only reason that can be assigned for his being shot, is that appellant in the dark (it was then night) either mistook him for Dowell, or in attempting to shoot the latter missed him, and by accident shot and killed Wintersmith.

From the foregoing facts it is manifest that appellant was not entitled to an instruction upon the law of self-defense. Such an instruction is never proper in the total absence of testimony upon which to base it. In this case there is absolutely no evidence tending to show that appellant acted in self-defense. In fact he denies that he shot at Dowell, or at all, or that he had on that occasion a pistol, and moreover, admits that he began the difficulty with Dowell by throwing a rock at him. There is no evidence conducing in any degree to show that after thus beginning the difficulty with Dowell, appellant, in good faith, or otherwise, abandoned or withdrew therefrom, or that after such withdrawal the difficulty was renewed by Dowell. Under no other state of case could appellant, after bringing on the difficulty, have availed himself of the right of self-defense.

We do not regard Morris v. Commonwealth, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 408, relied on by counsel for appellant, as an authority in point. It is true the Morris case was reversed because of the failure of the trial court to give an instruction on the law of self-defense, but an examination of that case will show that the facts are wholly unlike those of the case at bar. In that case, Philpot, after beginning a difficulty with Bundy, shot and killed him, in doing which Morris, who was the son-in-law of Bundy, according to the evidence of the Commonwealth, shot Philpot, who thereafter died of the wound.

The testimony of Morris and his witnesses tended to show that after Philpot shot Bundy, he turned and fired at Morris, who then attempted to shoot Philpot, but his pistol snapped and he did not do so, and that Philpot was in fact shot by Bundy after he was mortally wounded by Philpot. Upon the facts thus shown it was said by this court: "From the testimony of the appellant and his witnesses the defendant had a right to shoot Philpot in his own necessary defense. Defendant's testimony to the effect that he did not shoot Philpot does not deprive him of the right to have the jury instructed upon the question of his right to shoot Philpot in defense of Bundy. The jury might have believed the testimony introduced by the Commonwealth, that the appellant did fire the shot, and they might have further believed from the testimony in the case that he shot to save the life of Bundy, or in his own self defense. The evidence introduced by himself, independent of his testimony, is sufficient to require the court to give an instruction to the jury upon the question of his right to shoot to save the life of Bundy and in his self-defense."

We apprehend that no case can be found in which it has been held by a court of last resort that it is proper to give the defendant the benefit of the law of self-defense, upon such a state of facts as are found in this case. Of the instructions given by the trial court, No. 1 advised the jury as to the state of facts that would authorize them to find the appellant guilty of murder. It is, however, incorrect in so far as it told the jury that in order to find appellant guilty of murder it was necessary for them to believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that he had malice toward, and shot at Wallace Wintersmith. There was nothing in the evidence conducing to show that appellant entertained either malice or anger toward Wintersmith, or that he shot at or intended to shoot him. Upon the contrary, if the shooting was the result of malice, Dowell was the person for whom he entertained the malice, and at whom he shot. But if in shooting at Dowell appellant missed him and shot and killed Wintersmith, the killing of the latter under such circumstances, if done with malice toward Dowell, and not in self-defense, was murder.

We would not be willing to reverse the judgment of the lower court for the error in the foregoing instruction alone, for it is apparent that it was not prejudicial to the appellant, as the jury did not find him guilty of murder as authorized by that instruction, but of voluntary manslaughter. We are of opinion, however, that instruction No. 2, which told the jury in what state of case they might find appellant guilty of voluntary manslaughter, was not only erroneous but prejudicial as well. Under this instruction, in order to make the killing of Wintersmith voluntary manslaughter, the jury were required to believe what the evidence shows was not true: that is that appellant shot at and killed Wintersmith in a sudden affray with him or as the result of sudden heat and passion entertained by appellant toward him. Whereas, the sudden heat and passion of appellant, if any such, superinduced the shooting, was entertained toward Dowell, for whom the ball that was received by Wintersmith was intended. This instruction contained a further prejudicial error, in that it omitted to tell the jury that in order to convict the appellant of voluntary manslaughter, the homicide must have been willful, or intentional. For to constitute that crime in this case, appellant must have willfully, that is, purposely, shot at Dowell, when he fired at him the shot that killed Wintersmith. Manifestly it is true that if appellant unlawfully and willfully, in a sudden affray, or in sudden heat and passion and not in his necessary or apparently necessary self-defense, shot at Dowell, but the shot intended for him hit and killed Wintersmith, he would be just as guilty of voluntary manslaughter as if he had shot and killed Dowell.

Voluntary manslaughter is "the unlawful, intentional killing of another without malice." (4 Blackstone, 192.)

In Montgomery v. Commonwealth, this court, in an opinion by Chief Justice Burnam, handed down June 14, 1904, (ante, 856), said: "It is essential to the commission of voluntary manslaughter that the homicide should have been intentionally committed." * * *

Instructions 3 and 4 seem to be correct. But in lieu of instructions 1 and 2, the lower court upon a retrial should give the following: If the jury believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant, Wes. Wheatley, in Hardin county, and before the finding of the indictment, did unlawfully, willfully and feloniously, not in his necessary or apparently necessary self-defense, shoot at Gus Dowell with a pistol loaded with powder and leaden balls, but that the ball or balls so shot at said Dowell did miss him, and instead then and there strike and kill Wallace Wintersmith, they should find defendant guilty—that is guilty of murder, if they believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the shooting was done with malice aforethought. Or of voluntary manslaughter if they believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that it was done in a sudden affray, or in sudden heat and passion, and without previous malice.

If they find the defendant guilty of murder, the jury should fix his punishment at death or confinement in the penitentiary for life, in their discretion. But if they find him guilty of voluntary manslaughter, they should fix his punishment at confinement in the penitentiary not less than two, nor more than twenty-one years, in their discretion.

For the reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with directions to the lower court to grant appellant a new trial, and for further proceedings consistent with the opinion.

Whole court sitting.

WILKERSON v. PHILLIPS, SUR. PART., &c.

(Filed June 18, 1904.)

1. Attachment—Interest of debtor in estate of decedent—Proceeding on nulla bona—Sufficiency of endorsement on summons and attachment—Lien created—In an action by a creditor against a debtor upon a return of nulla bona, alleging that a certain relative of the debtor had died, leaving him one of her next of kin and entitled by inheritance to a certain portion of her property, and that no personal representative had been appointed to administer the estate, and that in addition to the interest which the debtor took by inheritance, decedent held certain moneys and bonds to which the debtor was now entitled, and prayed for a judgment against him, and that he be restrained from disposing of any interest held by him in decedent's estate, and calling on him to answer and show what property or interest he had in the estate of said decedent. Summons and attachment were issued endorsed as follows: "The object of this action is to garnishee any funds or property in the estate, or possession of the estate of Mrs. C. B. McClure, deceased, belonging to R. L. McClure, and to restrain you and the personal representative of said decedent from paying over same to R. L. McClure, or any one for him, and to restrain him from disposing of same until the further order of the Warren Circuit Court." Copies of which were served on the debtor and also on the administrator who qualified after the filing of the petition. Held—That as against a subsequent attaching creditor the plaintiff in the first action was entitled to a prior lien on the interest of the debtor in the estate of said decedent, as the petition plainly recites that the purpose of the suit was to subject the interest of the debtor, R. L. McClure, in the estate of the decedent, Mrs. C. B. McClure. What that interest actually was, required a settlement of the estate of the decedent, and when this was ascertained the equitable lien of the plaintiff attached thereto.

J. G. Covington and J. B. Grider for appellant.

W. B. Gaines and Samuel D. Hines for appellees.

Appeal from Warren Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The issue in this case is the priority of liens between two attaching creditors of R. L. McClure. On the 5th day of September, 1902, the appellee, as surviving partner of H. C. Hines & Co., brought her action in the Warrent Circuit Court against R. L. McClure, upon a return of nulla bona. After reciting her judgment and return of nulla bona endorsed on the execution which issued thereon, she alleged that on the —— day of September, 1902, Mrs. C. B. McClure had died a resident of Warren county, the owner of certain property, leaving the defendant, R. L. McClure, one of her next of kin and entitled by inheritance to a certain portion of the property; and that no personal representative had been appointed to administer the estate; that in addition to the interest which R. L. McClure took by inheritance, decedent held the possession of certain moneys, and bonds, to which he was now entitled, and prayed for a judgment against him, and that he be restrained from disposing of any interest held by him in decedent's estate, or any money or other property held by her or in her possession at the time of her death, and he was called upon to answer and show what property or interest he had in the estate of decedent. Summons and attachment issued, upon which were endorsed these words: "The object of this action is to garnishee any funds or property in the estate or possession of the estate of Mrs. C. B. McClure, deceased, belonging to R. L. McClure, and to restrain you and the personal representative of said decedent from paying over same to R. L. McClure, or any one for him and to restrain him from disposing of same until further order of the Warren Circuit Court."

Copies of these processes were served on R. L. McClure, and also upon J. C. Sims. R. L. McClure failed to answer, but on the 6th of October, 1902, James C. Sims filed an answer, in which he stated that he was not, at the time the order of attachment was served upon him, the personal representative of Mrs. C. B. McClure, but that he had in his hands $118.25, which belonged to the estate. On the 26th of November, 1903, he filed an additional answer, in which he stated that on the 16th of October, 1902, he had been duly appointed and had qualified as administrator of the estate of Mrs. C. B. McClure, deceased, and that he had in his hands due to the defendant, R. L. McClure, from the estate of Mrs. C. B. McClure, $537.13, as shown by his settlement as administrator on the 20th of October, 1902. The appellant, James H. Wilkerson, on the 20th of October, 1902, after J. C. Sims had been appointed and qualified as administrator of Mrs. C. B. McClure, filed his petition in equity in the Warren Circuit Court against R. L. McClure and J. C. Sims, administrator, to enforce the payment of four promissory notes executed to him by R. L. McClure for $250 each, and at the same time took out a general attachment against the interest of R. L. McClure in the estate of Mrs. C. B. McClure, which was served upon R. L. McClure and Sims, as administrator. J. C. Sims filed an answer in the suit of Wilkerson v. R. L. McClure, similar to that filed in the action of Mrs. Phillips. The cases were consolidated by order of the circuit court and heard together, and a judgment rendered giving Mrs. Phillips a prior lien upon the interest of R. L. McClure, and Wilkerson has appealed, and asks a reversal of the judgment of the lower court upon the ground that the interest of R. L. McClure in the estate of C. B. McClure sought to be subjected by the appellee, Phillips, was not described in the petition, with sufficient accuracy and certainty as to create a lis pendens lien upon the funds sought to be subjected.

As a general proposition, the doctrine of notice by lis pendens only extends to equitable suits which involve the title to land, or which are brought to establish an equitable estate, interest or right in land, or to enforce a lien, incumbrance or charge thereon; and does not extend to suits concerning personal property, as there is no necessity for invoking the rule in such litigation under ordinary circumstances. (Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, sections 635 and 636.) But this court in a number of opinions has recognized the right of a creditor by petition in equity to subject a known and described equity and hold this remedy is unaffected by sections 439 and 442 of the Civil Code. In Parsons v. Meyburg, &c., 62 Ky., 207, the court said: "It seems to this court that the provision of the Code regulating proceedings and attachment on bills of discovery and subjection of property after the return of 'no property' on an execution, do not apply to a petition in equity for the subjection of an equity known and described, or for enforcing an equitable lien. Any such proceeding in rem operates as a lien without a formal attachment. And consequently, the pre-existing law authorizing and regulating such proceedings is not inconsistent with the modern law regulating attachments. Wherefore, the common law lien of the appellees, who first sued in rem, was superior to the subsequent attachment lien of appellants."

This case was followed by Murphy, &c. v. Cochran's Trustee, 80 Ky., 289, in which it was said: "In an action on a return of no property, where the proceeding is to subject property specifically described, no attachment levy is necessary to give a lien as against the defendant in the action. The lien is an incident to such a proceeding in equity, and independent of the Code.

"Section 442 of the Code was not intended to interfere with such liens, but to enlarge the power of a court of equity in the subjection of property to the satisfaction of an ascertained debt, where a proceeding for discovery is necessary. In such case a general attachment may be issued, the levy of which will create a lien; or a lien may be created by the service of a summons, with the object of the action indorsed thereon, on the person holding or controlling the defendant's property. In this case the main object of the action being to subject the property in controversy, and it being sufficiently described in order to identification, an equitable lien was created as against the debtor by the filing of the petition and service of summons."

It is not necessary that the petition should describe specifically each bond, note or chose in action in which the estate is invested. The averments of the bill must, however, be so definite that any one on reading it, can learn what property was intended to be made the subject of the litigation.

In this case the petition plainly recites that the purpose of the suit was to subject the interest of R. L. McClure in the estate of Mrs. C. B. McClure, deceased. What that interest actually was, required a settlement of the estate of decedent, and when this was ascertained, the equitable lien of appellee attached thereto. As the judgment of the chancellor is in conformity with this view, it is affirmed.

tion of the will of Richard Skinner, deceased, the father of Mrs. Sims, which was duly probated by the Jefferson County Court on the 26th of January, 1904. The will reads as follows:

"January 25, 1897.

"I, Richard E Skinner, of the county of Jefferson, State of Kentucky, being of sound mind and disposing memory, do make my last will and testament in manner and form following: After all my just debts and funeral expenses have been paid, I give and bequeath to my daughter, Ida A. Skinner Sims, and her children, all of my property, real, personal and mixed. I appoint H. H. Sims sole executor of this my last will and testament without bond as I have confidence in him.

"This is in my own handwriting, and needs no witness. In testimony whereof I hereunto set my hand and seal, and publish and decree this to be my last will and testament.

"This January 25th, in the year of our Lord, one thousand, eight hundred and ninety-seven.

(Signed) "RICHARD E. SKINNER."

It is alleged in the petition that testator, at the date of the will, and also at the time of his death, was a widower; and that the plaintiff, Mrs. Sims, was his only child; that at the death of testator and the probate of his will, she had four living children, aged respectively eight, six, four and two years; that the estate left by testator consisted of real estate situated in Jefferson county of the value of about $30,000, and personal estate of the value of about $20,000; that Mrs. Sims at the date of the will in January, 1897, was a young married woman with one child. It is also alleged that under the will, the plaintiff, Mrs. Ida Sims, took an estate for life in all the property of testator, with remainder in fee to her children, and asked that the court might so adjudge. A guardian ad litem was appointed to represent the infant defendants, who filed a general demurrer to the petition, which was overruled, and it was adjudged by the chancellor that Mrs. Sims took a life estate in all the property disposed of by the will, with remainder to her children living at the time of the death of testator, and such other afterborn children as she might thereafter have, with right in Mrs. Sims during her life to receive the rents, income and profits from the estate devised. The guardian ad litem has brought the case up for review, and insists that it was the intention of testator to devise his estate to his daughter and, her four children living at the time of his death, jointly.

In Koenig, &c. v. Craft, &c., 9 Ky. Law Rep., 945, a testator devised all of his estate to "his wife and her only child's sole use and benefit." These words were held to vest a life estate in the wife, with remainder to the child. In that case this court said: "While gifts and conveyances to a wife and child, under the ordinary rule would create a joint tenancy, the courts in the construction of such instruments, when executed by the husband to the wife and children, are always inclined to consider the instrument as creating an estate for life in the wife, with remainder to the child; and where there is any language used in the instrument from which an inference of such intention appears, the chancellor will decline to follow the ordinary rule making them joint tenants."

In Mefford v. Dougherty, 89 Ky., 58, the testator devised to his "son and to his children, the heirs of his body," a tract of land; and it was decided that the son took a life estate and his children a remainder. In Mitchell v.

on, 88 Ky., 125, the devise was to "my daughter and her bodily above have established a different rule of construction for gifts from er to his daughter and her children, or to a son and his children, or husband to a wife and children. The reason for the difference is ly stated in the case of Adams v. Adams, quoted supra, and its wisis very strikingly exemplified in the case at bar. At the date of the controversy Mrs. Sims had only one child, while at the date of its pro-

, she had four. If testator had died immediately after the execution of ill, his daughter would have taken an undivided half of his estate, if she had taken at the date of its probation, her interest would be re-to one-fifth, and might, in the event of afterborn children, be still er reduced. It would be well nigh impossible, under any other rule of ruction, to effectuate the intention of a father or husband to provide daughter or wife and living and afterborn children alike.

The seventh clause of the will of George C. Brooks is as follows: "That e balance of my property, real, personal and mixed, go to my sister, Brooks; and that she have same; but should she die without issue eave any of the property at her death, given by this will, then in that my sister, Sallie Galloway, and her children have said property."
—That the testator intended to invest his sister, Susan Brooks, now Durham, with the right to appropriate the entire estate which passed under said clause, if she so desired, and the power to sell and convey his purpose is necessarily inferred, and she thereby became invested the fee, and with full power to convey a fee-simple title.

L. Greene and H. C. Martin for appellants.

M. Payton for appellee.

Appeal from Hart Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

This action was brought in the Hart Circuit Court for a construction of the seventh clause of the will of George C. Brooks, which is as follows: "That all the balance of my property, real, personal and mixed, go to my sister, Susan Brooks; and that she have same; but should she die without issue and leave any of the property at her death, given her by this will, then in that event, my sister, Sallie Galloway, and her children have said property."

After the probation of the will, Susan Brooks was married to J. R. Durham, and it is her contention that she takes an absolute fee-simple title in the real estate, with power to sell and convey a perfect title. The defendants in their answer, claim that plaintiff's interest in the property was a defeasible fee, subject to be defeated by her death without issue. It was adjudged by the lower court that plaintiff was the owner in fee simple of the several tracts of land, which she took under the will; and that she had the right to sell and convey a fee-simple title thereto; and that defendants, Sallie Galloway and her children, took no vested interest in remainder thereunder, and they have appealed. The decision of the question arising upon the appeal, turns upon the meaning which is to be given to the words: "But should she die without issue and leave any property at her death given her by this will, then, in that event, my sister, Sallie Galloway, and her children have said property." Whilst the clause of the will under consideration does not, in express terms confer upon appellee the power to sell and convey the real estate therein devised, this follows by necessary implication, if we are to attach any meaning to the words, "leave any of the property at her death given by this will." And it is a well settled rule of construction of wills that an estate may pass by mere implication without any express words to direct its course. (2 Blackstone's Com., 381.)

"Necessary implication means, not natural necessity, but so strong a probability of intention that an intention contrary to that which is imputed to the testator, can not be supposed." (1 Vess & B., 468.)

We, therefore, conclude that testator intended to invest the apppellee with the right, if she saw fit to appropriate the entire state which passed to her under the 7th clause of his will, if she so desired; and the power to sell and convey for this purpose is necessarily inferred. This being true, it follows, under numerous decisions of this court, that appellee became thereby invested with the fee and with full power to convey a fee simple title. This question is fully considered and discussed in Barth v. Barth, 18 Ky. Law Rep., 840; Clay v. Chenault, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1485; Ray v. Spears' Ex'or, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1838; Cox v. Anderson's Adm'r, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 721; Humphrey v. Potter, &c., 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1264. And these decisions are in conformity with the public policy of the State as announced in section 2342 of the Kentucky Statutes.

For reasons indicated the judgment is affirmed.

HAMILTON, JR. v. YOUNG.

Under the issues nted by the pleadings and evidence, the returns of only two precincts volved. The election officers were not furnished with the large linen opes required by the statute, and the counted ballots in these precincts not inclosed, sealed, or otherwise protected, but were insecurely ed in bundles with a string, and in that condition, with the tally s, locked in the ballot box with the stub books and delivered by the ffs of the election to the county clerk. The locks on the boxes were spring locks, some of which were unlocked with small trunk keys and ffice keys. The boxes were made of wood and tin, the tin tacked to the with small tacks easily drawn, and the top raised or removed. They not kept in the vault by the clerk, but in his office, exposed and acces- to evily disposed persons. The county clerk and his deputy both had y wagered on the election of contestant. Lights were seen in the 's office at night, as late as 2 o'clock in the morning, before the boxes inspected by the court. Three slats were broken out of one of the ow shutters and a pane of glass taken from the window through which could enter the office. The ballots, when opened, were in bad con- n. The court made a change in one precinct of twenty three votes and een in the other. The gain allowed was from ballots in which the il mark had apparently been made under the rooster and in the square site contestant's name under the log cabin, the effect of which was to t the vote for the Democratic ticket, except for circuit clerk; as to h office the vote would go to the opposing candidate. The stencil marks he squares opposite the contestant's name in the controverted ballots, made with different colored ink from those under the rooster. Held— there being no proof or even suspicion that the precinct election officers l either negligently or corruptly, and it being manifest that the ballots not guarded with that "zealous care which will contravene all sus- n of substitution or change," they do not present that presumption as eir integrity that will entitle them to overthrow the official returns certificate received by the appellant; and the lower court should have dged the appellant entitled to the office.

peal from Metcalfe Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

The appellant, James A. Hamilton, Jr., and the appellee, John H. Young, were rival candidates at the November election, 1903, for the office of circuit court clerk in the county of Metcalfe, the former being the nominee of the Democratic, and the latter of the Republican party.

Upon the face of the returns made by the officers of election in the various voting precincts, the board of the election commissioners found and declared appellant duly elected to the office in question, by a majority of 49 votes, and gave him a certificate to that effect. Whereupon appellee, denying appellant's right to the office and claiming his own election thereto, entered a contest therefor by the institution of this action in the Metcalfe Circuit Court. The trial of the contest in the circuit court resulted in a judgment declaring appellee elected to the office in controversy by a majority of twenty-five votes. Of that judgment appellant complains and the case is now before us for review and final adjudication.

The vote upon the face of the official returns was as follows:

No. 1. Edmonton Precinct, for Hamilton	180
For Young		149
No. 2. East Fork Precinct, for Hamilton	118
For Young		68
No. 3. Randolph Precinct, for Hamilton	140

No. 9. Moore's Spring Precinct, for Hamilton	66
For Young		100
Total for Hamilton	1,123
Total for Young		1,074

It is conclusively shown by the evidence that the election officers of each precinct, as soon as the polls closed, without adjournment or separation, immediately opened the ballot boxes, counted the ballots therein, made tally sheets of the count and announced, by one of the judges of the election in front of each voting room, the result of the election in the precinct. And that, thereupon, the officers in each precinct made out from and by their count of the ballots, returns thereof on the inside of the cover of the stub books, duly signed the same, made and signed duplicates thereof, and duly delivered the same, together with the counted ballots, ballot boxes and stub books to the proper officials. Waiving the technical objection made to the averments of the petition, which are alleged to be insufficient "to constitute a specific charge that would apprise the opposite party of its nature, and that would enable him to prepare a defense," we will at once proceed to the consideration of what we regard the most important question in the case, viz.: Were the ballots which were admitted by the lower court as evidence, so kept and preserved as to manifest their integrity and entitle them to overcome the returns of the election officers, and the certificate issued to appellant by the election commissioners?

In McCrary on Elections, section 471, it is said: "When, as is the case in several States, the statute provides a mode of preserving the identical ballots cast at an election, for the purpose of being used as evidence in the case of a contest, such statute, and particularly those provisions which provide for the safe keeping of such ballots, must be followed with great care. The danger that the ballots may be tampered with after the count is made known, especially if the vote is very close, is so great that no opportunity for such tampering can be permitted; such ballots in order to be received in evidence, must have remained in the custody of the proper officers of the law from the time of the original official count until they are produced before the proper court or officer; and if it appears that they have been handled by unauthorized persons, or that they have been left in an exposed or improper place, they can not be offered to overcome the official count."

In Bailey v. Hurst, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 508, this court, in an opinion by Judge Hobson, announced the following rule on this subject: "The certificate of the officers of election is prima facie correct, and the presumption of the proper discharge of official duty in counting the votes, is not overthrown by the ballots if, when they are produced, it appears that they have been tampered with."

Although the general rule is that the ballots themselves are the best evidence of the number of votes cast, and for whom cast, yet this rule can have no application to a case where the ballots have been tampered with after they were deposited in the ballot box. In such a case the value of the ballots as evidence is almost totally destroyed, and the returns made by the officers of election presiding at the polls, may become better evidence than the ballots."

In Edwards v. Logan, 24 Ky. Law Rep. 1099, it was also said by this court in an opinion by Judge O'Rear: "The rule may be stated to be, that when the ballots are preserved so that their integrity is assured, they can be counted during a contest, and they are undoubtedly better evidence of the vote cast than the returns, and should prevail where there is a difference. (Hughes v. Holman, 23 Oregon, 481; Owens v. State, 54 Texas, 500; People v. Holden, 28 Cal., 123). But before a recount of the ballots should be allowed to rebut the presumption of the correctness of the official returns, it should be proved satisfactorily that the ballot had not been tampered with since the election, and that those offered in evidence are the identical ones cast. On this point, it was said in the case of People v. Holden, 28 Cal., 123. We must presume that the officers of election honestly performed their duty in the premises; that they did not mutilate any of the ballots, but, on the contrary, strung them in the condition in which they were found in the ballot box on the thread, and sent them in that condition to the clerk's office. The same presumption exists in relation to their custody by the clerk. * * *

"The presumption of integrity of the ballots can not attach, however, until it is first shown that they came from the officer whose duty it is, by law, to have and preserve them, and that they are apparently in the condition of preservation prescribed by the statute. When that much is shown, the legal presumption as to their integrity attaches. On the contrary, however, if it be shown either that they have been tampered with, or that access has been afforded to them to persons unauthorized by law, then the burden shifts, and it thereupon becomes the duty of the person offering and relying upon such ballots, to prove affirmatively, not only that they are the identical ballots cast in the election, but that they have not been mutilated, changed or tampered with."

In Albert v. Twohig, 55 Neb., 563, it was said "that although the ballots cast constitute the primary evidence to determine the right of the respective parties, it must appear, however, that they have been preserved substantially in the manner and by the officers prescribed by the statutes. If they have been placed in a position to be tampered with by interested parties, the burden of proof is on the party offering them in evidence to show that they are in the same condition as when sealed by the several election boards. And in the absence of such proof, it was held that the ballots were properly rejected as evidence." (People v. Livingstone, 79 N. Y., 288; Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, 625; People v. Sakett, 14 Mich., 320; People v. Cicott, 16 Mich., 283; Powell v. Holman, 50 Ark., 94; Hudson v. Soloman, 19 Kan., 177; Hartman v. Young, 17 Ore., 150; McCrary on Elections, 475.)

From the foregoing authorities, and numerous others that might be cited, it is manifest that where it is made to appear that the ballots have been changed, or so exposed as to afford opportunity to be tampered with, or left in the custody of an officer or other person, so personally interested in the result of the election as to be subjected to the temptation or inducement to tamper with them, they lose their presumptive integrity and are no longer to be accepted in a contest or judicial inquiry as to the result of an election. And especially is this true if the boxes in which they were kept were so insecure as to render them capable of being readily opened or entered.

Under the issues presented by the pleadings and evidence, only the returns from two precincts—East Fork and Randolph—appear to be involved. It is admitted that the county clerk did not furnish to the election officers for use in the election, large linen adjustable envelopes, as required by the statute, or envelopes of any kind, though he furnished them at the election of the previous year. Consequently the ballots cast in these precincts, though counted and the result duly certified by the election officers at the close of the polls, were not enclosed, sealed or otherwise protected or identified, but only insecurely fastened in bundles with a string, and in that condition with the tally sheets, locked in the ballot boxes, together with the stub books containing the certificate of election, and delivered by the sheriffs of the election to the county clerk in his office.

It further appears from the evidence that the county clerk through his deputy, purchased for the ballot boxes cheap spring locks, some of which could be and were unlocked with small trunk keys and postoffice keys, and t as many as two of them were unlocked with the same key. The elec-n officers of East Fork and Randolph precincts (one or more of them) tified that they applied the keys to different locks and unlocked as many two locks with the same key. The clerk and his deputy were unable to te whether or not more than one key for each lock was purchased by m with the locks, or if more than one key for each lock was purchased, at became of the extra ones. It is also shown by the evidence that the llot boxes in which the ballots were kept, are part wood and part tin he top half being tin, and the remainder being wood.

The tin is tacked to the wood with small tacks, which can be drawn with-t difficulty and the top raised or removed. It further appears from the idence that the boxes containing the ballots were not kept in the vault of e county clerk's office where the circuit judge, as he testified, advised the rk to keep them, and where they would have been secure, but were kept m the time of their delivery to the clerk until the recount in the office, exposed as to be seen of all persons entering the office, and where they re accessible to any evily-disposed person who might effect an entrance to the office in the night time for the purpose of tampering with or chang-g the ballots. It was admitted by the county clerk that he had wagered 0 that appellee, in his race with appellant, would "get the most votes," d his deputy also admitted that he too had made a wager of $25 that appellee uld get more votes than appellant. It also appears that the sheriff of the unty, the jailer and ex-jailer had bet $50 each that appellee would get ore votes than appellant. The bets of the clerk and his deputy were made fore the ballot boxes, ballots and other paraphernalia for holding the elec-n, were furnished the election officers, and before the locks for the ballot xes were purchased. The evidence shows that the office of the county rk is situated on the first floor of the courthouse, and is used as a public ssway to the court room. It has four openings, two doors and two win-ws—one door opens into the courthouse yard and one into the court room.
om the court room a stairway leads up to a hallway above, which extends rough the entire second story of the building, and which stairway is used a public passway by the public to another stairway furnishing an exit to e courthouse yard. The two windows of the clerk's office are about three et from the ground, with a double sash to each window, are elevated and wered by cords and weights. There are shutters to the windows made of ne slats. From a shutter of one widow three slats were missing near the ttom of the window. Near the top of the lower sash of the same window pane of glass was absent when the ballot boxes were received by the county erk.

It is shown by the evidence that while the ballot boxes were in the clerk's fice, and before the recount of the vote in the court below, it would have en easy for one desiring to get to the ballot boxes to effect an entrance to e clerk's office through the window from which the slats and pane of lass were missing. It is also in proof that Edmonton, the county seat of etcalfe county, is a small town of only about 250 inhabitants; that it is nguarded, its streets unlighted, and that its courthouse is situated more an 200 feet from any other building and surrounded by a dense grove of ees. The evidence shows that at night, and when the shutters of the court room and county clerk's office are closed, lights therein can not be seen by persons passing along the streets of the town, except through the opening in the shutters of the clerk's office window where the slats are missing. Judge Kinnaird, B. B. Pursley, Thomas Slinker, Wm. Poore and Edgar Jesse testified that on Thursday night after the election they saw at different hours of the night, lights in the courthouse, county judges office and county clerk's office, that in the county judge's office, as late as midnight, and in the county clerk's office as early as nine at night and late as two o'clock the following morning. No evidence was offered by appellee to explain the presence or purpose of these lights. He did, however, introduce evidence which tended to impeach Poore and to show that his companions, Slinker and Jesse, were drunk on the night in question.

The singular and unexplained omissions of official duty upon the part of the county clerk, and his wagers upon appellee as a candidate, not only serve to fasten upon him in large measure the blame for any irregularities that may have occurred in the returns made by the officers of the election, but also to manifest his interest in the result of the election. It appears from the evidence that when the ballots of the East Fork and Randolph Precincts were recounted from the boxes by the lower court they were, to use the language of some of the witnesses, in "bad condition, considerably crumpled up." The one strand of strings with which each bundle was tied was not tight enough to draw the ends of the ballots together, and the stencil marks upon them could be seen without breaking or removing the string thereon. The gain in votes allowed appellee in the count made by the court was from ballots in which the stencil mark had apparently been made under the rooster, the democratic device, and in the square opposite the name of appellee; the effect of such a marking of the ballot being of course to count the vote for the entire Democratic ticket, except the candidate for circuit clerk, as to which office the vote would go to the candidate therefor upon the Republican ticket. It further appears that the ballots that contained such vote as were thus received by appellee, were found and taken from the top of the bundle of ballots. In other words, the loss of votes to appellant, and the gain to appellee was from ballots taken from the tops of the bundles in the two precincts of East Fork and Randolph.

The election officers in their testimony, and by their certificates made at the close of the polls on the day of the election, state that the straight Democratic ticket received 103 votes in East Fork Precinct, and 136 in Randolph Precinct. By the recount of the court it is made to appear that the election officers overlooked one-fourth, or twenty-three stencil marks in the squares opposite appellee's name in East Fork, and fourteen in Randolph Precinct, and the ballots show that no stencil marks were overlooked by the officers in any other race on any other ticket. This fact, together with the further fact that there is no proof or even suspicion that the election officers acted either negligently or corruptly, is sufficient to create a strong presumption, if indeed it is not conclusive proof, that the additional stencil marks found on the recount are to quote the language of counsel, the product of fraud on the part of either interested parties or corrupt partisans. The weight of the evidence conduces to show that the stencil marks in the squares opposite appellee's name on the ballots in controversy, were made with different ink o those appearing under the Democratic device on the same ballot. Those nder the Democratic device were made of black ink; opposite appellee's ame they were of blue or purple color like that of Arnold's jug ink.

The manner in which the ballots were examined and counted by the elec-on officers in the East Fork and Randolph Precincts as testified to by hem shows, as we think, that it could hardly have been possible that they mitted to count for appellee thirty-seven, or any number of votes to which e was entitled. Moreover, the count was made in the presence of inspectors epresenting the contending parties and candidates, and it is not likely that ney would have overlooked such loss of votes to one candidate. From the oregoing facts it is manifest that the ballots in this case were not only not uarded or preserved by the county clerk with that "zealous care which will ntravene all suspicion of substitution or change," but that they were so xposed as to have afforded an opportunity to be tampered with, and to such extent, that they were apparently tampered with before the recount by e court. Tested by the rule announced in the authorities, supra, the bal-ts do not present that presumption as to their integrity, that will entitle em to overthrow the official returns and certificate received by appellant.

It appears that the circuit court was in session when the petition was filed appellee inaugurating this contest, and that on the day following the ing thereof the judge of the circuit court, by request of the parties, opened d counted the ballots, and made the results of such count a matter of cord; but it is expressly stated in the order in regard thereto that "the urt was not asked to and did not pass upon the legality of any ballot."

The evident purpose of such counting of the ballots was merely to preserve e ballots intact as they then appeared. The appellant had not then filed s answer, or otherwise made known his defense. We fail to see how such tion by the court can be relied on by appellee as an estoppel. As a matter fact, it was not so treated by the lower court, as the issues were there-ter formed by the filing of the answer and other necessary pleadings, the oof was taken, and the trial upon the pleadings and proof resulted in all spects as if the first recount had not been made.

We think the questions herein passed upon decisive of the case, and hence ve not thought it necessary to consider others that have been attempted be raised in the record. Upon the whole record we are of opinion that e lower court should have adjudged appellant, instead of appellee, entitled the office in controversy.

Wherefore, to the end that appellant may yet be declared elected and ad-dged entitled to the office of circuit court clerk of Metcalfe county, the dgment is reversed and cause remanded for that purpose and for further oceedings consistent with this opinion.

HUGHES, &c. v. BENT, &c.

(Filed June 20, 1904.)

1. Will — Construction — Vesting of title — Immediate possession — Estate ld by trustee — Secret trust — Mary L. Johnson, deceased, owned at her ath a one undivided sixth interest in a lot on Fourth street in the city of ouisville, and the question in this case is, whether under her will, said interest was disposed of, and if so, whether by the terms of her will, such an estate in possession was thereby vested in her four grandchildren as would authorize a court to decree a sale thereof upon the petition of some of the joint owners of the entire lot against the others, under subsection 2, section 490, Civil Code, providing for a sale of such property "if the estate be in possession, and the property can not be divided without materially impairing its value," so as to pass a good title to the purchaser at such sale. The will of Mrs. Johnson, after making certain specific devises, made the following bequest: "The remainder of everything I possess I leave as a sacred trust to my daughter, Mary C. Wooldridge, and know that she will faithfully carry out my wishes regarding it." The sacred trust referred to was contained in a separate paper which was held to be a part of the will and which is as follows: "I want Chamie (Mrs. Wooldridge) to keep two pews in Christ's Church as long as her father lives, just as I have done, and I want one of them kept in his name. I want her to give $100 yearly to the 'Home of the Innocents,' in her father's name, as long as he lives. I want her to use for her father's personal support, such part of the income from what I leave, as in her judgment shall seem fit, but she is to be the sole judge of how much, or how little, or whether any shall be applied in this way. I want her to care for my old servant, Emma Wright, when she shall become unfit for work, either from age or infirmity. The balance of the income I want her to use for the education of my four grandchildren. At the death of her father I want the principal put in trust for my four grandchildren. Chamie may invest any part of my estate as she shall see fit." Held—That exclusive of the specific bequests to Mrs. Wooldridge in her own right, the will devises all of the estate of the testatrix to Mrs. Wooldridge in trust for her four grandchildren, subject to the charge for the payment of the annual contribution to the Home of the Innocents, the pew rent, the support of Mrs. Wooldridge's father, and Emma Wright, and the education of the four grandchildren.

2. Charges upon property—The fact that the charges upon the property may consume it all, can not alter the character of the title, or obstruct its regular transmission according to the expressed intention of the testatrix.

3. Duties as trustee—After undertaking to discharge the duties required of her by the will as trustee, Mrs. Wooldridge can not be heard to deny the trust.

4. Beneficial interest—Title—Possession—Under the will Mrs. Wooldridge is to take no beneficial interest in any part of her mother's estate, except the property specifically devised to her. All the remainder of the estate being devised in trust to the grandchildren, the title thereto vested in them immediately upon the death of the testatrix, subject to the charges thereon named in the will, and is a vested estate in possession. The possession of the trustee is the possession of the cestui que trust, and there can be no doubt that the infants were, in the meaning of subsection 2 of section 490 of the Civil Code, in possession of the real estate equally with their co-tenants; and, therefore, the chancellor had jurisdiction to decree the sale of the property, and the exceptions to the report of sale by the purchaser were properly overruled.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

This is an appeal by the purchaser at a judicial sale from an order overruling his exceptions and confirming the report of sale.

The action is under section 490, subsection 2, Civil Code, and was brought by some of the joint owners against the others, to obtain a decree for the sale of lot 236 Fourth street, in the city of Louisville, and for division of the proceeds, because the property could not be divided without materially impairing its value. The property had formerly been held in trust for Mrs. Fannie S. Bailey, and at her death descended to her four living sisters, and the descendants of her deceased brother and sister, they becoming invested as tenants in common in fee with the entire legal and equitable title. Mrs. Mary L. Johnson was one of the living sisters of Mrs. Bailey, who after her death, became the owner of an undivided one-sixth part of the property in fee simple. After thus acquiring the interest in the real estate by the death of her sister, Mrs. Bailey, Mrs. Johnson herself died testate. Her will, which was duly admitted to probate by the Jefferson County Court, is as follows:

"Louisville, Ky., January 26, 1898.

"I, Mary Lawrence Johnson, do make this my last will and testament, revoking all others. In view of the fact that my daughter, Mary C. Woolridge, will inherit a large estate left me by my father and mother, I bequeath to her the small sum of $500.

"I make this explanation in the beginning, that my will may not be considered unjust or peculiar. I leave to my daughter, Mary C. Woolridge, my carriage and horses, and the entire contents of my house, during her life. At her death to be divided equally between my grandchildren. To each one of my four grandchildren, Powhatan Johnson Woolridge, Annie May Woolridge, Mary Tyler Woolridge and Charles E. Johnson Woolridge, I give and bequeath thirty shares of stock in the Columbia Finance and Trust Co. At the death of any one of the four (being unmarried) his or her shares to go to the surviving brothers and sisters. The remainder of everything that I possess I leave as a sacred trust to my daughter, Mary C. Woolridge, and know that she will faithfully carry out my wishes regarding it. I desire that no inventory to taken of my effects."

By a short writing on the same paper with the will, but appearing below the signature of the testatrix to that instrument, the daughter, Mrs. Woolridge, was appointed executrix of the will. This writing was also signed by the testatrix. Below this writing, and also on the same paper, is another, signed by the husband, in which he approved the provisions of the will, and consented to the making thereof by the wife.

The "sacred trust" referred to in the will is contained in a separate paper over the signature of the testatrix written at the time of the writing of the will, and is as follows: "I want Chamie (Mrs. Woolridge) to keep two pews in Christ's Church as long as her father shall live, just as I have done, and I want one of them kept in his name. I want her to give $100 yearly to the Home of the Innocents, in her father's name, as long as he lives. I want her to use for her father's personal support, such part of the income from which I leave as in her judgment shall seem fit, but she to be the sole judge of how much, or how little, or whether any, shall be applied in this way.

"I want her to care for my old servant, Emma Wright, when she shall become unfit for work, either from age or infirmities. The balance of the income I want her to use for the education of my four grandchildren. At the death of her father, I want the principal put in trust for my four grandchildren. Chamie may sell and invest any part of my estate as she shall see fit."

The real estate in question is a part of that disposed of by the residuary clause of the will, and it is insisted for the purchaser that the "sacred trust" mentioned by the will is a secret yet enforcible trust, and that such part of the income during the life of Charles F. Johnson as is not exhausted by the charges for pew rents, Home of the Innocents, support of Charles F. Johnson, and Emma Wright, and education of the four grandchildren, is not disposed of, and as to such surplus income there is a resulting trust in favor of the heir at law, Mary C. Woolridge, during her father's life; that by the direction of the sacred trust, to put the whole in trust for the four grandchildren at Charles F. Johnson's death, they are given an estate in remainder, and that this estate in remainder of the infants is not an estate in possession; therefore, the court, under the decision in Dineen v. Hall, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1615, has no jurisdiction to sell the property under the section of the Code, supra.

Our construction of the will is that exclusive of the specific bequests to Mrs. Woolridge in her own right, it devises all of the estate of the testatrix, to Mrs. Woolridge in trust for the four grandchildren, subject to a charge for the payment of the annual contribution to the Home of the Innocents, the pew rent, the support of Charles F. Johnson and Emma Wright, and the education of the grandchildren. The fact that the charges upon the property may consume it all, can not alter the character of the title, or obstruct its regular transmission according to the expressed intention of the testatrix.

In Bowling v. Dobyns, Adm'r, 5 Dana, 441, it is said in an opinion by Judge Ewing: "Whether a devise is made to an executor for the payment of debts, or a power to sell for that purpose, or a charge is otherwise imposed on the estate for that object, or other special objects, it has been construed as a charge merely, and not as an impediment to the devise or descent of the fees or freehold."

The fact that the will itself declares that the property referred to therein as the "remainder of everything I possess," was left to Mrs. Woolridge as a sacred trust, show that there was an agreement or understanding between her and her mother as to the nature and scope of the trust, and the identification of the separate paper containing the provision of the trust, leaves no doubt as to the identity of the beneficiaries, or of their interest in the estate devised, and makes it proper to treat the paper as a part of the will, and to seek its aid in construing that instrument. After undertaking to discharge the duties required of her by the will as trustee, we do not think Mrs. Woolridge can be heard to deny the trust.

We do not regard Dineen v. Hall, supra, as authority in point. In that case it was held that it was not proper to decree the sale of real estate under section 490, subsection 2, Civil Code, in which a father owned a life estate tenant by the curtesy and his infant children, the remainder, as they ere not joint owners of the property in the meaning of the section of the ode, supra, the possession being in the father for life to the exclusion of e infant during that period. (Malone, &c. v. Conn., &c., 95 Ky., 93.)

In the case at bar the interest of the infant is not an interest in remainr, but a fee simple, with the legal title, it is true, in the trustee, their other, subject to certain charges put upon the property by the provisions of e will. The language of the will clearly indicates that Mrs. Woolridge is take no beneficial interest in any part of her mother's estate except the 00 and articles of personal property therein specifically bequeathed to her. All the remainder" of everything the testatrix possessed, went to Mrs. Woolidge under the provision of the will creating the trust. So even if the inrest taken by the grandchildren is, as argued by one of the counsel, only equitable fee simple, it vested immediately upon the death of the testaix subject to the charges upon the estate named in the will, and in any ent was and is a vested interest in possession. The fact that the trustee as in this case authority under the will to sell the trust property and reest the proceeds as her judgment may dictate, even without the aid or pervision of a court of equity, does not destroy the trust, though it will lieve the purchaser of such property of looking to the reinvestment of the oceeds. The possession of the trustee is that of the cestuis que trust. here can, therefore, be no doubt that the infants were, in the meaning of bsection 2 of section 490 of the Code, in possession of the real estate, purased by appellant equally with their co-tenants at the time of the sale.

We are of opinion that jurisdiction to sell for indivisibility exists in this se and that appellant can not be disturbed in his possession. It follows, erefore, that the chancellor properly overruled his exceptions, and conmed the report of sale.

Wherefore, the judgment is affirmed.

Whole court sitting.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE R. R. CO. v. LOGSDON'S ADM'R.

(Filed June 20, 1904.)

1. Railroads—Killing of child straying on railroad track—Presence not nticipated and not discovered—Liability of defendant—Where the evidence ows that a child under three years of age, whose parents resided in a house ar the railroad track, wandered out on the track about 160 yards from the ouse, and was run over and killed by a passing freight train at a point on e track where its presence was not anticipated and was not discovered by e trainmen until the engine was within sixty or seventy feet of it, and it as impossible then to save it, the company is not liable for causing its ath, and a peremptory instruction should have been given by the court to e jury to find for the defendant.

2. Trespassers—Lookout—Discovery of peril—In towns or cities, or where, om any reason, the presence of persons on the track should be anticipated, is the duty of railroad men to keep a lookout in front of moving trains; t at other points of the road they are under no obligation to keep a lookt for trespassers on the track, but only to use all reasonable care to prent injury to them after their peril is discovered. The reason of this rule not that the person injured is guilty of contributory negligence in placing himself in danger, but the rule rests on the ground that the railroad company owes him no duty until his peril is discovered.

3. Infants—Neither an infant under three years of age, nor an idiot, can be held liable for a trespass or for contributory negligence. If either strays on the premises of another and gets hurt, no blame attaches to him, but if while there and at a place where the presence of strangers is not anticipated, he gets hurt, the owner of the place is not responsible for the injury when he does not know of the danger in time to avoid it by the exercise of ordinary care, after the peril is discovered.

4. Breach of duty—A railroad company has the exclusive possession of its right of way and stands just as the owner of any other premises so far as strangers coming on it are concerned. At ordinary places along the track the presence of persons on the right of way is not to be anitcipated, therefore, no lookout for them need be maintained. Every action for negligence rests on a breach of duty. If there has been no duty broken there has been no wrong and there can be no recovery.

4. Same—An infant, three years old, or an idiot can no more recover than an adult, unless there has been a breach of duty on the part of the defendant, and he can no more complain than an adult, that a lookout was not kept at a place where the presence of persons was not to be anticipated.

Benjamin D. Warfield, Posten & Moorman and Edward W. Hines for appellant.

S. M. Payton for appellee.

Appeal from Hardin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Appellee's intestate, an infant under three years of age, was struck and killed by one of appellant's freight trains, and this action was instituted by the administrator to recover for his death, resulting in a verdict and judgment in his favor for $1,200. The only question we deem it necessary to consider on the appeal is, whether the evidence warranted a recovery. The facts shown are as follows:

The infant was the child of a section hand of appellant, whose house stood beside the railroad track and within thirty feet of it. Just before the child was killed the father went across the railroad and up it about 250 yards to a spring for a bucket of water. When he left the house the child was in the rear of the house playing with some brick, its mother being in the yard behind the house at work. While the father was gone, the child wandered out of the house and upon the railroad track, where he was run over and killed by a passing freight train, about 160 yards from the house. A hoop, which was his favorite plaything, was found near his body, with blood on it. The house was out in the country and the child was not on or near a public crossing. The proof for the appellee showed that no warning from either bell or whistle was given by the trainmen until the stop signal was sounded, and this was about the time the child was struck. The place of the accident could be seen from the direction of the approaching train for a distance of 450 yards, and it may be concluded from the evidence that those in charge of the train could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have seen the child if he was on the track, or very near it, in time to stop the train before striking him. No witness for appellee saw the child after he left the house d before he was killed. But it is insisted that it may be inferred from e evidence that the child was following his father up the railroad track, lling his hoop when he was struck. The court refused to give the jury a remptory instruction to find for the defendant on the plaintiffs' evidence, d the defendant's testimony was then introduced. The engineer stated at as the train approached the point where the child was killed, it was on curve, his position being on the outer line of the curve so that the loco- otive obstructed his view, and he did not see the child at all. The fire- an who was on the other side of the engine, said he was firing the locomo- ve as the curve was rounded, and when he finished that and looked ahead, saw the boy sixty or seventy feet ahead of the engine and at once gave e alarm to the engineer, who immediately reversed the engine and stopped e train as soon as it could be done, but too late to save the child. The nductor was in the caboose at the rear of the train, but could not see from s position the track in front of the locomotive, and none of the brakemen ere on the lookout.

It is conceded that under the repeated adjudications of this court, there uld be no recovery for the death of an adult under the proof. But it is sisted that a different rule applies to a child of such tender years. The idence is not sufficient to show that the trainmen in fact saw the child in ne to have saved him. The only ground for recovery is, that if they had en on the lookout and had exercised proper care, they might have seen him time to stop the train before striking him. In towns or cities, or where, r any reason the presence of persons on the track should be anticipated, is the duty of railroad men to keep a lookout in front of moving trains; t at other parts of the road they are under no obligation to keep a lookout r trespassers on the track, but only to use all reasonable care to prevent jury to them after their peril is discovered. The reason for the rule is not at the person injured is guilty of contributory negligence in placing himself the track or in a place of danger. The rule rests on the ground that the ilroad company owes him no duty until his peril is discovered. If the ild and his father, in the case before us, had been together on the track and th had been killed, there could have been no recovery for the death of e father, and it is hard to see why a different rule should apply to the ild, if the company was not under obligation to anticipate the presence of her on the track or to maintain a lookout for persons at that point. hile there is some conflict in the cases on the question, the decisions of is court are uniform in holding that the case of a child stands just as that a grown person in cases of this character. In Given's Adm'r v. Ken- cky Central R. R. Co., 12 Ky. Law Rep., 950, a child nine years old was lled by a train, when no signal of its movement was given. The court in scussing the duties of the trainmen, said: "They are not required to pre- me that any one will trespass upon the exclusive right of way of the com- ny, and they are, therefore, not bound to be on the lookout for trespass- s, but only to avoid injury to them, if possible, when their presence and sibility to danger become known. This rule applies in the case of a child st as it does in that of a grown person. If those operating a train were quired to look out and guard against danger to children trespassing upon e track, then this would necessarily afford an opportunity to see all other persons who might be upon it and in danger. Undoubtedly a greater degree of care is required of them as to children not old enough to be aware of the danger, than as to grown persons, when they have been once discovered upon or near the track; but until their presence is known, the rule applies equally to both. An exception to the rule exists, however, where a train is passing through a town or city and where people are likely to cross the track at any point, and are known to be in the habit of doing so by those operating the train. In such a case there is constant danger to life; and out of regard for it, those in charge of a train must look out for persons who may be upon the track, and give such notice of its approach and movements, and so regulate its speed as is likely to warn them of danger, and enable them to get out of the way."

In McDermott v. Kentucky Central R. R. Co., 93 Ky., 408, a boy eight years old was hurt in the same way, and in answer to the argument that no lookout was maintained, the court said: "And the fact that such trespasser is an infant does not affect the legal rights of the company, because signals of an approaching engine must be given and oversight of the tracks exercised uniformly and habitually, or not at all, and for the protection and safety of all trespassers or none."

In L. & N. R. R. v. Webb, 99 Ky., 348, the question was again made, and the court said: "The well-settled rule in such cases is, that a child is required to exercise only such a degree of discretion and care as may be reasonably expected of children of his age and intelligence in any given circumstances of danger; but the mere immature age of the person injured, can not be allowed to have the effect to raise a duty where none otherwise existed."

This question was again presented, after a change in the membership of the court, in Becker v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 110 Ky., 474, and the case was allowed to go to the jury only on the question whether the engineer in fact saw the child in time to avoid injuring him after his peril was discovered. It was also since presented in Goodman's Adm'r v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 25 Ky. Law Rep., 1086, and the same rule was adhered to. The court said: "Trains must be run on schedule time, and no duty is imposed upon those in charge to stop or slow up at the appearance upon the track of objects, the nature of which is only discernable upon near approach. If the object seen by Robert Wilkerson had been at a highway crossing, or in the street of a town or city, where the presence of small children might be suspected, a different case would be presented and a different standard of diligence could have been required. Appellee's engineer had no more reason to suppose an infant would be upon their track at the point where the accident in this case occurred than an adult, and owed no higher degree of diligence to them than to an adult."

In Louisville & Frankfort R. R. Co. v. Milton, 53 Ky., 61, decided in the year 1853, it was held that there was no liability on the part of a railroad company for stock killed by its trains, unless the animal destroyed was observed in sufficient time to enable those in charge of the train to avoid the injury by ordinary care. This was followed in Louisville & Frankfort Ry. Co. v. Ballard, 59 Ky., 177, decided in the summer of 1859, and in O'Bannon v. Louisville, &c., R. R. Co., 71 Ky., 349, decided in 1871. It remained law of the State until changed by the statute declaring railroad comes responsible for all cattle negligently injured by them, and making njury of the stock prima facie evidence of negligence. As to cattle ing on the track, railroad companies are liable under the statute if or-ry care is not observed to discover them. But there has been no change atute as to persons trespassing on the track, and the liability of rails for injuries to persons, whether adult or infant, must depend on com-law principles; for the statute simply makes them liable for injuries ttle, and to construe such language to create a liability for injuries to l children, would be unwarranted. True, a child under seven is conively presumed incapable of crime, but a like prima facie presumption nds him from seven to fourteen; and if appellant is responsible when child is under seven, then it would be a question for the jury, if he was ween seven and fourteen; whether he had sufficient capacity to be re-sible. Neither an infant under three years old nor an idiot can be held le for a trespass or charged with contributory negligence. If either of n strays on the premises of another, no blame attaches to him; but if le there, and at a place where the presence of strangers is not to be anated, he gets hurt, the owner of the premises is not responsible for his ry when he does not know of his danger in time to avoid it by the exerof ordinary care, after his peril is discovered. He is not chargeable negligence in not maintaining an outlook; for this is not required if presence of others is not to be anticipated. If the defendant here were a ner or a manufacturer, and a three-year-old child had strayed upon the nises at a point where the presence of others was not to be looked for, had been run over because he was discovered too late, would it not be eded that this was simply an unfortunate accident, or would it be ntained that a recovery should be had because a lookout was not kept?

ilroad company has the exclusive possession of its right of way, and ds just as the owner of any other premises so far as strangers coming n it are concerned. At ordinary places along the track the presence of ons on the right of way is not to be anticipated, and, therefore, no look-for them need be maintained. Every action for negligence rests on a ch of duty. If there has been no duty broken, there is no wrong, and e can be no recovery. An infant three years old, or an idiot can no e recover than an adult, unless there has been a breach of duty on the of the defendant; and he can no more complain than an adult that a out was not kept at a place where the presence of persons was not to be cipated. If infants were made an exception to the rule, and railroad panies were required to keep a lookout for them at all places along their k on account of their helplessness, the same principle would have to be lied to idiots, lunatics, epileptics, the deaf, the blind, and the like.
his would destroy the rule and make it inconsistent with itself; for if presence of no persons is to be looked for on the track, the presence of ons infirm or unable to take care of themselves is not to be anticipated; the defendant can not be required to guard against a danger which is to be anticipated by a person of ordinary prudence. The rule announced his court that the company is not responsible for the injury of an in-from failure to maintain a lookout where no lookout is required, as the presence of persons is not to be anticipated, is a necessary corollary of the rule laid down more than fifty years ago and consistently maintained since, until changed by the statute, that the company is not liable for injury to stock because no lookout is kept. The rule so long maintained is under the principle of stare decisis the law of the State. It is also in accord with the weight of American authority. (Morrisey v. Eastern R. R. Co., 30 Am. Rep., 686; Cauley v. Pittsburg, &c., R. R. Co., 40 Am. Rep., 66a; Pennsylvania R. R. Co. v. McMullen, 132 Penn. State, 107; Thomas v. Chicago, &c., R. R. Co., 61 N. W., 967; Matson v. Port Townsend R. R. Co., 37 Pacific, 105; Railway Co. v. Codd, 54 Kan., 558; Alabama Great Southern R. R. Co. v. Moorer, 3 Am. Negligence Reports, 317; Ward v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., 23 L. R. A., 715; Felton v. Aubrey, 74 Fed. Rep., 350; 2 Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, section 481a., and notes.)

On the facts shown by the plaintiff, the court should have instructed the jury peremptorily to find for the defendant. The former opinion (25 Ky. Law Rep., 1656) is withdrawn.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

Whole court sitting.

Judges Nunn and Settle dissent.

CHENAULT, &c. v. QUISENBERRY, &c.

(Filed June 20, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Stare decisis—This is the third appeal in this case, and under the doctrine of stare decisis, the former opinions must control the opinion of the court on this appeal.

2. Verdict—Flagrantly excessive—If there should have been a verdict at all for the plaintiff, the sum of $2,000 is palpably and flagrantly against the weight of the testimony, and should be reversed for this, if for no other reason.

3. Imperfect legal title—Prescriptive right—While the appellees evidently feel that they have a strong moral, if not a legal, right to the land, because of the conveyance to their remote vendors and ancestor, yet their chain of title not being perfect, they can only recover by showing a prescriptive right.

4. Possession—Occupancy—Agency—If one was in possession of a certain boundary of land within the 10,000-acre survey, and while thus occupying the certain boundary, acted as agent of the appellees, or of their ancestor, that would not constitute a possession of the part outside of the designated boundary claimed by appellees

5. Possession—One who owns a tract of land can not live upon it and be said to be in the actual possession of another tract, claimed by another, by simply acting as the agent for the latter in keeping off trespassers, etc. Such acts do not constitute the actual possession of land.

W. S. Pryor, J. B. White and Hazelrigg & Chenault for appellants.

D. L. Pendleton, T. L. Edelen and J. C. Lykins for appellees.

Appeal from Wolf Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

This is the third appeal from judgments of the lower court. (Chenault, &c. v. Quisenberry, &c., 19 Ky. Law Rep., 1682; Chenault, &c. v. Quisenberry, &c., 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1771.) Under the doctrine of stare decisis the former opinions must control the opinion of the court on this appeal. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for $2,000 damages.

If there should have been a verdict at all for the plaintiff, the amount is palpably and flagrantly against the weight of the testimony. It must have been based largely upon the testimony of J. H. Stamper and another witness who went upon the land and estimated the value of the timber which had been cut within the past three previous years. This estimate was made after Daniels had cut large quantities of timber under a contract which was approved by the appellee and pursuant to an order of court. The proceeds of the timber thus cut was paid to the receiver of the court to await the judgment of the court. The testimony of the appellants showed that they had cut timber off the land of not greater value than $100 to $150. One witness introduced by the appellees testified that the logs taken off by Chenault, were of the value of $600 to $700.

It is evident that the jury's verdict was for the timber which had been taken off by Daniels under the order of the court and the proceeds of which are in the custody of the court. If for no other reason the judgment should be reversed, because it is flagrantly against the weight of the evidence on the question of damages.

In the first opinion, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 1684, the court said: "We are of the opinion that instruction No. 1 is erroneous, in that it permits a recovery by proof of possession prior to 1855, when the proof shows that F. B. Quisenberry, the ancestor of appellees, deeded all interest he had in the land to John D. Spencer, and there is no proof as to its reconveyance. We are also of the opinion that instruction No. 2 is erroneous. There is no proof that appellees were in the actual possession of this land under the papers referred to, claiming to a mark or natural boundary as represented by the deeds. Title papers may be used to show boundary and extent of possession, but there must be shown an acutal entry and possession under the paper title before they can be so used."

On the last appeal, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1771, the court, in discussing the conveyance by Quisenberry to John D. Spencer and the alleged reconveyance, said: "It is attempted to show that title to a part of the tract then conveyed was reconveyed to Quisenberry, by showing that a written contract was entered into between Spencer and Quisenberry, and acknowledged and left in the clerk's office, and that the clerk's office was subsequently burned. The evidence of this contract is relied upon by appellees as showing a tenancy in common by Quisenberry and Spencer, from which it is argued that the evidence of possession by Spencer introduced upon behalf of appellants, inures to the benefit of his co-tenant as a possession by both. We can not concur in this contention. The evidence of the contract, if admissible in the absence of evidence by the custodian of the record of its destruction, shows only that an agreement was made, not for a reconveyance by Spencer of any portion of the land, or of any definite interest in the whole of it, but in effect that there should be a division of the land, Spencer to keep an amount thereof proportionate to the amount of the purchase money already paid by him, and to reconvey the remainder to Quisenberry, the amounts being left undetermined and to be thereafter agreed upon. This did not make Quisenberry and Spencer tenants in common."

It will be observed that in the first opinion the court in effect said that the evidence of possession prior to 1855 would not authorize a recovery, because Quisenberry, the ancestor of appellees, deeded all the interest he had in the land to John D. Spencer, and there was no proof as to a reconveyance. On the second trial the court admitted the testimony of H. B. Whitaker, which was introduced for the purpose of showing a reconveyance, and in the opinion delivered on the second appeal, the court held that the evidence was not admissible, as no possession had been obtained thereunder. There was no evidence introduced on the last trial which made Whitaker's evidence competent. There was some evidence tending to show that Quisenberry and a son of John D. Spencer, in 1880 made an agreement as to a division line, and that Quisenberry thereafter made an ineffectural effort to get possession of the part which the son agreed he should have. The principal effort which the appellees made to obtain possession of the land, was through the contracts with Alexander and Goolman Spencer and the railroad contractors.

As said, Whitaker's evidence is incompetent; another's testimony to the same effect is likewise incompetent.

In the opinion delivered on the second appeal the court held that the writings evidencing these contracts were incompetent. It may be, at this point added, that while the court excluded the written evidences of the contract between Quisenberry and the Spencers and the contractors, it admitted oral testimony of them, which of course was even more objectionable. The court in the second opinion held that the possession of John D. Spencer did not inure to the benefit of Quisenberry. While there seems to have been no objection to the introduction as evidence the opinion of this court in Spencer v. Quisenberry, yet it was so erroneous and prejudicial to do so that the court can not forbear to express the opinion that it should not have been done.

The appellees in this case evidently feel that they have a strong moral, if not a legal right to the land, because of the conveyances to their remote vendors and ancestor, yet the chain of title was not perfect and they can only recover by showing a prescriptive right. If one was in possession of a certain boundary within the 10,000-acre survey, and while thus occupying the certain boundary, acted as agent of the appellees or their ancestor, that would not constitute a possession of the part outside of the designated boundary which was claimed by appellees. One who owns a tract of land, can not live upon it and be said to be in the actual possession of another tract of land claimed by another, by simply acting as the agent for the latter in keeping off trespassers, etc. Such acts do not constitute the actual possession of land.

The judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

HOWARD v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed June 20, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Homicide—Unintentional killing—If appellant had reasonable grounds believe and did believe that he was then about to be assaulted and cut by ndall Howard, who was following him with an open knife, he had the ht to use his gun in his necessary self-defense, and if in doing so George ward was shot unintentionally, defendant should be acquitted, and the y should have been so instructed.

Byrd & Howard for appellant.

N. B. Hays and Loraine Mix for appellee.

Appeal from Magoffin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

This case was affirmed by this court May 20, 1904. (25 Ky. Law Rep., 2213.) ppellant has filed a petition for a rehearing. The record is small, but im-rfect. It is difficult to tell the evidence admitted by the lower court from at which was rejected, but upon a reconsideration of the case by the whole urt, we find the following facts in addition to those stated in the former inion:

Appellants' defense was that the discharge of the gun which wounded his cle, was not intended by him, but was accidental, and two witnesses ted facts which tended to show the truth of appellant's contention. This urt is of the opinion that appellant was entitled to an instruction di-cting the jury to acquit him, if they believed from the evidence the ooting and wounding was accidental and unintentional. (13 Ky. Law ep., 313; Montgomery v Commonwealth, ante, 356.) It appears from e record that there was some evidence tending to show that Kendall ward followed appellant from the gate to the house with an open knife his hand, threatening to assault and cut appellant. If appellant had rea-nable grounds to believe, and did believe, that he was then about to be saulted and cut at the hands of Kendall Howard, then, under such cir-mstances, appellant had the right to use his gun in his necessary self-de-nse; and if in doing so George Howard was shot unintentionally, then the ry should acquit. (Bush v. Commonwealth, 78 Ky., 269; Morris v. Com-nwealth, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 403.)

We are of the opinion that the court erred to appellant's prejudice in not ving in substance the instruction indicated.

For these reasons the order affirming this case is set aside, and cause re-rsed for proceedings consistent herewith.

BUTLER v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed December 4, 1886—Not to be reported.)

1. Question tending to degrade witness—Cross examination—Discretion of e court—It is necessary to the proper conduct of the public business and e purpose of justice that the trial court should have a right in its discre-on to control the cross examination of a witness on a matter which has a ndency to degrade him.

2. Contradicting one's own witness—Where a party introduces a witness who proves facts against him, he may contradict him by showing that he has, out of court, stated otherwise.

Alpheus Baker for appellant.

P. W. Hardin for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Criminal Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Holt.

This is a conviction for murder. The evidence, although altogether circumstantial, is sufficient to support the verdict.

But two supposed errors of law are presented as ground for a reversal. One is that the accused was not permitted to ask a witness for the State certain questions tending to degrade him.

They were whether he had not when trying to purchase a suit of clothes of a certain merchant, represented himself as the son of a certain man; if he had not been arrested for obtaining them by false pretenses; and if he had not continued the case for a certain time when his father compromised it by paying for them?

Anciently a witness could be compelled to answer a question, although reflecting infamy upon him, but the modern rule exempts him of it will tend either to have such effect or subject him to a penalty.

When the question tends merely to degrade him there is a difference of opinion and it is perhaps yet an open question whether he can be compelled to answer. A distinction has, however, been very properly drawn, as we think, between cases where the testimony is relevant and material to the issue, and where it is only collateral, and asked only by reason of the latitude allowed upon a cross-examination.

Greenleaf says: "Accordingly the better opinion seems to be that where the transaction, to which the witness is interrogated forms any part of the ssue to be tried, the witness will be obliged to give evidence, however strongly it may reflect on his character." (1 Greenleaf on Evidence, section 455.)

In the case now presented however, the evidence was not material to the issue, and related merely to the character of the witness. The tendency of the later authorities is to compel an answer in such a case, but there is not entire accord upon the question. Wharton's Criminal Evidence, section 474, and cases there cited. They appear, however, to agree that the question may be asked, because the witness entitled to the privilege may waive it. (Sodusky, &c. v. McGee, 5 J. J. M, 621; 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, section 460.)

It is not necessary, however, in this instance to pass upon the disputed point to which we have alluded. It is necessary to the proper conduct of the public business and the purposes of justice that the trial court should have a right in its discretion, to control the extent of such a cross-examination. It was so held in Real v. People, 42 N. Y., 270.

In the case now before us the witness was cross-examined at considerable length as to his social and domestic relations. He testified that he had gotten the clothes, was arrested for it and discharged, and that he had not misrepresented himself. There was no avowal as to what the witness would e stated if the rejected questions had been asked. He had already an-red them in substance and the court did not abuse its discretion in re-ng to allow them to be asked.

party jointly indicted with the appellant but not on trial, was intro-ed as a witness for the Commonwealth. It appears that the attorney for State was in possession of a written statement, which the witness had le, as to what he knew of the matters in issue. Among other things it ed that he had said to the chief of police that "he had the right man," ding to the appellant.

is urged that the court improperly allowed the witness to be asked and nswer whether he had not made use of this expression, and it is further sted that the entire written statement was improperly introduced as evi-ce.

appears that the testimony of the witness up to a certain point in his nination, was not as full as the statement, and the Commonwealth's rney, holding it in his hand and reading from it, asked him if he had so stated and if it was not true, to which the witness replied affirma-ly.

he court expressly told the jury that they must not consider so much of answer as expressed the opinion that the chief of police had the right . Not only was this much of the evidence excluded at the time, but the rt subsequently told the jury that they could not regard it. The written ement was not introduced as evidence. The attorney for the State ely used it to refresh the recollection of the witness. Where a party in-uces a witness, who proves facts against him, he may contradict him howing that he has, out of court, stated otherwise; and it is true that re he merely fails to prove what is expected that this can not be done; this rule does not prevent the witness from being asked if he has not le certain statements elsewhere, in order to refresh his recollection. It the more allowable in this case indeed, as it was evident that the wit-was unwilling to tell what he knew and the sequel so proved. The tten statement was used merely to refresh the memory of the witness and his extent its use was not objectionable so far as it was competent testiy, and the judgment is affirmed.

STAPLETON v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed March 10, 1887—Not to be reported.)

Previous difficulty—Excuse for killing—Apparent danger—Where aced, in passing the home of deceased, insultingly cried out: "This is the dog" and crowed, and deceased went out and whipped accused with his for the insult.—Held, That this fact did not excuse the accused for ing himself with a pistol and returning and killing deceased when he in no danger.

Continuance—Discretion of the court—The court did not abuse its dis-ion in overruling the motion of accused for a continuance based upon affidavit alleging that deceased had threatened his life, when the evi-ce clearly shows that accused apprehended no such danger.

. Y. Fitzpatrick and A. H. Howard for appellant.

P. W. Hardin for appellee.

Appeal from Magoffin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Pryor.

The transfer of the case from the Magoffin Criminal Court to the Magoffin Circuit Court, was proper as was held by this court in a similar case of Anderson v. Commonwealth. The instructions were all proper, giving to the accused the full benefit of the plea of self-defense, and no error in the record that we perceive calculated in any manner to prejudice the rights of the accused. That previous difficulties between these parties had produced a state of feeling resulting in the killing of White, is no doubt true, but here the life of the deceased was taken at a time when he was in no danger of bodily harm, and after the fight had terminated. Such is the testimony on the part of the Commonwealth, and while appellant's statement is to the contrary and to some extent corroborated, the jury were the sole judges of the fact and believed what the witness for the Commonwealth stated in regard to the killing, and not the statements of witnesses for the defense.

It is manifest that the accused originated the difficulty on the day the fatal shot was fired. He passed by the home of White, within a few steps of his door and turning his face towards it, cried out, "this is the bull dog" and crowed. A neighbor and relati ve of the deceased was in the house at the time and remarked to the deceased that if he would go out and whip the accused he would pay the costs. To this the deceased assented and made, as the proof shows, an assault on the accused with his fists, getting the better of the fight and chastising the accused for his rude conduct. While this was improper on the part of the deceased, still it did not justify the taking of his life when the accused was in no danger of the slightest bodily harm. He had already been whipped for his insolence and was on his way from the scene of the fight when he returned and shot White with a pistol. There was no excuse or provocation for it except the heat and passion of the accused caused by the fight he had just had with the deceased. The wife of White, when she saw him pass her house says, "there goes the rogue." Whether the accused heard it or not is uncertain. He says that he did, but if so the statement of the woman was no inducement for his conduct. He then had his pistol with him, and had shown it on the same day to others, saying that "he meant business." He presented an affidavit for a continuance to the effect that the deceased had threatened to take his life, and that these threats had been communicated to him. The court overruled his motion, in the exercise of a judicial discretion, the correctness of which is evidenced by the proof before us.

It would not have changed the result and should not, because it is plain that the accused, who now says he expected White would take his life at any time, had no fear of him whatever, or if he had, his effort was to provoke him, that he might shoot him. If the state of fact existed that he expected to prove by Miss Hall, he need not have passed within a few steps of the door of the deceased, crying out here is the bull dog and crowing, as a game cock of the mountains, with a view of challenging his adversary. White could then have shot him from his door-step, and could have taken life when he assaulted him, but it is apparent that he had no intention l equally as apparent that the accused apprehended no such danger.

The judgment in our opinion must be affirmed.

McINTIRE v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed April 16, 1887—Not to be reported.)

. Indictment—Action of grand jury—Due form of law—Presumption—ere an indictment is returned with the endorsement "a true bill" there-signed by the foreman and the names of the witnesses, purporting to re been examined, written thereon, and presented to the court by the eman in the presence of the grand jury and filed by the clerk, it must be en and considered as found and returned in due form of law, and the rt has no authority to inquire whether twelve jurors concurred in find-g it or whether the evidence was such as is required by section 111, of the iminal Code to authorize the finding.

. Re-reference to same grand jury—Necessity for recalling witnesses—Where indictment has been found, and on motion of the Commonwealth's attor-y, dismissed and re-referred to the same grand jury, there is no necessity in alling and re-examining the same witnesses, when the case is re-referred l a second indictment is found.

3. Robbery—Instructions—In an indictment for robbery, an instruction at if the jury believe that the property mentioned was feloniously taken m C. forcibly and against his will, and by putting him in fear is good, d it is not material to recite in the instruction, the circumstances attend-g the transaction.

W E. Settle for appellant.

Appeal from Edmonson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Lewis.

Appellant before the trial moved the court to set aside the indictment der which he was convicted in this case, upon the ground that the grand ry found and returned it, without having heard the evidence of those ose names are written thereon as witnesses; and to sustain his motion ered to prove by said persons that they were not in fact examined as wit-sses, in support of the particular indictment. When an indictment, with e indorsement, "a true bill" thereon signed by the foreman, as required by ction 119, Criminal Code, and the names of all the witnesses purporting have been examined written thereon, as required by section 120, is pre-nted by the foreman in the presence of the grand jury to the court, and ed with the clerk, as required by section 121, it must be taken and consid-ed as found and returned in due form of law. And the court has no au-ority to inquire whether twelve jurors concurred in finding it, as required section 119; nor whether the evidence before the grand jury was such as required by section 111, to authorize the finding.

It appears in this case that an indictment against appellant for the same fense had, on a previous day of the term, been duly returned into court, it was, on motion of the Commonwealth's attorney dismissed, and the one nder which appellant was convicted was found upon a re-reference of the se to the grand jury. So, even if it be conceded, which we think was never intended, that the court can inquire whether witnesses have been examined before the grand jury, in support of an indictment returned by it, no such omission existed in this case. For having previously examined the witnesses in reference to the offense charged against appellant, there was no necessity or propriety in recalling and re-examining the same witnesses, when the case was re-referred and the second indictment was found.

2d. The offense charged against appellant is robbery, committed, in the language of the indictment, "by then and there putting him (Carroll), the person robbed, in fear of immediate injury to his person, by then and there tieing him with a rope and threatening to hang him," etc.

The instruction given at the instance of the Commonwealth, to which appellant objects, authorizes the jury to convict, if the property mentioned was feloniously taken from Carroll forcibly against his will "and by putting him in fear." It is contended, that as the particular mode in which Carroll was put in fear of immediate injury to his person, is stated in the indictment, the instruction should have been equally as explicit and descriptive on that subject. The jury is, by the instruction required, before finding appellant guilty, to believe beyond a reasonable doubt that the robbery was committed by putting Carroll in fear. That was the essential fact to be established, and it was not material to recite in the instruction all the circumstances attending the transaction. And there is nothing in either of the cases referred to by counsel to the contrary.

Judgment affirmed.

BROWNING v. FIKLIN'S ADM'R.

(Filed December, 19, 1869—Not to be reported.)

Devise—Trust estate—Death of beneficiaries—Sale of property—Purchaser—Remaindermen—It appearing that the property in controversy was devised in trust for the benefit of some negroes who had been slaves, and the aged and infirm beneficiaries were dead, and the property was in such condition as to yield no income, and having been sold under decree of court, the necessity of the trust having ceased to exist, and no one complaining except the purchaser who has been invested with the title, he should be required to comply with the terms of the sale, and if the remaindermen are too young to take their portion of the proceeds, the chanceller will secure it for them.

J. W. Browning for appellant.

J. D. Hunt, R. A. Thornton, Chas. Kerr, C. Suydam Scott, Nelms Bros. and Matt Walton for appellee.

Appeal from Fayette Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Pryor.

In the year 1849, Mrs. Polly Fiklin, of the city of Lexington, by her last will made certain devises of her lands, in trust for the benefit of certain slaves that had been emancipated, the same to be applied to their use and support, and by an express provision of the will, no sale of the realty could be made unless it should become unlawful for free persons of color to remain in the State. The execution of the trust was confided to the late M. C. Johnson, who controlled the property until his death, and since his death administrator with the will annexed, has been appointed. This trust been continuing for a long period of time and was created for the rea that the emancipated negroes were in no conditon to hold it, and by on of their helplessness, unable to manage it. It is alleged and so ap s that all the parties in interest are before the court and some of the eficiaries are the plaintiffs and others the defendants, seeking a sale of property and the extinguishment of the trust, by reason of the changed lition of the negro race, and the necessity existing for the conversion he property into money, that is now yielding but little, if any, income.

aged and infirm negroes are dead, and the purposes of the trust sub ed, but if this trust is to be perpetuated, as if the condition of the bene ries had never changed, then the judgment to sell this property or a part t is erroneous. The will of Mrs. Fiklin was made in view of the in ity of the negroes, who were the object of her bounty to protect their ons or property, and for that reason she confided that right to the trus named in her will. We think under existing laws, the enactment of ch was not foreseen by the testatrix, with the helpless condition of the ro removed and all the rights of citizenship given him, the necessity for trust ceases to exist and if not under the circumstances of this case we eive no reason why the chancellor could not sell the land, and if any of remaindermen are too young to take their portion of the proceeds, the ncellor will secure it for them. At any rate the purchaser, who is the party complaining, he having refused to pay the purchase money g invested with title, must comply with the terms of sale. His ex ions were properly overruled. (Thomas v. Harkins and Wife,, 13 Bush, he judgment is affirmed.
)

GAINES v. GAINES.

(Filed June 1, 1892—Not to be reported.)

usband and wife—Divorce—Alimony—In this case the wife sued the hus d for divorce from bed and board and the husband filed a separate action absolute divorce for abandonment for one year. He owned a large estate she owned nothing. Her alleged grounds of cruel treatment were not ained by the evidence, and finding she had no assurance of securing a t of his estate, she abandoned him and refused to return except upon dition he secured to her children by a former marriage a stipulated sum money.—Held, That the abandonment of the wife was without fault of husband in the meaning of the statute, and the lower court did not err lismissing her action, and in granting him a decree from the bond of rimony. The husband paying the costs of the suits.

ppeal from Boone Circuit Court.

pinion of the court by Judge Lewis.

he parties to this litigation, Ben. R. and Phoebe E. Gaines, were mar l March 5, 1878, he being then about 57 years of age, a widower with one child, W. A. Gaines, about 25 years old, and she a widow about 41 years of age, having four children, Ida, 19; Minnie, 17; Willie, 18, and Lucy 10 years old. He was a wealthy farmer, owning about 1,000 acres of very valuable land, whereon he resided, besides a considerable amount of personal property. She then resided in the State of Missouri, owned very little, if any, property, and immediately after the marriage went to his farm in Boone county, accompanied by her children, who resided with her, and were supported by their step-father until they respectively married, Willie the last to do so, marrying in June, 1888. W. A. Gaines, his son, married in May, 1878, and after residing with his father several months, removed to another place on his land, and has continued there ever since.

July 2, 1889, Phoebe E. Gaines instituted an action against Ben. R. Gaines, for divorce from bed and board and for alimony and support during her natural life out of his estate, alleged by her to be of the value of at least $75,000. She also prayed for an injunction restraining him from selling, conveyng or concealing his property during pendency of the action. The alleged and only statutory ground upon which plaintiff asks the divorce is that almost continuously for six years and continuously for four years before commencement of the action, defendant habitually behaved towards her in such cruel and inhuman manner as to indicate a settled aversion to her and to permanently destroy her peace and happiness.

The action having been submitted for trial, final judgment was rendered at the September term, 1890, of the court, dismissing the petition. But the clerk of the court was directed to tax costs of the action against defendant, the husband, omitting all claims of mileage by witnesses and for attendance by witnesses who were not summoned by subpœna to attend before examiners. The defendant was further ordered to pay fees of plaintiff's attorneys to the amount of $250. An appeal from that judgment was taken by the plaintiff, being granted by the clerk of the Court of Appeals December 10, 1890, when the transcript was filed.

After that judgment was rendered, viz: September 12, 1890, Ben. R. Gaines instituted a distinct action against Phoebe E. Gaines for judgment of divorce from the bond of matrimony and his restoration to the condition of an unmarried man. The alleged ground of divorce asked for in that action was that May, 1889, she, without his fault abandoned him, and had since lived separate and apart from him. The defendant, not denying the abandonment, but alleging in her answer in substance that it was the fault of plaintiff, prayed judgment for alimony and reasonable support from him during her life.

April 25, 1891, final judgment was rendered in that action divorcing plaintiff from defendant as prayed for in his petition, but he was adjudged to pay costs of the action, including a fee of $100 to her attorneys. An appeal from that judgment was granted in the lower court, the transcript having been filed in the office of the clerk of the Court of Appeals, August 15, 1891. The two appeals having been before this court will, in accordance with an agreement between opposing counsel, be heard and decided together. The judgment rendered April 25, 1891, is to the extent it divorced the plaintiff from defendant not only conclusive and irreversible, but operated to prevent further prosecution by appellant of her action for divorce from bed and board and alimony. Consequently a reversal of the judgment dismissing the action she instituted would not avail her, except to the possible extent of increasing, by mandate of this court, the amount allowed by the lower court for services of her attorney. For as divorce of the wife from bed and board presupposes continued existence of the marital relation, and of her dower right as an incident, it necessarily results that no judgment therefor can be rendered or enforced subsequent to a final judgment in favor of the husband for divorce from the bond of matrimony, which terminates that relation and effectually have right of dower as well as permanent alimony.

The statute in terms authorizes an equitable allowance to the wife out of the estate of her husband on a divorce from the bond of matrimony obtained by her, not when obtained by him. Nevertheless, as heretofore held by this court, she may be entitled to the allowance, not having sufficient estate of her own, if such divorce was improperly granted to him instead of her. Appellant did not, it is true, pray in her answer judgment for divorce of herself from the bond of matrimony, still if the one in his favor was improperly rendered, it should not operate to deprive her of such allowance out of his estate as may be equitable, it being satisfactorily shown she has not sufficient estate of her own. It, therefore, seems to us the simple inquiry is whether the alleged abandonment by her for more than one year before commencement, which constituted the cause of his action, was or was not his fault. For if, as she states, his behavior to her was, for not less than six months before the separation, so cruel and inhuman as to indicate a settled aversion to her or to destroy permanently her peace and happiness, then she did, but he did not have legal cause for divorce, and consequently, though the judgment divorcing him can not now be annulled by the court, she should have an equitable allowance out of his estate, as if the divorce had been obtained by her instead of him.

The pleading to the issue in each of the cases is unnecessarily long, and as might be expected a great deal of the unusually large mass of testimony is both contradictory and irrelevant. But we have had no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the plaintiff, in the first action signally failed to sustain the ground upon which she asked judgment of divorce from bed and board, and therefore abandonment of her husband was in meaning of the statute not his but her fault. There is no proof of personal violence to her by him, nor threat to do any; nor does it appear he failed to suitably and comfortably support and maintain either her or her four children, while they remained members of his household; and although each one of her children testified as a witness and referred minutely to his conduct and speech from the marriage separation with a manifest inclination to put the most unfavorable construction upon them, they do not state that he ever misused or complained of having them to support. The evidence shows he was easily excited, yet soon molified, and occasionally used rough and profane, but never vulgar language, and some of the witnesses testified he a few times when provoked cursed her, though he certainly was not in the habit of using profane language, if he ever did, about which there is doubt— his common expressions being "dang it," "durn it," sometimes "God damn it." But in every instance when it is proved he used improper language, it was on account of, or connected with her alleged neglect of some household duty, and although there is proof of several occasions during their married life when he used to her highly improper and rough language, the evidence falls far short of showing that such conduct was either habitual or frequent. So far from such being the case, it is evident he married her, not from sordid motives but from love, and on the whole was as affectionate, patient and just in his treatment of her, as husbands generally are.

Long continued grievances are alleged in her petition, but it seems to us a reasonable explanation of them is, that she became discontented with her lot as a farmer's wife and indisposed to make the best of it, though of her own seeking, especially after all her children had married and gone away, without an assurance or hope of getting part of her husband's estate. She had ample opportunity before marrying him to inform herself of his character and disposition, and of the duties and responsibilities that would rest upon her as wife of a wealthy, yet plain, economical and pushing farmer; for not only had she been for a long time acquainted with him, but the courtship between them was begun at his house while she was a visitor. The specific charge that he used insulting and profane language to her that she could no longer endure, does not seem to us to have been the immediate or controlling cause of the abandonment, for his conduct in that respect, was, according to the proof she attempted to make, not different from or worse than what it had been from the beginning.

Although appellee's son had since his marriage worked on his father's farm as a hand he had been given no land until a short time before the separation, when he purchased and had conveyed to him two small tracts. And that transaction coming to the knowledge of appellee about three weeks before she left, so displeased her that she did not thereafter occupy the same bed with her husband. It further appears that after she left, appellee visited her for the purpose of inducing her to return, and the evidence is satisfactory to us she was willing to do so upon condition he secured to her children out of his estate, a stipulated amount of money, which he declined to do, and even then after she commenced her action for divorce from bed and board, with a view to permanent alimony, without impairing her dower right.

In our opinion, appellant abandoned her husband without his fault, in meaning of the statute, and therefore the lower court did not err either in dismissing her action or granting to appellee a divorce from the bond of matrimony without any allowance to her out of his estate.

We see no reason for an increase of the allowance of $250 to her attorneys, for if there was an unusual amount of labor done by them, appellee has been already taxed heavily and to a considerable extent needlessly.

Judgment in each case affirmed.

MASVILLE & BIG SANDY R. R. CO. v. PELHAM.

(Filed October 27, 1892—Not to be reported.)

Condemnation of land—Verdict—Compromise change of owners—Suit for trespass—Settlement—Parol evidence—Indefinite judgment—The land in controversy was condemned for railroad purposes over 40 years ago, and the damages fixed at $2,100 and subsequently compromised by the company, paying $1,085 and agreeing to erect certain fencing on the property. Since then the road has changed hands twice and now belongs to the appellant. This suit was brought by appellee for trespass and for the land.—Held, That it was competent to show by parol evidence that the damages had been settled, and, under the circumstances no court would require the surrender of the title or the right to the use for the purposes contemplated, although the judgment or inquest fails to describe the land. A verdict of $650 is set aside on the ground that the instructions are misleading, and not sustained by the evidence.

Wadsworth & Son and Cochran & Son for appellant.

E. L. Worthington, Garrett S. Wall and T. C. Campbell for appellee.

Appeal from Mason Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Pryor.

This is an action of trespass quare clausum with the defense of likewise tenementum. It appears that so far back as the year 1853, a railroad company organized under a charter granted by the legislature condemned the land of the appellee for railroad purposes and entered upon the premises condemned. The railroad company appealed from the verdict which was $2,100 and subsequently paid $1,085 of that sum on a compromise, by the terms of which it was to erect certain fencing on the premises condemned or along the line of its road. The company failed and the road passed into the hands of the Great Eastern R. R. Co., and in the year 1873 that company undertook to work on the land when the appellee claimed that the damages had not been paid, under the assessment of 1853 and that no work could be done until the money was paid. The engineer said he had been informed the damages had been paid and that if the hands were permitted to go to work and it turned out that the money had not been paid the company would at once make payment. This company worked the road for a time and then suspended, when the road with all its appurtenances, passed to the appellant, the Maysville & Big Sandy R. R. Co., and that company entering on the road within the Pelham boundary and beginning its work, the appellee brought this action for damages. The only issue it seems to us is as to the value of the borrow pit, if not before condemned, and the question as to whether the judgment of condemnation had been satisfied. We think the evidence is not only competent but conclusive as to this issue. The appeal was filed away in 1854 and a payment made exceeding the value of the land taken and fencing built by the company, in execution of the compromise. Chiles, the engineer so states and the circumstances of the filing away of the appeal, the overpayment of the actual value of the land, the erection of the fencing, all transpiring more than forty years, ago seems to us should put the question at rest. But it is contended that the writ or judgment condemning this property is too indefinite, and that a verbal compromise was not sufficient to divest the appellee of title.

The entry was made forty years ago and the land placed in the actual occupancy of the original company. The money had been paid and the road constructed and operated by the second company, and under such circumstances no court would require the surrender of this title or the right to the user for the purposes contemplated by the judgment, although the judgment or inquest may fail to describe the land. The engineer proves that the land in controversy, is the identical land condemned and of this there can be no doubt. The title and possession was protected sufficiently to defeat the action of trespass, and really the only defense is, that the appellant is using more land than was condemned. It was competent to show that the claim for damages had been settled and to show this fact by parol, and the statement of Chiles satisfied the jury that the parties had received all they were entitled to receive—if not satisfied of that fact the verdict would have been for the difference between the sum paid and the amount of the judgment. The verdict was for $650 and this must have been on the idea that the appellants had no right to enter and that the land belonged to the plaintiff. If the company used a borrow pit not condemned, still the damage could not have been as much as this verdict and, therefore, the verdict was the result of instructions that were misleading.

There are only two issues in this case and the trial of one of these issues upon the testimony before us must necessarily have been for the defendant, viz., the issue as to payment or the settlement of the judgment—the other issue was as to the quantity of the land taken by the appellant or those under whom it claims, beyond the actual quantity condemned, and there is but little, if any, testimony to sustain the plaintiff on that issue. The case must, however, go back for a new trial and what may be developed in the next trial, this court has no right to anticipate.

The judgment is reversed and cause remanded with directions to award a new trial and for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

NEWTON v. LEVY.

(Filed January 16, 1892—Not to be reported.)

Purchase of mill—Knowledge of its condition—Hard bargain—Fraud—The appellant purchased a mill at the price of $2,950.00, paid one third down and executed his two notes for $983.33 each for the balance. He paid the first note and made no complaint until suit was brought on the second note, and he now alleges fraud in the sale.—Held, The proof conduces to show that appellant made the purchase with his eyes open. He was at the mill and examined its condition, and while not a miller he must have seen that the building was in a decayed condition. The proof of appellant if uncontradicted makes out a case where he paid too much money for an old mill, and, instead of relying on his own judgment confided in the statement of the appellee, and when all the evidence is considered there is no reason for the interference of the chancellor.

B. L. D. Guffy and Jno. L. Scott for appellant.

Edward W. Hines and W. A. Helm for appellee.

Appeal from Butler Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Pryor.

This action to enforce a lien for the purchase money was defended on the ground of fraudulent representations, made by the plaintiff, who was the vendor, as to the condition of the mill and machinery for which the note was executed. That the representations consisted in the statement that the mill and machinery was in good repair when the building was worthless, nd required in a year after, tearing down and re-building. The charge of raud or misrepresentation is shown by the testimony of several witnesses, ut rebutted by the testimony for the plaintiff. The proof conduces to show hat the appellee examined the building before he purchased it, and from the estimony it must have been apparent to him that the building was worthess and would have to be remodeled in a short time. The proof on the part f the appellee shows he informed the appellant that the mill house would ave to be rebuilt at the time of the sale, and the purchase was in fact made ith that understanding. The appellant purchased one fourth of this propty; one-fourth interest was sold to Cole & Bros; one-fourth to Hudwall nd the remaining one fourth the appellant retained.

The proof is conflicting but conduces to show that the appellant made the urchase with his eyes open. He was at the mill and examined its conition, and while not a miller he could see and must have seen that the uilding was in a decayed condition—in fact he stated to two or more witesses that the building would have to be repaired or a new one built. We hink the testimony establishes the fact that this purchase was a hard barain, nothing more.

The appellant paid one-third of the money down and executed his two notes for $983.33 each. He paid the first note and made no complaint, ntil this lien was sought to be enforced, as to any fraud practiced on him y the appellee. After the issue had been made up, the appellant offered to le an amended answer setting up a fraudulent representation made to him s to the lease of the water power for thirty years and to the ownership f the ground, a fact if it existed he must have known, when his original nswer was filed.

The court below refused its filing and abused no discretion in declining o permit a new issue.

This case was consolidated with an action for the sale of the mill propty, a dissolution of the partnership and a distribution of the assets. The ther partners make no defense, but testify as to the representations made y the appellee to them as to what it would cost to repair the mill buildng. The building stood on the ground and was not hidden from the view f these purchasers; and their proof, if uncontradicted, makes out a case here they paid too much money for an old mill and, instead of relying on heir own judgment, confided in the statement of the appellee, and when all he testimony is considered there is no reason for the interference of the hancellor.

Judgment affirmed.

DAVIDSON, &c. v. HAYDEN, &c.

(Filed January 30, 1897—Not to be reported)

1. Levy of execution—Indemnifying bond—Liability of sureties for the acts of the marshal—The return upon the execution shows that the marshal levied it, not upon a joint interest or partnership property, but upon 4,000 pounds of tobacco belonging to the defendants in the execution. The plaintiff gave an indemnifying bond and required the marshal to sell the property. It cannot now be said by the sureties on the bond that some one had or claimed a joint interest in the tobacco with the defendants in the execution, and therefore, the officers should have returned the execution with the levy endorsed and not have sold the tobacco. Held—That the sureties having enabled the plaintiff in the execution to enforce his demand on the officer by the execution of the bond, and the officer being damaged in consequence of the seizure and sale of the tobacco, the sureties should be required to pay it.

2. Authority of marshal—Under section 7 of the new charter of the town of Salem (Acts 1889-90, p. 589) we are of the opinion that the marshal had the right to collect the execution under which the sale was made, and the consequent authority to take the indemnifying bond, although the levy was made outside the corporate limits of the town of Salem.

James & James and Bush & Worlen for appellant.

John K. Hendrick for appellee.

Appeal from Livingston Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

This action is on an indemnifying bond, executed by the appellants as the sureties of Ben. Shoecraft. An execution was issued by a justice of the peace of Livingston county, on a judgment in favor of Ben. Shoecraft v. J. H. Greenlee and J. A. Barsher. It was placed in the hands of the appellee, Hayden, marshal of the town of Salem, in Livingston county, for collection. He proceeded to levy it on property outside of the corporate limits of Salem, but in Livingston county. The plaintiff in the execution required that the marshal should sell the property under execution, and to indemnify him, executed the indemnifying bond in suit. It turned out that the property sold under the execution was not subject to levy and sale under it, and those owning it brought suit against the appellee and recoverd damages for the wrongful seizure and sale of the property. The return on the execution shows that the marshal levied it, not upon a joint interest or partnership property, but upon 4,000 pounds of tobacco belonging to John Brasher and Henry Greenlee, the defendants in the execution.

The plaintiff demanded a sale of the property and the marshal, having a doubt whether it was subject to the execution, he required indemnifying bond in suit. The conclusive presumption in this case is that the plaintiff in the execution denied that any one was the owner of or had any interest in the property levied on, except the defendants in the execution. Therefore, he gave the indemnifying bond and required the marshal to sell the property levied upon. While the owners may have claimed a joint interest in it with the defendants in the execution, still the plaintiff denied such claim and compelled the marshal to sell it by giving the indemnifying bond.

It can not now be said by the sureties on the bond that some one had or claimed a joint interest in the tobacco, with the defendants in the execution, and that, therefore, the officer should have returned the execution with the levy indorsed, and not have sold the tobacco. The officer could not have done this because the plaintiff in the execution required him to sell it all as the property of his debtors. The appellants enabled the plaintiff in the execution to enforce his demand on the officer by the execution of the bond, and thereby agreeing to "indemnify him against the damages which he may sustain in consequence of the seizure or sale of the property".

This action was brought to compel the appellants to perform their undertaking. The officer was damaged in consequence of the seizure and sale of the property, and the appellants should be required to pay it.

Upon the examination of section 7, of the new charter of the town of Salem (Acts 1889-90, p. 589), we are of the opinion that the marshal had the right to collect the execution under which the sale was made, and the consequent authority to take the indemnifying bond.

The judgment is affirmed.

CITY OF LOUISVILLE v. SELVAGE, &c.

(Filed January 29, 1902—Not to be reported.)

Apportionment warrant—Liability of city for 10 per cent. damages—Costs of former appeal—On the former appeal this court held that Bullitt was liable only for 90 per cent. of the apportionment warrant. Upon the return of the case Bullitt's part was paid and appellees filed an amended petition claiming against appellant city ten per cent. of the warrant, and interest on the whole sum of the apportionment, and also for costs incurred in the case against Bullitt, and the costs paid on the appeal, and judgment was rendered for appellees for the ten per cent. on the apportionment warrant of Bullitt, for interest on the whole amount of the warrant till Bullitt's part was paid, and for $101.05, costs, heretofore incurred.—Held, That there was no error in rendering judgment against appellant city for ten per cent. of the apportionment warrant, which the former opinion held could not be recovered from the property holder, Bullitt; but the court erred in adjudging to appellee, interest on the full amount of the apportionment warrant, or on any amount of the warrant, till the reapportionment by the court under the mandate of this court. The court also erred in adjudging the costs of the former appeal against appellant as that was costs of reapportionment, and, in a case wherein appellant was not a party to the appeal.

H. L. Stone for appellant.

Lane & Harrison for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Chancery Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge White.

This is the second appeal of this case. The former appeal was styled Joshua F Bullitt v. Selvage, &c., and the opinion is found in 20 Ky. Law Rep., 599.

The action was originally brought against Bullitt, the City of Louisville and various property owners along the street improved. The first judgment was against Bullitt, for the full amount of the apportionment warrant, against his property. On appeal this court held that he was liable for only ninety per cent. of the warrant and remanded the case for judgment for that sum or proportion of the warrant. Upon return of the case Bullitt's part was paid and appellee filed an amended petition claiming against the appellant city ten per cent. of the warrant, under the former opinion of this court, and also claimed interest on the whole sum of the apportionment warrant and further, claimed judgment for costs incurred in the case against Bullitt and the costs paid on the appeal. Appellant pleaded to the amended petition. (1) statute of five years limitation, (2) res adjudicata, (3) a denial of liability for either interest or costs.

The action was submitted for judgment on petition and answer. Judgment was rendered for appellees for the ten per cent. on the apportionment warrant of Bullitt, for interest on the whole amount of the warrant till Bullitt's part was paid and for costs, $101.05, heretofore incurred. From that judgment, this appeal is prosecuted.

As it appears from the record, this action was first begun against the city in 1893, there can be no question of limitation as that was less than one year from the execution of the work. The plea of res adjudicata is likewise bad, for it is not alleged, nor does the record show, that the judgment rendered against Bullitt disposed of the case as to the city or denied appellees a right of recovery against the city. There was no adjudication between the appellant city and the appellees. We are of opinion, therefore, that there was no error in rendering judgment against appellant city for ten per cent. of the apportionment warrant, which the former opinion held could not be recovered form the property holder, Bullitt.

The court erred in adjudging to appellee interest on the full amount of the apportionment warrant, or on any amount of the warrant till the reapportionment by the court on the return of the case, under the mandate of this court. Likewise, there was error to adjudge against appellant the costs on the former appeal, as that was costs of reapportionment and in a case wherein appellant was not a party to the appeal. This was expressly decided by this court in Gosnell v. City of Louisville, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 522, and City of Louisville v. Selvage, &c., 21 Ky. Law Rep., 349. In each of these cases the court expressly held that the city was not liable for interest or costs until a reapportionment had been made. These cases were decided under the same law as the present case and is, therefore, binding on us here.

For the errors indicated, the judgment is reversed and cause remanded with directions to render judgment for appellees for ten per cent. of the apportionment warrant with interest from the date of filing the amended petition and for costs subsequently accruing since the reapportionment.

The court delivered the following response to petition for rehearing:

In the petition for rehearing it is insisted that the court has erred in applying the rule as to interest and costs as laid down in Gosnel v. City of Louisville, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 522, and in City of Louisville v. Selvage, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 349.

Counsel insists that the contracts made in those two cases were entered into after the act of July 1, 1893, and as the contract in this case was entered into under the act of April 1, 1886, a different rule must apply. We have examined the records in the two cases cited. The record in the Gosnel case shows that contract was made on April 26, 1894, and so was after the act of July, 1893. But the contract in the Selvage case was made May 18, 1892, which was prior to the act of July, 1893, and was under the act of April 1, 1886, the same as in this case. So it appears that this court has held, under the act of April, 1886, as well as under the act of July, 1893, the city was not liable for interest or costs until the apportionment is corrected. As these two acts are entirely inconsistent we must conclude that the decisions were made irrespective of the statutory provision. In neither opinion is any reference made to the statute as a reason why there is no liability.

The court said in the Gosnel case, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 522: "Nor should interest upon the whole amount of the contract price be allowed against the city, for, while the rule may seem harsh, the contractor must be assumed to have entered into the contract with his eyes open as to its provisions and their enforcibility." This was followed in the Selvage case. The question does not depend upon the language of either the act of 1886 or of 1898. The rule is the same in either case.

Petition overruled.

JONES' ADM'R v. ILLINOIS CENTRAL R. R. CO, &c.

(Filed February 18, 1902—Not to be reported.)

1. Action for wrongful killing—Qualification of administrator—Residence of Intestate—Pleading—Where an administrator was appointed in C. county and filed suit against the railroad company in L. county for the wrongful killing of his intestate, and after answer was filed by the railroad company denying that the intestate was, at the time of his death a resident of C. county, and that appellant was duly appointed and qualified as his administrator, an amended answer was offered by appellee and rejected, asking that R. be made a party to the action upon the ground that he claimed to have been appointed administrator of the intestate in M. county—Held, That this was error. Appellees were entitled to have the M. county administrator made a party to the action so that, in the event of a judgment in favor of the C. county administrator, the former would be bound thereby.

2. Peremptory instruction—Question for jury—It was error of the court, upon the contention of the testimony, to give a peremptory instruction to the jury to find for appellees, upon the ground that there was no testimony to support the contention that the intestate was at the time of his death, a resident of C. county, in view of the testimony of the widow to the effect that she married the intestate in C. county, and they lived together there and never resided at any other place, and all their household furniture had always been kept there since their marriage; and this, with the conflicting testimony was evidence to go to the jury in support of the jurisdiction assumed by the C. County Court.

Molloy & Utley, J. K. Hendrick and Hazelrigg & Chenault for appellant.

Pirtle & Trabue, P. H. Darby and Wilson & James for appellees.

Appeal from Lyon Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge DuRelle.

Having been appointed administrator of William Jones, deceased, by the Carlisle County Court, appellant instituted this action in the Lyon Circuit Court to recover of the appellee railroad company and a conductor and engineer of said company in its employ, $10,000 damages for the death of his intestate, alleged to have been caused by the gross negligence of the appellees in making a running switch at Cumberland River, in Lyon county.

The appellee company filed a petition in proper form to transfer the case as to it to the United States Circuit Court for the District of Kentucky, alleging a separable cause of action as against it. This motion was overruled, and the action of the court seems supported by the cases of Pugh v. C. & O. Ry. Co., 19 Ky. Law Rep., 149; C. & O. R. Co. v. Dixon's Adm'r., 20 Ky. Law Rep., 792; Kane v. City of Indianapolis, 82 F. R., 770.

After the filing of an answer to the merits, in which it was denied that appellant's intestate was, at the time of his death, a resident or citizen of Carlisle county, Kentucky, and that appellant was duly appointed and qualified as his administrator, an amended answer was offered and rejected, asking that F. G. Rudolph be made a party to the action, upon the ground that he claimed to have been appointed by the McCracken County Court, administrator of the same intestate, and as such administrator was seeking to recover damages for the death of said intestate in the same court in which this action was pending. The action of the circuit court in rejecting this amendment was, we think, erroneous. Appellees were entitled to have the McCracken administrator made a party to the action, so that, in the event of a judgment in favor of the Carlisle administrator, the former would be bound thereby.

Upon the conclusion of the testimony the court gave a peremptory instruction in favor of appellees, upon the ground, apparently, that there was no testimony to support the contention that the intestate was, at the time of his death, a resident of Carlisle county. This, we think, was erroneous, in view of the testimony of the widow, whose testimony is to the effect that she married the intestate in Carlisle county, that they lived together there, that they never resided at any other place, and that all of their household furniture had always been kept there since the marriage. And while she also testifies to facts which militate strongly against her theory of her husband's residence, and there is considerable testimony upon the other side in contradiction of it, we think her testimony was evidence to go to the jury in support of the jurisdiction assumed by the Carlisle County Court. (Jacob v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 10 Bush, 263.)

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with and directions to award appellant a new trial, and for further proceedings consistent herewith.

FRANKLIN CIRCUIT COURT.

THE BOARD OF COUNCILMEN OF THE CITY OF FRANKFORT v. THE STATE NATIONAL BANK OF FRANKFORT.

SAME v. SAME.

(Entered April 27, 1904.)

Opinion by Judge J. E. Cantrill.

These causes coming on for trial and heard together, by consent, the court eing advised, and being of opinion that defendant is liable to plaintiff for he taxes sued for, for five years prior to the institution of this suit, upon he assessed value of the shares of its stock ($150,000) for the years 1896 to 900, inclusive, less the assessed value of the real estate of defendant, together with 8 per cent. interest thereon, from the 1st day of October in each ear after said tax became due; and also for the taxes sued for, for the ears 1901, 1902 and 1903, upon the assessed value of its shares ($180,000), less he assessed value of its real estate. (Plaintiff, by leave of court, having led herein a certified statement of the assessed value of defendant's real tate, for the years 1896 to 1903, inclusive, marked "real estate.")

IN CASE NO. 22,916.

It is, therefore, adjudged that the several demurrers of defendant to the etition and amended petitions herein be overruled, and the demurrer of laintiff to the defendant's answer, as amended, be and the same is hereby ustained, and, defendant declining to plead further, it is now ordered and djudged that defendant pay to plaintiff or its attorneys, the following ums for taxes and interest aforesaid (being the city taxes due under the vies for each of said years on the assessed value of the shares of stock $150,-00, less the assessed value of the real estate of defendant).

For the year 1896—$1.45 on $150,000, amounting to the sum of $2,175, with per cent. interest thereon from the 1st day of October, 1900, until paid, —; for the year 1897—$1.45 on $150,000, amounting to the sum of $2,175; with per cent. interest thereon from the 1st day of October, 1900, until paid, $—; or the year 1898—$1.45 on $150,000, amounting to the sum of $2,175, with 8 er cent. interest thereon from the 1st day of October, 1900, until paid, $—; or the year 1899—$1.45 on $148,000, amounting to the sum of $2,146, with 8 per ent. interest thereon from the 1st day of October, 1900, until paid, $—; for he year 1900—$1.45 on $145,000, amounting to the sum of $2,125, with 8 per ent. interest thereon from the first day of October, 1900, until paid, $—; ogether with plaintiff's costs herein expended. To all of which defendant xcepts and prays an appeal to the Court of Appeals, which is granted.

AND IN CASE NO. 23,479.

It is also adjudged that the demurrers of defendant to the petition, as mended, be overruled, and the demurrer of plaintiff to the answer as mended (also considered as filed herein) is hereby sustained; and defend-nt declining to plead further, it is now ordered and adjudged that defend-nt, State National Bank, pay to plaintiffs, or its attorneys, the following ums for taxes and interest sued for, for the years 1901, 1902, 1903, being ity taxes on the assessed value of said shares ($180,000), less the assessed alue of real estate ($5,000), viz.:

For the year 1901—$1,45 on $175,000, $2,537.50, together with 8 per cent. in-erest from October 1, 1901, $—; for the year 1902—$1,70 on $175,000, $2,975, with 8 per cent. interest from October 1, 1902, $—; for the year 1903, $1.70 on $175,000, $2,975, with 8 per cent. interest from October 1, 1903, $—; together with plaintiff's costs herein expended. To all which defendant excepts and prays an appeal to the Court of Appeals, which is granted.

COURT OF APPEALS OF KENTUCKY.

WAYLAND, &c. v. BROWNING.

(Filed September 21, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Lands—Passways—Conveyances—Where one for a valuable consideration onveyed to another the right to pass along a strip of land sixteen feet in width, n action brought by others alleging ownership of the land and asking that heir title be quieted, was properly dismissed, the commissioner who conveyed the lands of a decedent under an order of court only conveying to the endor of the claimant in the action a right of passway one pole wide, the ontention of the claimants being that the strip sixteen feet wide passed to hem instead of the mere passway.

H. Clay White for appellants.

C. C. Cram for appellee.

Appeal from Grant Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

On May 28, 1903, T. J. Browning for valuable consideration in writing, onveyed to Raymond Snow the right to pass along a sixteen foot strip of nd lying along the south line of Raymond Snow's lot from the west end f his lot out to the turnpike, Snow agreeing not to obstruct the strip so as o obstruct the passage over it of W. S. or Richard Wayland. The Wayands brought this suit against Browning and Snow, alleging that the sixeen foot strip was their property and praying that their title to it be uieted. The court dismissed their petition and they have appealed. The ights of the parties depend upon the partition of the lands of Indiana Anerson under whom they all claim. In that suit lot No. 4 fell to Matilda nderson under whom Browning claims and lot No. 6 to James Vanarsdall nder whom the Waylands claim. The commissioner's report, so far as aterial, reads as follows:

"Lot No 4 to Matilda Anderson (here follows courses and distances of the ot). Lot No. 6 to James Vanarsdall (here follows courses and distances f the lot) We laid off passway to lot No. 6, from the turnpike road to gure 4 one pole wide and on lot No. 4 along line binding on lot No. 1."

The deeds follow the commissioner's report literally. The claim of the Waylands that they own the sixteen foot strip rests on the idea that not a mere passway was allotted to them, but that the strip of sixteen feet passed to them.

The language of the commissioners' report does not properly bear this construction. The commissioners only laid off a passway. They did not undertake to give to James Vanarsdall any part of lot 4 except a passway one pole wide. The whole of lot 4 was allowed to Matilda Anderson. The only restriction laid upon her title is the statement that they laid off a passway one pole wide for the benefit of lot No. 6, made by the commissioners in the conclusion of their report.

Judgment affirmed.

GARRARD v. BLACKBURN, &c.

(Filed September 21, 1904.)

1. Damages—Pleading—In an action for damages for the wrongful cutting of timber, a judgment for defendants will not be disturbed where the instructions were simple and were not objected to by either of the parties, where there was no demurrer to the answer, and a reply filed putting in issue all the affirmative allegations of the answer. If there was any defect in the answer it was cured by the verdict.

2. Instructions—Where the instructions do not submit the precise issue as made in the pleadings, no objection having been made to them, the verdict of the jury will not be disturbed, no other instructions having been asked and which if given would not have affected the result.

Thos. R. Brown A. J. Garred and Alex Lackey for appellant.

W. D O'Neal R. T. & M. S. Burns for appellees.

Appeal from Lawrence Circuit Court

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Appellant filed this suit to recover of appellees for certain timber cut as he alleged from his land. The defendants admitted cutting the timber but denied that it was cut from appellants' land The case was submitted to the jury who found for the defendants and judgment having been entered upon the verdict, plaintiff appeals. It is insisted for him that there was a misconception of the pleadings and the case was tried on an issue not made. But our attention is not called to any error of the court in the admission or rejection of evidence, and on reading the transcript we do not find that there was any ruling of the court on this subject to which exception was reserved, that is correct. The instructions given by the court are very simple and were not objected to by either party. There was no demurrer to the answer. Plaintiff filed a reply putting in issue its affirmative allegations and the case was tried on the issues thus made. If there was any defect in the answer it was cured by the verdict.

The plaintiff alleged that he was the owner and in possession of the tract of land bounded by the division line made by Ulysses Garred and D. W. Garred by written agreement made on March 3, 1869, and that D. W. Garred afterwards conveyed the land on his side of the division line to those under om he claimed; that thereafter Ulysses Garred conveyed to Henry Black rn, under whom defendants claimed, the land lying on their side of the ision line and that the defendants had cut timber within the boundary braced in the deed from D. W. Garred to him. The defendants denied at the lines of plaintiff's land ran as stated in the petition or included y of the timber which they cut. They denied that the plaintiff owned e timber or the land on which the timber grew, or that the timber grew on land inside of the lines of the deed under which plaintiff claims. ey alleged that the timber grew upon land conveyed by Ulysses Garred Henry Blackburn. The plaintiff had set out himself fully the division e made by the Garreds. The answer must be read in connection with the ition, and when so read, aptly made the issue that the timber which de- dants had cut was on their side of this division line.

The affirmative matter in the answer having been denied by the reply the urt properly overruled the motion to enter judgment for the plaintiff twithstanding the verdict for the defendant; for it cannot be said that der the pleadings a judgment could have been entered for the plaintiff. he had introduced no proof. While the instructions of the court did not bmit to the jury the issues precisely as made in the pleadings, they were t objected to.

Plaintiff did not ask on the trial any instructions submitting the case to e jury on any other basis than that given in the instructions of the court, d from a reading of the record we do not see that if the instructions had en worded differently this could have affected the result; for the reason at the jury seem to have passed on the actual location of the dividing line tween the parties and to have found for the defendants on their location the line. While the evidence is conflicting we cannot disturb the verdict the ground that it is palpably against the evidence.

Judgment affirmed.

W. H. Holt for plaintiffs.

W. R. Ramsey and M. H. Rhorer for defendants.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

At a primary election held in the Eleventh Congressional District for the purpose of nominating a Republican candidate for Congress to be voted for at the November election 1904, W. G. Hunter and D. C. Edwards were rival candidates for the nomination, and each of them claims to have received a majority of the votes cast at the primary, and consequently entitled to be declared the nominee. It appears, however, that at a meeting held at Middlesboro, August 17th, 1904, attended by the defendants, eight of whom are chairmen respectively of the county Republican committees of that number of counties of the Eleventh Congrressional District, and three of whom were proxies respectively for the chairmen of the Republican committees of three other counties of that district—a canvass was made or attempted to be made by them of the returns from each of the 19 counties of the district, as the result of which it was decided that the defendant, W. G. Hunter, had received a majority of the votes cast at the primary election and he was thereupon awarded a certificate, declaring him the nominee.

The injunction, the dissolution of which is now sought by the defendants, was issued by the circuit judge at the instance of D. C. Edwards and other plaintiffs. By it the members of the Republican district committee of the Eleventh Congressional District, including such of the defendants as are members of that committee, are commanded to meet at Somerset, Pulaski county, Spetember 21st, 1904, and canvass the votes as returned from each of the counties for the purpose of ascertaining which of the contending candidates is entitled to the nomination, and to issue to the successful party a certificate, declaring him the nominee.

The petition, as amended, charges error in the count as made by the defendants at Middlesboro, denies their authority to act, and charges fraud upon their part in reaching the result declared by them. It is not proper for the case to be decided at this juncture upon its merits. We can only determine whether the facts appearing upon the face of the record authorized the granting of the mandatory injunction. It could have been granted in this case upon but one ground, viz: That the committee which canvassed the votes at Middlesboro, was not legally constituted, and were consequently without authority to act in the premises Fraud or irregularity in conducting an election, certifying the returns, or in the manner of canvassing the vote, ascertaining or certifying the result, cannot be made the subject of inquiry in an action for mandamus or mandatory injunction against the officers, committee, party authorities, charged by law with the duty of merely canvassing the vote and ascertaining and declaring the result. Such matters can be inquired into but it must be done by con-ting the election as provided by the statute, under which all primary ctions that are held in this State must be conducted. (Ky. Statutes, sec- 3; Henry v. Secrest, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1505; Steele v. Mead, 98 Ky., 614; ne v. Berry, 96 Ky , 63; Anderson v. Likens, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1001; pe v. Kenner, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1343).

Likewise where a canvass of the returns has been made, and the result of election or primary declared by the officers or committee charged by with the performance of that duty, no power exists in such officers or mmittee to make a recount, nor can a chancellor compel them to do so, wever erroneous, or fraudulent the result. In such a case the wronged ndidate must resort to a contest before the proper tribunal for the enforce- nt of his right to the nomination or office in question. (McCreary on ctions, sec. 267.) But if as contended by plaintiffs, the committee which t at Middlesboro, was not legally constituted, it was without power to , therefore, there has been no canvass of the votes, and no ascertainment the result of the primary election, in the Eleventh Congressional Dis- ct. It becomes necessary, therefore, to determine whether the committee s legally constituted. The legislature of this State enacted a statute viding for and regulating the holding, by political parties, of primary elec- ns, for nominating party candidates for office.

n Brown v. Republican Executive Committee, &c., 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1, it was held that a primary election not conducted as prescribed by the tute is unlawful. In Young, &c. v. Beckham, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 2135, it s said, in construing the statute, supra, "When section 1565 says that the icle shall apply to all elections held for the purpose of nominating can- ates for State, county, district or municipal offices, it must have meant t the committee or governing authority of the party, can ascertain and tify the result of the primary held to nominate candidates for such offices, the Secretary of State, because it is provided in section 1653, that the mmittee or governing authority of the party may order a primary elec- n. In addition to that, section 1563 provides that the committee or gov- ing authority in the county or district are empowered to count the votes. * * If the committee or governing authority can call and hold a pri- ry election, the same authority can certify to the Secretary of State the nes of the parties who are entitled to be placed upon the official ballot. * * The committee should follow strictly the provisions of the statute ulating the holding of the primary election; unless this is done the risk aken that they may not be able to have those who are declared to be the ninees, placed upon the ballot at the regular election."

The governing authority in the Eleventh Congressional District is the trict committee, made up of the chairmen of the several Republican com- ttees of the counties composing that district. The primary election ich is the subject of investigation in this case, was called by the district mmittee as thus constituted. It was therefore, the duty of the same com- ttee, following the holding of the election, to meet, canvass the returns de of the votes cast in the primary, ascertain the result, and declare as nominee of the Republican party the person who received the highest mber of votes therein. The presence at the meeting of a majority of the trict committee was necessary to constitute a quorum. It appears that there were but eight members of the committee present at the Middlesboro meeting. Three other persons, holding the proxies of that number of absent members of the district committee, were also present at the meeting, and acted with the eight members of the committee mentioned, in the work of canvassing the votes returned from the several counties, and in ascertaining the result and in declaring the defendant, Hunter, the nominee. If the three persons thus acting with the eight members of the district committee, were legally empowered by the written proxies received by them of three absent members of the committee, to perform any and all duties that were incumbent upon or might have been properly performed by the principals, if present, it follows that they with the eight members of the committee constituted a majority of the district committee, as there are 19 counties in the district, and therefore, 19 members of the committee. It is insisted for the defendants that the members of the district committee are not officers, but merely agents of a political organization, and that whatever powers they possess may be delegated by them to others. In support of which it is said that members of party committees frequently give proxies under which others are permitted to act for them, and section 4, book of rules of the Republican organizaiton of Kentucky, is cited by counsel as authorizing the use of proxies.

Doubtless the use of proxies is more or less common to all political organizations, but rule 4, of the Republican party book referred to, relates only to members of the State Central Committee, and an examination of the contents of the book in question will show no other rule allowing the use of proxies, except by members of the State Central Committee, as provided by section 4.

The question under consideration is not one of party custom, but of law, for by the enactment of the statute, supra, it was the purpose of the legislature to have primary elections conducted according to law. We must, therefore look to the provisions of the statute to ascertain the duties and powers of those who are to conduct them.

While those who constitute the membership of the governing authority of a political organization are not officers in the technical meaning of that term, the duties required of them by the statute are official in character because they must be performed as therein prescribed, and penalties are provided by the statute for the failure to so perform them.

Thus it is provided in section 1563 that "Before entering upon the discharge of the duties set forth in this article, the committee or governing authority shall be sworn by some officer authorized by law to administer an oath, to faithfully and honestly discharge the duties herein imposed; and the failure upon the part of any member of the committee or governing authority to discharge such duties faithfully and honestly, shall be deemed a misdemeanor, and the person so offending shall, upon indictment and conviction in the circuit court of the county or district, be fined not less than $100, nor more than $500, and be imprisoned in the county jail not less than 60 days and not more than one year."

In Young, &c. v. Beckham, supra, it is said of the above section that "A cursory reading of the section might make an impression upon the reader that this only required that the committee or governing authority should take this oath when organized to determine a contest, but a more careful reading of the section shows that it must be taken before entering upon the discharge of the duties set forth in this article. Many duties are required to be performed by the committee or governing authority of a party under the article. The article is composed of several sections, in which the various duties are designated." It is conceded that the members of the district committee and proxies by whom the canvass of the vote was made at Middlesboro were only sworn at the time of, or just before the beginning of the work that was there performed by them. The duties required of the district committee in the matter of calling and holding the primary, as well as in ascertaining and declaring the result, are defined by the statute and we do not find in the statute or in the printed rules of the Republican party organization of the State, any provision allowing the members of the district committee to delegate to others, by proxy or otherwise, the performance of the duties with which they alone seem to be entrusted by the statute.

It is, therefore, reasonable to conclude that if it had been contemplated by the legislature, that members of the district committee should delegate to others the performance of the duties required of them by the statute regulating primary elections, a provision to that effect would have been inserted in the statute. The fact that the members of the committee must be sworn to faithfully perform their duties, indicates that they alone must perform them. This construction of the statute is not only reasonable, but will serve to prevent designing persons, under the cover of proxies procured of members of the committee, from creating opportunities for tampering with election returns, or engaging in other like corrupt practices to thwart the will of the people.

In our opinion the proxies from members of the district committee held by the three persons who attended the Middlesboro meeting, conferred upon them no authority to act in the work done or attempted to be done at that meeting, and as there were only eight members of the district committee present, which was less than a majority of the entire committee, it follows that the canvass there made of the votes cast in the primary election was invalid, as was the result then ascertained and declared.

The question is also made that a mandatory injunction does not lie to compel performance of such acts as are required of a canvassing board, and that the only remedy in such cases is by mandamus under chapter 12, title 10, of the Civil Code of Practice. Under the Code of Practice as it was originally adopted, an injunction was only allowed to restrain the defendants from a particular act (Civil Code, secs. 271-272, as originally enacted), but by the Acts of 1894 this was changed, and by section 271 it is provided, "When any mandatory injunction shall be granted, the order or judgment may affirmatively direct the party enjoined to do the act or thing required to be done." And by section 276 it is further provided that the preliminary injunction "may be mandatory in its nature if the case so require."

In High on Injunction, sec. 2, it is said "Injunctions are known as mandatory or preventive according as they command the defendant to do or refrain from doing a particular thing." Further on in the section, after laying down the rule that the remedy by mandatory injunction "is exercised with extreme caution and is confined to cases where courts of law are unable to afford adequate redress, or where the injury cannot be compensated in damages," it is further said: "And in determining whether to grant relief by way of mandatory injunction, courts of equity will take into consideration the relative convenience and inconvenience which would result to the parties from granting or withholding relief, and will be governed accordingly."

The chancellor will not interfere by injunction where there is an adequate legal remedy, but where there is no adequate legal remedy and the ends of justice require it, he will interfere by injunction to prevent irreparable injury, and by the express provisions of the Code, above quoted, his injunction may be preventive, or if necessary it may be mandatory.

Chapter 4, of title 8, regulating injunctions must be read in connection with chapter 12, of title 10, regulating mandamus. Mandamus is a common law remedy, and if this is adequate the party must proceed by it, but if it is inadequate and there is no other adequate remedy, he may proceed by injunction; for all the provisions of the Code are to be given effect. The foundation of the chancellor's jurisdiction to proceed by injunction is the inadequacy of the legal remedies. It does not depend upon the character of the defendant, or the character of the act sought to be enforced. To hold otherwise would be to restrict the general language of section 276, and to hold that injunctions cannot be granted under it, in all cases to prevent irreparable injury, but only in cases not involving official acts. There may be the same irreparable injury in these cases as where only private acts are involved and the general language of the Code, allowing injunctions, is not to be limited by confining them to actions involving simply private acts. The proceeding must be by mandamus where that is adequate, but where that is inadequate, the extraordinary power of the chancellor may be invoked to compel official action, just as it is often invoked to restrain it.

In the case before us the remedy by mandamus is wholly inadequate, the injury cannot be compensated in damages and unless an injunction is granted, the plaintiff will be left without remedy. It is therefore one of the extreme cases in which remedy by mandatory injunction may be properly allowed. (Henderson County Board of Health v. Ward, Judge, &c., 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1193.)

We deem it unnecessary to discuss the objection to jurisdiction further than to say the object of the action is to compel the district committee to meet, canvass the votes, and ascertain the result, which it is alleged they, or majority of them have failed to do. The cause of action, therefore, grows out of the failure of the committee to perform a manifest legal duty. That failure of duty occurred as much in Laurel county, where this action was instituted as elsewhere. Indeed, the county seat of that county was, in the beginning, selected for the meeting of the committee and the counting of the votes. Laurel county is situated in the 11th Congressional district, the members of the district committee all reside in that district—each committeeman in a county to himself. Whether the members of the district committee be denominated ministerial officers, or agents of a political organization, the duties which they, or a majority of them are alleged to have failed to perform, are statutory, that is such as are prescribed by the statute regulating primary elections, and, therefore, in that sense official duties.

For these reasons we think section 63, sub-section 2, Civil Code, authorized he bringing of the action in Laurel county.

At the request of the judge before whom the motion to dissolve the injunction herein was made, the other judges of the Court of Appeals, except Judge O'Rear, who was absent, heard with him the argument on the motion, with him considered the case, and a majority of them concur in this opinion.

COMMONWEALTH v. KEATHLEY.

(Filed September 23, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Criminal law—Licenses—Where one was indicted for conducting a hotel without a license, the defense that he was sick and unable to look after the business which was entrusted to his clerk, will not avail, and it was error in he lower court to dismiss the indictment. His fine should have been fixed within the limitation prescribed by statute.

W. H. Hester and N. B. Hays for appellant.

Appeal from Fulton Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

The circuit court adjudged the dismissal of the indictment in this case, harging the defendant with operating a hotel without a license. This case as tried by consent without a jury. Appellee was conducting a hotel at ulton, a fifth-class city. Being ill, he directed his clerk to apply to the erk of the county court for a license, but because of the failure of the otel clerk to pay the license fee required by statute, the county court clerk id not issue the license. Appellee says he continued to operate the hotel nder the belief that the license tax had been paid; that he continued ill, nable to look after his business for several months, and in consequence inusted it entirely to his clerk. It is confessed that the license was not sued.

Under this state of case the law is that appellee is guilty of a violation of he statute, and the court should have fixed his fine within the limitation escribed by the statute. It was, therefore, error for the circuit court to ave dismissed the indictment.

The judgment is reversed and cause remanded with directions to grant he Commonwealth a new trial.

COMMONWEALTH v. LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE R. R. CO.

(Filed September 22, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Railroads—Indictment—A demurrer was properly sustained to an indictment against a railroad company charging it with the commission of nuisance, where it was uncertain whether the bridge complained of was r the passing of cars or for public travel, and where also there is uncerinty as to the time of the commission of the offense.

2. Same—The statement of the acts constituting an offense must be set t in an indictment in ordinary and concise language and in such manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended, and it must be certain as to the party and offense charged, the place and the circumstances under which the offense was committed.

Ed. Daum for appellant.

W. H. Wadsworth and B. D. Warfield for appellee.

Appeal from Fleming Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

This appeal is from an order of the Fleming Circuit Court, sustaining a demurrer to an indictment against the appellee charging it with having committed and maintaining a nuisance by the erection of a bridge and approaches thereto.

By section 124, of the Criminal Code, it is provided that an indictment must be direct and certain as regards, first, the party charged; second, the offense charged; third, the county in which the offense was committed; fourth, the particular circumstances of the offense charged if they be necessary to constitute a complete offense.

Section 122, of the Criminal Code, provides that the statement of the acts constituting an offense must be in ordinary and concise language, and in such a manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended.

Upon a careful inspection of the indictment it is uncertain whether the bridge complained of was erected across the turnpike for cars to pass over or across the railroad for public travel. We are inclined to the opinion that it was across the railroad for public travel. It is also uncertain as to when the offense was committed, but from the language used it must have been prior to the year 1900.

Taking the indictment as a whole, the facts alleged constituting the offense are not stated in such a manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what was intended.

Wherefore the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

BUCKEL, BY, &c. v. SMITH'S ADM'R. &c.

(Filed September 22, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Husband and wife—Gifts—A husband who is called upon to account for certain property received from his deceased wife and makes defense on the ground that the property was a gift from his wife, must establish that fact by satisfactory and competent evidence. His own testimony is manifestly incompetent.

2. Same—Proof—The fact that a gift may be made by word of mouth and manual delivery, makes it difficult to negative such a claim, and it is not a safe rule to place the onus upon the heir of a decedent to prove that the possession of the survivor was not a gift.

Morris B. Gifford and A. E. Willson for appellants.

Wm. F. Furlong and John Roberts for appellees.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, 2d Chancery Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

R. T. Smith, Jr., is called upon in this case to account to his deceased wife's heir-at-law for certain personal property of hers, alleged to have been received by Smith from her, and which it is claimed he promised to repay to her. This property is embraced in two items. The first is one of $900. Mrs. Smith, before her marriage to R. T. Smith, Jr., was a widow. She owned certain real estate in Louisville. About two months before her marriage to Smith she executed a mortgage upon some of this real estate for $900. What she did with the money is not shown. It is claimed by some of her relations that she loaned it to Smith, but there is no competent evidence of the fact in the record. The court, therefore, properly rejected that claim. The other item is one of $500. Mrs. Smith six days before her death sold some of her real estate for $1,200, and deposited the proceeds to her credit in bank.

She gave to her husband, R. T. Smith, Jr., a check for $500. He says that it was a gift from her to him and that he collected the money on it. The contention of the heir-at law is that it was only a loan. The evidence upon this item is most meagre. Smith testifies that it was a gift, but this testimony is manifestly incompetent. (Sec. 606, Civil Code). Which leaves the matter thus: Mrs. Smith a short while before her death, but so far as the record discloses not in contemplation of that event, sold all her unencumbered real estate for $1,200. She paid out less than $100 on certain indebtedness. She gave her husband a check for $500 unexplained. Her remaining real estate was mortgaged for nearly its value. She had little or no personal property. She had two infant children living, one by her first husband, Buckel, and the other by Smith. Smith's child died within a few months after its mother. In this suit by the Buckel child to compel Smith to account for the $500 of his wife's money, which he had received, and for which the law implied a promise to repay, he interposes the defense that it was given to him by her.

In Long v. Beard, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1036, this court said: "There can be no doubt that a wife may make a valid gift to her husband of her personal property; but courts of equity examine every such transaction with great caution and with apprehension of some undue influence, but unless such influence is evinced, the gift will be upheld."

But it must be borne in mind that the fact of gift must be established first. Whether it is a voluntary act of the giver is the feature which the court scrutinizes suspiciously. While the act of March 15th, 1894, commonly called the Weissinger Act, enlarges the married women's property rights so as to place married and single women on the same footing in many respects, it does not and cannot change the relation of confidence existing between husband and wife. Trust and affection and unity of interest continue to afford exceptional opportunities for one to have great influence over the other. The very nature of the relation is one of extreme mutual confidence. Its privacy from others, and its intimacy between the parties give to the survivor upon the death of the other an opportunity to claim benefits from the relation, as regards property belonging to the deceased spouse, never contemplated by the parties, and not justified in many instances by the facts.

To place the onus upon the heir-at-law of the deceased, to prove that the possession of the survivor was not a gift, where a gift may be made by word of mouth and manual delivery, would be frequently impossible, and nearly always so. The safer rule is to require the one claiming the gift, to establish that fact by satisfactory and competent evidence. In this no hardship can be worked, because it is easy and simple to make plain always the fact of gift while both parties are alive and present at the transaction.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for judgment in conformity with this opinion.

ADKINS v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed September 21, 1904.)

1. Criminal law—Instructions—Upon the trial of appellant for murder, an instruction was erroneous which makes it appear that the right of appellant to plead self-defense, in bar of the prosecution against him is made to depend upon the belief of the jury as to whether or not the appellant "had other safe and available means without retreating, of avoiding such danger," instead of the reasonable belief of appellant as to the existence of these means.

2. Same—The record in this case shows that appellant was at his home, and this court has often held that one so situated is not bound to retreat, but may maintain his ground and defend himself from unlawful assault.

Mealer & Stealey, J. C. Williams and Tye & Denham for appellant.

N. B. Hays and Loraine Mix for appellee.

Appeal from Whitley Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

Appellant was indicted by the grand jury of Whitley county, charged with the murder of Samuel Wilson. A trial resulted in his conviction of voluntary manslaughter, and his punishment being fixed at confinement in the penitentiary for a term of twenty-one years.

The parties to the targedy, out of which this prosecution grew, were coal miners, living in Proctor, Whitley county, Ky. Their houses were about seventy-five yards apart, on the same side of the railroad, and fronting it. The killing took place June 13th, 1903, and arose from a previous quarrel about some trivial matter. At the time of the homicide, each party stood in his own yard, and shot at the other with a Winchester rifle. As to who commenced the conflict, the evidence is contradictory. The theory of the Commonwealth is that appellant murdered Wilson in cold blood. That of appellant, that he merely defended his own life from a murderous assault upon him by Wilson. There was some evidence to support the verdict of the jury, and we will not review their finding of the facts.

The conclusion we have reached as to the merit of this appeal, renders it unnecessary to consider any of the errors of the law assigned, except those based upon the third instruction given by the court, which is as follows:

"Although you may believe from the evidence before, you beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant, William Adkins, in Whitley county, Ky., shot and killed Samuel Wilson, yet if you further believe from the evidence that at the time he did so, he (defendant) believed and had reasonable grounds for believing that he was then and there in danger of suffering loss of life or serious harm, at the hands of said Wilson, and shot to protect himself from such danger, real or to him reasonably apparent, you will find him guilty on the ground of self-defense and apparent necessity, unless you further believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt, that he had other safe and available means without retreating, of avoiding such danger; in which latter state of the case he cannot be excused on the ground of self-defense."

The criticism of the foregoing instruction is based entirely upon that part which contains the qualification of the appellant's right to plead self-defense, in bar of the prosecution against him. The first objection is in the use by the court of the expression "beyond a reasonable doubt;" it being urged that this was prejudicial to the rights of appellant. This contention evidently arises from a misunderstanding of the instruction. The rule for the use of the expression "beyond a reasonable doubt" in instructions in criminal cases is that all facts, the establishment of which would be prejudicial to the interest of the defendant, must be believed by the jury beyond a reasonable doubt; whereas, those which, if true, redound to his interest, are required, simply, to be believed. That part of the instruction under consideraiton contains the hypothesis which, if established, rendered the plea of self defense unavailing to appellant; it was, therefore, manifestly to his interest that the jury were required by the court to believe, beyond a reasonable doubt, the facts upon which it was predicated.

The second objection to the instruction under consideration, we think is fatal to it. It will be observed that, by the language used, the right of the appellant to plead self-defense in bar of the prosecution against him, is made to depend upon the belief of the jury as to whether or not appellant "had other safe and available means, without retreating, of avoiding such danger, and not upon the reasonable belief of appellant as to the existence of these means. Appellant was entitled, in the situation in which he was placed, to act according to the appearance of things to him at the time; and his right to defend himself depended upon his own reasonable opinion as to the existence, or non-existence, of safe and available means of avoiding the danger, other than shooting his antagonist, and not upon what the jury might think on this subjcet, sitting coolly in the box with all the facts before them. (Coffman v. Commonwealth, 10 Bush, 495; Radford v. Commonwealth, 9 Ky. Law Rep., 380; Bledsoe v. Commonwealth, 9 Ky. Law Rep., 1002; Estep v. Commonwealth, 86 Ky., 39.)

As this case must be retried, we suggest, for the guidance of the trial court, that there was no necessity of adding to the instruction the qualification under consideration. The record shows that, at the time of the shooting, appellant was at his home, and we have often held that one so situated is not bound to retreat, but may maintain h's ground, and defend his person from unlawful assault, or danger; and while the instruction does exclude the necessity of retreating by appellant, we think that all of it following the word "unless" should have been omitted, and, in lieu thereof, the right of self-defense should have been qualified by instructing the jury, substantially, that, if they believed from all the evidence, to the exclusion of a reasonable doubt, that the appellant commenced the difficulty between himself and Wilson by, first, unlawfully attacking the latter, in such manner as to make it necessary for him to shoot at appellant, in order to protect his own life or his person from great bodily harm, then the appellant was not entitled to the plea of self-defense.

For the reasons indicated, the judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

JAMES v. AMES, &c.

(Filed September 22, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Master and servant—Where a servant was put to work by appellee's foreman at a joining machine, which though he had had no experience in its operation, performed his work with safety until an employe removed the knives from the machine and inserted some new ones in it, when the machine becoming out of order, following a jerk in the machine, he caught one of his fingers in it and had it cut off. Upon the trial in an action by the servant for damages, he testified that he did not know the machine was improperly adjusted, or whether it could be out of adjustment, and the foreman knew of his ignorance in this particular, but did not inform him. Held—That it was error to peremptorily instruct the jury to find for the defendant.

2. Pleading—The defense in an action for damages, for injuries to a servant by a defective machine, the fact that the plaintiff only alleged that his injuries were caused by reason of a defective machine, where the proof showed that the machine was a new one and in no wise defective, did not authorize the taking of the case from the jury where the defect in pleading was cured by answer and admission of proof as to the improper condition and adjustment of the machine.

Jas. B. Clark for appellant.

Miller & Todd for appellees.

Appeal from Daviess Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

The appellant, while in the employment of the appellee, was injured. His injury resulted in the loss of the index finger on the right hand and the injury of two others. This action was brought to recover of defendant damages therefor.

The appellant received his injuries while engaged in operating a machine, in the factory of the appellee, known as a joiner, and it is shown by the proof to have occurred under the following circumstances:

A few days before he was injured, he applied to the foreman of appellee at the factory, for work, stating at the time that he desired a job on the lumber yard. He was informed that no hands were needed on the yard but was told that there were two machines, one a tenant machine and this joiner, that were idle and that he could have employment at one of them. Appellant then informed the foreman that he had no experience in that line of business, and that he was afraid to undertake it.

The foreman explained to him that he could soon learn and he then accepted employment at the tenant machine and was shown how to work it, t which he performed labor for the balance of that week. On Monday morning he was placed, by the foreman, to work at this jointer. The foreman passed two or three planks across the machine, showing him how to rest his hands upon them to pass the plank over the knives in safety. The ppellant, during that day, performed labor upon that machine with ease nd safety. The foreman did not give any instructions about the mechanism of the machine, the manner in which it should be adjusted or whether r not it could be adjusted. On the next morning he resumed his labor at his jointer and on attempting to move the first plank across the knives, as e had the day before, and when the plank had just about crossed the nives, something instantly jerked the plank back and from under his hands, nd the knives injured his fingers as stated. He was using due care at the ime for his own safety, the piece of timber he was using was as smooth a iece as he had been using the day before and the machine appeared to be n the same condition. The proof also showed that, on the evening before, n employe of the appellee, in the performance of his duty, placed some harp knives in this machine and removed the ones that were in it.

There were two expert witnesses introduced who had performed labor at his kind of a machine for many years, who stated that this machine, when n proper condition and properly adjusted, was a reasonably safe place at hich to labor, but when not in proper condition or properly adjusted was dangerous machine.

This machine was described as being knives fastened to a shaft revolving owards the operator. On the front and back side of these revolving knives here was an adjustible table each of which could be removed up and down y means of a set screw. When properly adjusted the front table should be ightly lower than the back one, and when the back table was lower than should be it was very dangerous to operate it. One of the expert witesses testified that there was no other way in which this injury could have ccurred, except by the back table being too low. The other testified that by ther in that manner or by a hard knot in the plank.

Appellant testified that he did not now that the machine was improperly djusted or whether it could be out of adjustment and that appellee's foreman new of his ignorance in this regard.

At the completion of appellant's evidence, the court gave a peremptory struction to the jury to find for the appellee.

The only question is whether there was any evidence introduced by appellnt sustaining his theory of the case.

It is reasonably certain that the person who placed these knives in this achine on the evening before, left this machine out of condition or adjustent.

Appellee contends that it was the duty of appellant to adjust it to protect imself from such dangers. This rule is correct if applied to one who underands the operation of it, but is not the rule applicable to cases like the ppellant who had had no experience in the operation or management of ch machines. It was the duty of some one in charge for appellee to have nformed him of the dangers incident to the operation of it, and to show im when it was in and out of adjustment, and how to adjust it.

If appellants' evidence was true, appellee was certainly negligent in this regard.

In the case of The United Laundry Co. v. Schilling, &c., 21 Ky. Law Rep., page 1798, the court said: "There was evidence conducing to show that the injury was caused by the imperfect unsteady and unsatisfactory manner in which the machine worked. It would run smoothly for a time, when it would stop and then start up with a jerk, making it dangerous to the fingers and hands of the person feeding it. This danger was not apparent to one who was not advised of it, and the proof conduces to show that the appellee was not so appraised."

In the case of the Standard Oil Co. v. Eiler, &c., 22 Ky. Law Rep., 1642, the court said: "Appellee being a mere green laborer put alone in charge of the machine, uninstructed as to how to unclog it, and ignorant that the burs ran so close to the spout, it was a question for the jury whether, etc. * * * Under such circumstances it was incumbent on him as the managing agent of appellant, when leaving a green boy in charge of the machine, to warn him of the danger and instruct him how to unclog it." (Clay City Lumber and Stave Co. v. Noe, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 668; L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Veach., 20 Ky. Law Rep., 403; L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Bowcock, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 383.)

The appellee says that the pleading did not authorize a recovery on the part of appellant because the appellant only alleged that his injuries were received by reason of a defective machine, while the proof shows that the machine was comparatively a new one and in no wise defective. This was cured by the answer and by the admission of proof, without objection, as to the improper condition and adjustment. The appellee in his answer not only denied that the machine was defective, but also denied that he failed to have the machine in proper condition for the safety of appellant while at work with it. If it be true that appellant did not know when the machine was in proper condition and adjustment, and appellee's foreman knew this fact and failed to inform or advise the appellant of that fact, and how to adjust it, then the leaving it out of adjustment by appellee's foreman was leaving it out of proper condition for this appellant.

Wherefore, the judgment of the lower court is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

NEW FARMERS & TRADERS BANK v. CROWE, &c.

GERMAN AMERICAN SECURITY CO.'S ASSIGNEE v. SAME.

(Filed September 27, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Note—Held by bank for collection—Assignment of owner for creditors—Set-off by payors—The New Farmers & Traders Bank filed this action on a notee for $444, executed to it by John M. Crowe, and others, dated May 5, 1902, due four months after date. Appellees pleaded as a set off certain bonds held by them against the German American Security Company, which had made an assignment for the benefit of its creditors, alleging its insolvency and ownership of the note, and its formal execution to the bank which had no real interest in it, and alleging that they are now creditors of the security Co. at least to the extent of their bonds according to what they had paid at the time of the assignment of said company. Held—That as the amount due upon the bonds held by appellees against the Security Company, was, in any view, larger than the amount of the note sued on, the circuit court properly sustained a demurrer to the reply and dismissed plaintiffs' action.

C. M. Finn and P. B. Miller for appellant.

Wilfred Carloo and Drury & Drury for appellees.

Appeal from Union Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

The New Farmers' & Traders' Bank of Owensboro, filed this suit against appellees, John M. Crowe, J. A. Sutton, and H. N. Lilly, to recover of them on a note of $444, which they had executed, payable to it, dated March 5, 1902, and payable four months after date. They filed an answer in which they pleaded this defense: In the month of January, 1901, a representative of the German American Security Co., of Owensboro, a corporation constituted under the laws of Kentucky, came to them representing that the business of the company was that of selling to investors certain bonds and coupons issued by it, and they then bought from the company twenty-four of its bonds paying them $8.50, on each of the coupons attached to the bonds, there being ten coupons to each bond, making in all 240 coupons. By the bonds it was provided that the defendants were to pay $0.50 per month, on each coupon attached thereto, during a period of sixty months. The agent of the company represented to them that the German American Security Co. was a solvent corporation and would pay the bonds as stipulated. On this assurance they purchased the twenty-four bonds and paid monthly $120. About the 1st of July, 1901, they were approached by Chitman, the General Manager of the German American Security Co. and were offered by him thirty additional bonds. At this date they had paid out on the twenty-four bonds first purchased, the sum of $720, and Chitman agreed to take the note of the defendants for $888, to pay the dues on the old bonds and the dues then accruing on the new bonds, he agreeing to accept the new bonds as collateral security for the loan. Acting upon his assurances that the company was solvent they bought the thirty bonds and paid the dues thereon, up to Sept. 25, 1901, when the company made an assignment for the benefit of its creditors, in debt to them in amount of the bonds. The insolvent condition of the company existed as they alleged at the time the contract was made with them and was known to Chitman at the time. They afterwards paid one half of the debt of $444 and the note sued on was executed for the other half. It is not the property of the bank, but was merely held by the bank for collection for the use and benefit of C. M. Finn, the assignee of the German American Security Co., under its deed of assignment for the benefit of its creditors. They made their answer a cross-petition against Finn as assignee, and pleaded as a set off to the note the amount alleged to be due them by the investment company. Finn filed an answer setting out the terms and conditions of the bonds. The defendants then filed an amended answer to which plaintiff filed a reply. The court sustained the demurrer of the defendant's to the reply and the plaintiff's appeal.

By the rule in force in this State, as the assignee of the German American Security Co., stands in the shoes of his assignor, any defense which could be made against it may be made against him, and a set-off may be allowed, although the debt had not matured at the time the assignment was made. (Ky. Flour Co. v. Merchants' National Bank, 90 Ky., 225.) The case must therefore, be decided as though it had been brought in the name of the German American Security Co., after it became insolvent and ceased to do business, but before it had made an assignment. The note having been executed to the bank merely as a form of executing it to the security company and the bank having no interest in the matter, any defense may be made to the note in the hands of the bank that could have been made to it, if executed directly to the security company. The allegations of fraud contained in the answer are denied and the naked question is whether, when the security company made a general assignment for the benefit of its creditors, holding the note of appellees, they had a cause of action against the security company on the bonds which they could plead as a set-off to the note. It is insisted that the security company owed them nothing until the maturity of the bonds. The question turns upon the proper construction of the bonds

Each of them is as follows: "In consideration of the application for this bond, which is made part hereof, and the payment of fifty (50) cents on each of the coupons attached hereto, which same are made a part hereof, and the further payment of fifty (50) cents on each of the said coupons, on or before the tenth day of each and every month hereafter, for a period of sixty (60) months, the German American Security Company, of Owensboro, Kentucky, hereby agree and promises to pay to ————————————, or order, at its office, in Owensboro, Ky., upon the surrender of this bond with ten (10) coupons attached, the sum of three hundred and forty-eight dollars ($348) with six per centum interest per annum, after maturity until paid; subject to the terms, conditions and privileges endorsed on the back hereof."

The coupons are each exactly alike except the number. Coupon No. 1 is as follows: "Should this coupon be called in for redemption, the German American Security Co., of Owensboro, Ky., will pay to the owner of the certificate of which this coupon is a part, in full settlement for this coupon, thirty-four dollars and eighty cents, or such part thereof, at such times and under such conditions as are provided for in the bond. Void if detached."

The conditions provided for in the bond are:

1st The value of the coupons at stated intervals are set forth in the financial schedule printed on the bond.

2d. The value of the bond is regulated by the number of uncancelled coupons attached thereto.

3d. After the first two monthly premiums have been paid, a sum eqnal to 15 per cent. of the monthly premiums collected shall be placed in the reserve fund and invested for the purpose of paying the bond at maturity.

4th. After the two first monthly premiums have been paid, not less than 50 per cent of the monthly premiums shall be used for redemption purposes as follows: 10 per cent mortuary fund; 15 per cent. cash surrender fund and remainder to a general redemption fund.

5th. The company reserved the right to call in and redeem any of the coupons before maturity.

6th. Coupons not redeemed before, were deemed matured after 60 pre-iums were paid.

7th. After the death of the holder his representative might continue the ayment of premiums or accept a paid up bond bearing the same number f coupons he had paid.

8th. After eighteen premiums were paid, the holder might surrender the ond and receive the cash surrender value of the attached coupons at a cerin rate.

By the financial schedule the value of each coupon was given after two remiums were paid, by which, when sixty premiums had been paid, the uaranteed redemption value death benefit was $34.80 and the estimated edemption value was $52.46. and a similar sum proportionately where a ss number of premiums had been paid.

It is urged for appellants that the bonds contained no undertaking on the art of the corporation to pay anything to the holder before maturity, and hat appellees have no available set-off thereon. Appellants' also rely upon number of authorities holding that where a mutual insurance company ecomes insolvent, the insolvency of the company is no defense to a policy older when sued for the payment of his premium note. (Conigland v. orth Carolina Insurance Co., 98 Am. Dec., 89 and cases cited in note; ardwell v. Kelly, 10 L. R. A., 240.)

Where an insurance company has become insolvent, the rule is that the older of an unmatured policy is a creditor and is entitled to share with the her creditors in the assets, the amount of his claim being the value of the olicy at the date of the dissolution of the company; and where he is in-ebted to the company a set-off will be allowed him to the extent of his aim. (Boston, &c. R. R. Co. v. Mercantile Trust Co., 38 L. R. A., 97, nd cases cited in note.) We see no reason why the same principle should ot apply here. Appellees are the holders of bonds issued by the investment ompany. By reason of the insolvency of the investment company the hole scheme has failed. After its insolvency, appellees cannot be required continue their monthly payments. (Jones v. Life Association, 83 Ky. 75.)
he scheme upon which the appellees were investing their money having iled by reason of the insolvency of the company, they are now creditors of e company at least to the extent of the value of their bonds, according to hat they had paid at the time of the assignment. This gives them a rger claim against the company than the note sued on. In cases of this haracter a set-off may be maintained in equity, although the debt is not ue at the time of the assignment by the company. (Kentucky Flour Co.
Merchants' National Bank, 90 Ky., 225.) The cases holding that where a utual insurance company becomes insolvent, the insolvency of the comany is no defense to a policy holder when sued for his premium note, are not in oint, for the reason that appellees are not stock holders in the investment ompany, but are simply creditors holding its bonds. Though the bonds ontain no undertaking on the part of the corporation to pay anything to he holder before maturity, still they rest on the idea that the scheme set ut in the conditions endorsed on the bond is to be carried out by the comany, and when the company becomes insolvent and makes an assignment enerally for the benefit of its creditors, the chancellor must determine, on equitable principles, the value of the bonds according to what has been paid upon them; for the bond holders are in no manner responsible for the failure of the company to carry out its engagement. As the amount due upon the bonds was in any view larger than the amount of the note, the circuit court properly sustained the demurrer to the reply and dismissed the action.

Judgment affirmed.

COMMONWEALTH, FOR USE OF, &c. v. KENNEDAY.

(Filed September 22, 1904.)

Office and officer—Fiscal Court—Illegal tax levy—Liability of magistrate therefor—In an action by Arris Wiggins, for himself and other tax-payers of Nicholas county, on the official bond of John C. Kenneday, to recover taxes paid by plaintiffs which were illegally assessed by defendant, Kenneday, in his capacity as a member of the fiscal court in said county, in excess of the Constitutional limit, Held—The magistrates of a county, when assembled as a fiscal court, do not act as conservators of the peace, or in the performance of any judicial function appertaining to the office of justice of the peace. They are, by statute, ex-officio members of the fiscal court; the duties there performed by them are statutory—extra duties quasi legislative in character—and not such as are required of them as judicial officers, for error or mistake in the performance of which neither they nor the sureties on their official bonds, are liable in an action for damages.

Winfield Buckler for appellant

Morgan & Hughes for appellee.

Appeal from Nicholas Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

Appellant, Arris Wiggins, for himself and in behalf of all tax-payers of Nicholas county, brought this action in the court below to recover of appellee and the sureties in his official bond as magistrate, about $4,000, amount of taxes paid by the tax payers of the county to the sheriff under illegal levies made by the fiscal court, of which appellee was a member, at its April and June terms, 1897. It is alleged in the petition that the above amount is made up of nine cents on each $100 worth of taxable property in the county of Nicholas, in the year 1897, and was levied by the fiscal court in excess of the Constitutional limit, which is only fifty cents on the $100 worth of property. It is also alleged that the tax thus illegally levied was, by order of the fiscal court, collected by the sheriff from appellant and the other taxpayers of the county, and no part of same has been repaid to them. That the sheriff is insolvent and that it has been held by this court that the sureties in his official bond are not liable for the tax thus wrongfully collected by him. It is further alleged in the petition that appellee and other members of the fiscal court exceeded their authority, and were without jurisdiction to levy the nine cents tax on each $100 worth of taxable property collected by the sheriff, for which reasons it is claimed appellee and associate justices of the peace composing the fiscal court, are individually liable, and should be made to pay appellant and other taxpayers the amounts thus wrongfully collected of them.

A demurrer was filed to the petition which the lower court sustained, and ppellant failing to plead further, his petition was dismissed.

It is contended for appellant that the levies made by the fiscal court were udicial acts, that the members of that court are judicial officers, justices of he peace; and further that an action may be maintained against such fficers by the party injured for official acts exceeding their jurisdiction, hough done neither maliciously nor corruptly.

The demurrer was sustained by the lower court upon the idea that in aking the levies the fiscal court acted in a legislative capacity, for which eason no legal responsibility can be fastened upon its members for the rrors complained of. We think this view of the matter sustained by the eight of authority.

Thus, in Pennington v. Woolfork, 79 Ky., 16, it is said: "The power to mpose taxes is legislation and cannot be conferred under our Constitution pon a strictly judicial tribunal or officer. * * * The power to assess roperty for taxation, that is to apportion the tax upon the property, upon hich the legislature has imposed it, is not judicial, and can no more be onferred upon a judicial tribunal than the power to levy taxes."

To the same effect is the opinion in McLean county Precinct v. Deposit ank, &c., 81 Ky., 264. And in Muhlenburg County, &c. v. Morehead, 20 y. Law Rep., 376, and Fleming v. Dyer, &c., 20 Ky. Law Rep., 689, this octrine seems to be accepted as fundamental.

It is also said in Cooley on Taxation, pp. 546-547, "And in the case of local axation there must commonly be two distinct acts of legislation: First, hat by the State giving the power to tax, and second, that by the local egislature, or quasi legislative authority, levying the tax under the power o given." It seems to be equally well established that the legislator, or fficer who acts in a quasi legislative capacity, is not liable in damages for is official acts.

Under the Kentucky Statutes, chapter 52, the fiscal court is composed of he magistrates of the county and the county judge. They are required to eet in a body to levy taxes and appropriate funds for the needs of the ounty.

Their every act must be the recorded result of their collective and delib-rative action. They can only act when a quorum is present, which, as pro-ided in section 1837 of the statute, supra, is a majority of the members of he fiscal court.

In Meachem, on Public Officers, section 644, it is said: "Legislative officers re not liable for their legislative acts. * * * The performance of their uties is owing to the public, to the community at large, and not to indi-iduals, and they would certainly perform their duties in a timid and me-serving manner, if indeed they would undertake their performance at ll, if every dissatisfied person could compel them to vindicate the wisdom f their enactments in an action for damages."

It will be found that the following authorities are in line with the octrine as thus announced. Cooley on Torts, 276; Jones v. Loving, 55 Miss., 09; 30 Am. Rep., 508; Booker v. State, 27 Ind., 485; County Commissioners . Duckett, 20 Md., 459.

It is further said by Meachem, section 646: "This immunity is not confined to members of National and State legislatures, but extends to the protection of the members of the inferior legislative bodies, such as boards of supervisors, county commissioners, city councils and the like."

The following quotation from Jones v. Loving, supra, aptly illustrates the reasons for the rule in question. "It certainly cannot be argued that the motives of the individual members of a legislative assembly, in voting for a particular law, can be inquired into, and its supporters be made personally liable, upon an allegation that they acted maliciously toward the person aggrieved by the passage of the law. Whenever the officers of a municipal corporation are vested with legislative powers, they hold and exercise them for public good, and are clothed with all the immunities of government, and are exempt from liability for their mistaken use. * * * If, on the contrary, the aldermen of the town of Beauregard exceeded the measure of their authority in passing the ordinance in question, it was a mere brutem fulmen, and could not for one moment have deprived the plaintiff of the privileges, emoluments or fees of his office. If he chose voluntarily to yield obedience to avoid law, it was his own folly for which the court can afford him no relief by awarding damages against the individuals voting for the ordinance."

The magistrates of a county when assembled as a fiscal court, do not act as conservators of the peace, or in the performance of any judicial function appertaining to the office of justice of the peace. They are, by statute, ex-officio members of the fiscal court, the duties there performed by them are statutory, extra duties quasi legislative in character, and not such as are required of them as judicial officers, for error or mistake in the performance of which, neither they nor the sureties in their official bonds are liable in an action for damages.

We conclude, therefore, that the lower court did not err in sustaining the demurrer, and the judgment is, therefore, affirmed.

COMMONWEALTH FOR USE, &c. v. RICE, &c.

(Filed September 22, 1904.)

Winfield Buckler for appellants.

Morgan & Hughes for appellees.

Appeal from Nicholas Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

This is similar in all respects to that of Commonwealth For Use, &c. v. John C. Kenneday, this day decided, and for the reasons given in the opinion in the Kenneday case, the judgment of the lower court in this case is affirmed.

DEMAREE v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed September 23, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Homicide—Instructions—Reasonable doubt as to degree of offense—Under sec. 239, Criminal Code, which provides: "If there be a reasonable doubt of the degree of the offense which the defendant has committed, he shall only be convicted of the lower degree," where there is any evidence introduced which might be calculated to raise a reasonable doubt of the degree of the guilt of the accused, it is a reversible error in the court to fail to instruct the jury that if they have a reasonable doubt of the degree of the offense which the defendant had committed, he should be convicted of the lower degree.

E. H. Gaither for appellant.

N. B. Hays and Loarine Mix for appellee.

Appeal from Mercer Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Obie Demaree was indicted and convicted for the murder of Ella Meaux and his punishment was fixed at imprisonment for life. The proof for the Commonwealth on the trial, showed that he was twenty years old and very much in love with Ella Meaux, who was fifteen years old. It also showed, or tended to show, that she had other admirers and was not as much in love with him as he was with her.

On the night before she was killed they all went to a party, she going with another beau. They got home about daylight and had breakfast, and some time after breakfast defendant appeared at the door of the room in which Ella Meaux was sitting with a child in her lap. He had a pistol in one hand and a handkerchief in the other and he immediately shot her through the heart with the pistol, powder-burning the child in her lap. He looked then like he was about to shoot himself and the pistol was taken from him.

After this he left and went to his brothers' where he told of having killed the girl, and said he had killed her because he loved her so and she would not have him. On the other hand the proof for the defense tended to show that the defendant and the girl were laughing and talking and in good spirits; that he was cleaning his pistol with the handkerchief and it accidentally went off when he did not suppose it was loaded. He offered to prove that his general character for peace and quiet was good. This the court admitted. He then offered to show that his character was, that he was gentle and kind and would not hurt anybody. The court properly refused to allow this, for his general disposition was not competent evidence, and threw no light on the case. He also offered to prove that he had not much sense and was little removed above an idiot. This was also properly rejected as it was not claimed that he had not sufficient mind to be responsible for his acts.

His testimony on the trial and the letters written by him which were introduced, showed that he had sense enough to know what he was about, or to control his action.

We see, therefore, no error of the court in the admission or rejection of evidence.

The court instructed the jury properly as to murder, voluntary manslaughter involuntary manslaughter and homicide by misadventure. He also instructed them if, upon the whole case, they had a reasonable doubt of the defendant's being proven guilty, they should acquit him; but gave no instruction that if the jury had a reasonable doubt of the degree of the offense which defendant had committed, he should only be convicted of the lower degree.

Sections 238 and 239 of the Criminal Code, are as follows:

"Sec. 238. If there be a reasonable doubt of the defendant being proven guilty, he is entitled to an acquittal.

"Sec. 239. If there be a reasonable doubt of the degree of the offense which the defendant has committed, he shall only be convicted of the lower degree."

In Williams v. Commonwealth, 80 Ky., 513, the judgment of conviction was reversed for the failure of the court to instruct the jury under section 239.

The court said "As it was the duty of the court to state the law fully and correctly to the jury in the instructions, it was error therefore, not to instruct them that, if they should believe the appellant guilty, but entertained a reasonable doubt of the degree of his offense, they should convict him of the lower degree. This is substantially the language of section 239, of the Criminal Code, and the failure to so instruct the jury affected seriously his substantial rights.

"It is true the jury must believe beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused is guilty before they can convict at all, but it might be, that while they had no doubt of his guilt, they entertained a reasonable doubt of the degree of that guilt, and the policy of this humane provision of the law cannot be questioned, nor can it be rendered nugatory by a failure to execute it. Whenever there is evidence introduced which might be calculated to raise a reasonable doubt of the degree of the guilt of the accused, the jury should be instructed in pursuance of the provision of the Code quoted."

This case was followed in Arnold v. Commonwealth, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1931, where the judgment of conviction was also reversed for this reason. We see no other error in the record, but for this the judgment must be reversed and the defendant awarded a new trial.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for a new trial.

COMMONWEALTH v. SCHATZMAN.

(Filed September 23, 1904.)

1. Indictment—Slot machines—Sufficient description of offense—In an indictment against the defendant for unlawfully operating on his premises a contrivance for gaming known as a slot machine, Held—That as it is clearly stated, in the accusative part of the indictment, that the premises in question were in the defendant's occupation and under his control, it was unnecessary to again repeat this statement in the descriptive part of the indictment, for a person of ordinary understanding could not fail to know what was meant; and the allegation being contained in the indictment, its meaning is to be determined from the whole instrument and not from any particular part of it alone.

2. Same—The fact that the indictment in the accusative part does not show that the slot machine was a contrivance ordinarily used for gambling, is not sufficient to vitiate it, as the other facts stated in the accusative part, are sufficient to apprise a person of ordinary understanding of the precise offense charged

F. P. O'Donnell, Ed. Daum, N. B. Hays and L. Mix for appellant.

Worthington & Cochran for appellee.

Appeal from Mason Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

The circuit court sustained a general demurrer to the following indictment: "The grand jury of Mason county, in the name and by the authority of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, accuse William Schatzman of the offense of suffering and permitting certain machine and contrivance known as 'slot machine,' to be operated on the premises in his occupation and under his control, whereby money and property and other things of value was won and lost, committed as follows, viz: The said William Schatzman, on the 1st day of January, 1904, and other days before and since, within twelve months last past, and before the finding of this indictment in the county aforesaid, did unlawfully suffer and permit a certain machine and contrivance, commonly known as a slot machine, and which machine and contrivance is ordinarly used for gambling for money and property and for whiskey, brandy, wine, ale, beer, cigars and tobacco and other things of value, to be operated on the premises on Second street, in the city of Maysville, Ky., the more exact location of said premises and the manner and way of operating said machine and contrivance is to the grand jury unknown, whereby and at and on which machine and contrivance money and property, and whiskey, brandy, ale, beer, cigars and tobacco and other things of value were then and there won and lost, and with the permission, consent and procurement of the said William Schatzman, contrary to law and against the peace and dignity of the Commonwealth of Kentucky."

The indictment is based on section 1967, Ky. Statutes, which, so far as material, is as follows: "Whoever shall suffer or permit any game or table, bank, machine or contrivance, mentioned or included in section 1960, of this chapter, to be set up, conducted, kept or exhibited in any house, boat or float, or on any premises in his occupation or under his control, or shall lease the same, or any part thereof, for that purpose, shall be fined from two hundred and fifty ($250) to five hundred dollars ($500) for each offense."

Section 1960, above referred to so far as material is as follows "That whoever, with or without compensation, shall set up, carry on, keep, manage, operate or conduct, or shall aid or assist in setting up, carrying on, keeping, managing, operating or conducting a keno bank, faro bank or other machine or contrivance used in betting, whereby money or other things may be won or lost, shall be fined five hundred dollars ($500) and costs, and confined in the penitentiary."

By section 1967, whoever shall suffer any machine or contrivance embraced in section 1960 to be conducted in any house or on any premises in his occupation or under his control, shall be fined from two hundred and fifty ($250) to five hundred ($500) dollars. The machines or contrivances included in section 1960 are a keno bank, faro bank, or other machine or contrivance used in betting, whereby money or other thing may be won or lost. It has been held that to convict under this section it should appear that the table, machine or contrivance, was such as is ordinarily used in gambling for money or property, where the contrivance is not a keno bank, faro bank or one of the things named in the section. (Ritte v. Commonwealth, 18 B. Monroe, 85; Commonwealth v. Kammerer, 11 Ky. Law Rep., 777.)

It has also been held that the indictment must be certain as to the offense charged and as to the particular circumstances of the offense. (Brooks v. Commonwealth, 98 Ky, 143; Commonwealth v. Tupman, 17 Ky. Law Rep., 217; Sulbett v. Commonwealth, 18 Ky. Law Rep., 100.)

It is insisted for the appellee that the indictment is insufficient because, in the accusative part of it, it is not stated that the slot machine was a contrivance ordinarily used for gambling for money and property, and that it is also insufficient because, in the descriptive part of the indictment it is not alleged that the slot machine was operated on premises under the defendant's control or in his occupation, although this statement is made in the accusative part of the indictment. Precisely this question was made in Shouse v. Commonwealth, 95 Ky., 631, where the indictment accused the defendant "of the offense of cutting John Reffit with intent to kill him, committed in manner as follows: The said William Shouse did unlawfully, wilfully and feloniously cut, thrust and stab John Reffit with a knife, from which cutting and stabbing said John Reffit did not die." It was contended that it was not sufficiently charged that the defendant cut Reffit with intent to kill him. The court said: "It seems to us that the positive and direct charge that the appellant cut Reffit with intent to kill him having been once made, it was not necessary to repeat the same statement in giving the particular circumstances of the offense, for the Criminal Code expressly declares that the acts constituting the offense shall only be made in ordinary and concise language." This case was followed and approved in Clark v. Commonwealth, 18 Ky. Law Rep., 758, and Commonwealth v. C. & O. R. R. Co., 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1880.

The rule is that where the indictment is for a statutory offense it is sufficient if, in the accusative part, the offense is designated by a brief general description in the language of the statute, or sufficiently so to apprise a person of ordinary understanding of what is meant. (Knoxville Nursery Co. v. Commonwealth, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1483.)

The fact that the indictment before us in the accusative part, does not show that the slot machine was a contrivance ordinarily used for gambling, is not sufficient to vitiate it, as the other facts stated in the accusative part are sufficient to apprise a person of ordinary understanding of the precise offense charged. And, as it is clearly stated in the accusative part of the indictment that the premises in question were in the defendant's occupation and under his control, it was unnecessary to again repeat this statement in the descriptive part of the indictment, for a person of ordinary understanding could not fail to know what was meant, and the allegation being contained in the indictment, its meaning is to be determined from the whole instrument and not from any particular part of it alone.

We, therefore, conclude that the indictment is good and that the court erred in sustaining a demurrer to it.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded with directions to overrule the demurrer to the indictment.

COMMONWEALTH v. DIENER.

(Filed September 23, 1904.)

F. P. O'Donnell, Ed. Daum, N. B. Hays and Loraine Mix for appellant.

Worthington & Cochran for appellee.

Appeal from Mason Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

The indictment in this case is the same as in the case of Commonwealth v. William Schatzman, this day decided, and for the reasons given in that case the circuit court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the indictment and dismissing the prosecution.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded with directions to overrule the demurrer to the indictment.

COMMONWEALTH v. HICKS.

(Filed September 23, 1904.)

1. Suicide—Accessory before the fact—Under the law as it now stands in Kentucky, an accessory before the fact in case of suicide, is subject to punishment for the crime of willful murder.

2. Evidence—Confessions made out of court—One accused of being accessory before the fact cannot be convicted therefor on confessions made out of court, unless accompanied with other proof that such an offense was committed.

3. Peremptory instructions—We are of the opinion that an analysis of the evidence and the enforcement of the provisions of the Code on the subject of confessions, warranted the trial judge in giving the peremptory instruction to find the defendant not guilty.

W. H. Hester, N. B. Hays and L. Mix for appellant.

Appeal from Graves Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

Ulyssus Hicks was indicted by the grand jury of Graves county, charged with being accessory before the fact to the self murder or suicide, of one Chris Haggard. A trial resulted in the court's sustaining a motion of the accused for a peremptory instruction to find him not guilty, made at the close of the Commonwealth's testimony. To review this judgment, this appeal is prosecuted under section 337 of the Criminal Code.

The evidence for the Commonwealth was, substantially, as follows: Tom Sears testified that he was standing at the corner of Hunt's drug store, when Hicks came along, and smiled, and said: "I have got to go to the drug store and get Chris Haggard a quarter's worth of morphine, I reckon he's going to kill himself." Shortly afterwards, he met the accused, who told him that he had obtained the morphine, and also that he had delivered it to Haggard. After the death of Haggard, Hicks told the witness of a conversation which took place between himself, Haggard and one Arnett, on the Saturday night before the purchase of the morphine, in which Haggard said that would be the last night that they would ever be together.

Mrs. Lizzie Hicks, a sister of Haggard, and a relaitve by marriage of the accused, testified that, on Wednesday preceding the death of Haggard, the accused offered to bet her that Chris Haggard would not be alive until Saturday night.

Ben Hunt, the druggist, testified that he sold the accused half a drachm of morphine, which he said he was purchasing for a young man by the name of Haggard.

Mrs. Lucy Hicks, another sister of Haggard, and also a relation to the accused by marriage, testified to the following conversation between the accused and Haggard: "On Wednesday night before he died, Ulyssus asked him, when he started home, what night he had set for him to come back, and Chris told him Friday night, and Ulyssus says, 'Put it off, I can't come,' and Chris says: 'I will put off killing myself until Saturday night, and you all can come to my burying Sunday.'" At the time of this conversation, the witness said her brother Chris was playing the guitar, and "seemed like he was just as lively as he could be; I didn't think there was anything the matter with him."

Dr. A. A. Hurt testified that, on the Saturday night of the week in which the morphine was purchased by the accused, he was called to the bedside of Chris Haggard. The witness said: "When I got down there, he was lying in bed, unconscious, like he was nearly dead, and I inquired of his mother how long he had been that way, and she said he came in about 10 o'clock at night, and she told me how he did, and I soon decided he was poisoned on morphine or some preparation of opium. From what his mother told me, and his symptoms, I decided he was suffering from some preparation of opium." To the question: "Did you ever succeed in arousing him?" the witness said: "Well, yes sir, to some extent. We worked with him and got him up out of bed, and walked him around some, but could not keep him aroused but for a few minutes at a time; he would go right back to sleep again."

Q. Did he send or call for any one?

A. Yes sir, about twice, I think.

Q. Who was it?

A. Ulyssus Hicks.

The witness testified that Haggard died from the effects of opium, or morphine.

Mrs. Lucy Hicks being re-called, stated that, after the burial of Haggard, the accused said that he knew more about Chris' troubles than anybody, but would never tell it.

The crime with which the accused stood charged, is, we believe, a somewhat novel one, certainly, in Kentucky. Blackstone, in his Commentaries, vol. 4, page 189, says: "Felonious homicide is an act of a very different nature from the former, being the killing of a human creature, of any age or sex, without justification or excuse. This may be done either by killing one's self, or another man.

"Self murder, the pretended heroism, but real cowardice, of the Stoic philosophers, who destroyed themselves to avoid those ills which they had not the fortitude to endure, though the attempting it seems to be countenanced by the civil law, yet was punished by the Athenian law with cutting off the hand, which committed the desperate deed. And also the law of England wisely and religiously considers that no man hath a power to destroy life, but by commission from God, the author of it; and as the suicide is guilty of a double offense, one spiritual, in invading the prerogative of the Almighty, and rushing into his immediate presence uncalled for, the other temporal, against the King, who hath an interest in the preservation of all his subjects; the law has therefore ranked this among the highest crimes, making it a peculiar species of felony, a felony committed on one's self. And this admits of accessories before the fact, as well as other felonies; for if one persuades another to kill himself, and he does so, the adviser is guilty of murder."

In Bishop's New Criminal Law, section 1187, it is said: "The same principle which forbids one to take the life of another prohibits equally the taking of his own life. Therefore, self murder, or suicide, like any other murder, is a common-law felony." And in subsection 5, of the foregoing section, it is said: "As suicide is felony, not misdemeanor, if it is committed in the advisers absence, the latter, at the common law goes free of punishment; because the principal, being dead, cannot be first convicted. In reason, on a question probably not decided, the statutes which widely prevail among us, making the accessory before the fact in felony a principal felon, should, in the States wherein they have been enacted, be held to work a reversal of this doctrine, subjecting the instigator in these cases to punishment."

Clark, in his work, on Criminal Law, section 72, page 164, thus states the rule: "Suicide, however, being a felony at common law, it has been held that one who counsels another to commit suicide, and is present when the act is committed, is guilty of murder, as a principal in the second degree. If the adviser is absent at the time of the suicide, he cannot be punished at common law, as he is an accessory before the fact, and cannot be punished until the conviction of the principal."

In the Am. & Eng. Encycl. of Law, second edition, vol. 21, page 98, the law is thus stated: "Under the common law, if one counsels another to commit suicide, and the other, by reason of the encouragement and advice kills himself, the adviser was guilty of murder as an aider and abettor, provided he was present when the advice was carried out; but if he was not present, he was a mere accessory before the fact, and escaped punishment because of the impossibility of his principal being tried first and convicted. The abolition of the distinction between aiders and accessories has, however, carried away this distinction with it, so that a person may now be convicted of murder for advising a suicide, whether absent or present at the time it is committed, provided the State is able to prove that the suicide was the result of this advice and not of the volition of the deceased, himself." (Commonwealth v. Bowen, 13 Mass., 356.)

Section 1128, Ky. Statutes provides: "In all felonies, the accessories before the fact shall be liable to the same punishment as the principal, and may be prosecuted jointly with the principal, or severally, though the principal be not taken or tried, unless otherwise provided in this chapter."

Robertson, in his work on Kentucky Criminal Law and Procedure, section 185, says: "Suicide or self murder, is a felony at the common law. It has, therefore, been held that if one kills himself upon the advice of another, the adviser, if present when the act is done, is guilty of murder, as a principal in the second degree. If the adviser is absent at the time of the suicide, he cannot be punished at the common law because, being an accessory before the fact, the principal must first be convicted; but by statute in this State, as we have seen, accessories before the fact may be arrested and tried, although the principal has not been taken or tried, and the rule of the common law does not, therefore, apply. So where two persons agree to commit suicide, and only one of them kills himself, the survivor is a principal in the murder of the other."

It cannot be said, that an accessory before the fact in self murder is not liable to punishment under the terms of the statute, because his principal, being of necessity, dead, he cannot be punished by any earthly sentence for his crime. We have seen that suicide at the common law is murder, and our statute, section 1149, Ky. Statutes, fixes the punishment of wilful murder at death, or confinement in the penitentiary for life, in the discretion of the jury. The case stands, in principle, as if one was accessory before the fact for the murder by his principal of a third person, and after the commission of the crime, the principal should immediately kill himself; in this case, it would be impossible to punish the principal, but it is not believed, that, under any sound reasoning, the accessory would thereby go scot free; on the contrary, the very object of the statute is to make the punishment of the accessory entirely independent of the conviction or punishment of the principal.

We conclude, then, that, under the law as it now stands in Kentucky, an accessory before the fact in a case of suicide is subject to the punishment for the crime of wilful murder. It remains, then, to ascertain whether or not the Commonwealth's evidence authorized, if uncontradicted, the conviction of the accused in this case.

Section 240, of the Criminal Code, is as follows: "A confession of a defendant, unless made in open court, will not warrant a conviction, unless accompanied with other proof that such an offense was committed."

Examining the evidence in the light of this provision of the Code, what do we find? Nearly all the evidence consists of the admissions out of court, of the defendant. Leaving out the statements of the accused, there is this testimony, and nothing more: Hurt said that, on the Monday preceding the death of Haggard, he sold Hicks half a drachm of morphine. Mrs. Lucy Hicks testified to a conversation between Haggard, Arnett and the accused on the Wednesday preceding the suicide, in which, as the party was about to break up, the accused asked Haggard what night he should come again? Whereupon Haggard said "Friday." The accused said, "Put it off, I can't come Friday" Then replied Haggard (substantially) "I will put off killing myself until Saturday, but no longer; you all can come to my burying Sunday."

On Saturday night, Dr. Hurt says he was called to his bedside, and found n dying from opium poison. He expired Sunday morning about 9 a. m. at evidence is there here, that tends to show that the crime of being essory before the fact to a suicide was committed? There may be evi- ce that suicide was committed; but that is not the crime, of course, h which the defendant is charged; he is charged with being accessory, l there is no evidence of accessorial acts save in his own confessions. ken as a whole, this case presents an anomaly seldom found in the annals actual crime. The accused smilingly says to Sears, "I am on my way to rchase morphine for Chris Haggard. I reckon he is going to kill him- f." In the presence of his sister, Lucy Hicks, Haggard, while playing the guitar, and seemingly in the best of spirits, appoints the day of his th, and refuses to extend the time to accommodate the engagements of his end beyond one day, from Friday until Saturday. At the appointed time, is found by the physician dying from opium poison. Nobody seems to ve regarded the matter, except in the light of a joke, and the motive, if ere was one, is not disclosed.

We are of opinion that an analysis of the evidence and the enforcement of e provisions of the Code, on the subject of confessions, warranted the trial dge in giving the peremptory instruction to find the defendant not guilty, which the Commonwealth complains. And this conclusion is certified to e circuit court.

COMMONWEALTH v. WILLS.

(Filed September 23, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Gaming—Billiard and pool tables—Suffering minors to play thereon—fficiency of indictment—Under Ky. Statutes, section 1972, an indictment ich charges the defendant with "being the owner and having control of lliard and pool tables, similar to tables called pigeon-hole tables, did un- vfully, wilfully and knowingly suffer and permit, for compensation and ward, Sam Burton, a person then under 21 years of age, to play games on d tables and without written permission from the father, mother, or ardian, or other person having the custody or control of said minor, au- orizing him so to do, is a good indictment; and the demurrer thereto ould have been overruled.

B. A. Crutcher, N. B. Hays and Loraine Mix for appellant.

Appeal from Clark Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

The appellee was indicted by the grand jury of Clark county, charged th the offense of suffering and permitting a minor to play games on pool d billiard tables for compensation and reward, under section 1972, Ky. atutes. A general demurrer was filed to the indictment, and sustained the court. The indictment is as follows:

"The grand jury, of Clark county, in the name and by the authority of e Commonwealth of Kentucky accuse James Wills, of the offense of suffer- g and permitting minors to play games on pool and billiard tables, for mpensation and reward committed as follows, viz: That said James Wills, the 10th day of February, 1904, in the county aforesaid and before the finding of this indictment, he, the said James Wills, being then and there the owner and having control of billiard and pool tables (similar to tables called pigeon-hole tables) did unlawfully, wilfully, and knowingly suffer and permit, for compensation and reward, Sam Burton, a person then under twenty-one years of age, to play games on said table and without the written permission from the father, mother or guardian, or other person having the custody or control of said minor, authorizing him so to do, against the peace and dignity of the Commonwealth of Kentucky."

Section 1972, Ky. Statutes: "If any person, being the owner or controller of the tables called 'pigeon-hole tables,' or any table similar thereto, or any billiard table, shall knowingly suffer or permit, for compensation or reward, any minor under the age of twenty-one years, without the written permission of the parent or guardian of said minor, or other person having the care, custody or control of said minor, to play any game thereon, either by betting or not betting, or shall knowingly suffer or permit any person to bet upon any game played, every such person so offending shall be fined for each offense one hundred dollars, and shall forfeit the right and privilege of again keeping such tables."

There is no suggestion in the record as to the ground, or grounds, upon which the trial judge based his judgment dismissing the indictment. A comparison of the allegations of the pleading with the section of the Statutes above quoted, convinces us that it charges appellee with a public offense, and that the demurrer should have been overruled.

Wherefore the judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent herewith.

OL. 26. OCTOBER 15, 1904. No. 8

COURT OF APPEALS OF KENTUCKY.

COMMONWEALTH v. SMITH.

(Filed September 23, 1904—Not to be reported.)

. Embezzlement—Sufficiency of indictment—An indictment for embezzle-ent which charges "that Joe Smith wilfully embezzled and fraudulently nverted to his own use, $1, currency of the United States, which was en and there the subject of larceny, which sum of money, $1, with other oney, had been entrusted to him, the said Smith by Lola Davis, to be de-ered by him to Archie Davis, which delivery to the said Archie Davis, he, e said Smith, then and there undertook for hire," sufficiently stated the-ts constituting the offense, and the court erred in sustaining a demurrer-ereto.

. Value of property converted—Under Ky. Statutes, section 1203, provid-g "that if any carrier, porter or other person to whom money or other-operty, which may be the subject of larceny, may be delivered to be car-d for hire, or any other person who may be entrusted with such property, bezzle or fraudulently convert to his own use, or secrete, with intent to-so * * * before delivery at the place or to the person to whom the-ne was to be delivered, shall be confined in the penitentiary not less than-, nor more than five years," the value of the money or other property-ndulently converted is immaterial.

. N. Sharp for appellant.

Appeal from Pulaski Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Burnam.

The appellee, Joe. Smith, was indicted under section 1203, of the Ken-cky Statutes, for embezzlement. The specific charge is:

'That he wilfully embezzled and fraudulently converted to his own use-currency of the United States, which was then and there subject of lar-y, which sum of money, $1, with other money had been intrusted to him, said Smith, by Lola Davis to be delivered by him to Archie Davis, which livery to the said Archie Davis, he, the said Smith, then and there under-k for hire."

A general demurrer was sustained to the indictment upon the ground that.

the money embezzled was not sufficient to constitute the crime of grand larceny, and the Commonwealth has appealed.

The statute is as follows: "If any carrier, porter, or other person to whom money or other property or thing which may be the subject of larceny may be delivered, to be carried for hire, or any other person, who may be entrusted with such property, embezzle or fraudulently convert to his own use, or secrete with intent to do so, any such property, either in mass or otherwise, before delivery thereof at the place or to the person to whom the same were to be delivered, he shall be confined in the penitentiary not less than one nor more than five years."

Under this section of the statute the value of the money or other property fraudulently converted is immaterial. The crime consists in the fraudulent appropriation, and embraces all persons who are guilty of fraudulently secreting or converting to their own use the money or property of others, intrusted to them or placed in their hands for the purpose of being carried or delivered to another, without regard to the value thereof. (Johnson v. Commonwealth, 68 Ky., 430; Jackson v. Commonwealth, 86 Ky., 1; Warmoth v. Commonwealth, 81 Ky., 133.) The facts constituting the offense are, we think, sufficiently stated in the indictment, and the court erred in sustaining the demurrer thereto.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for proceedings consistent herewith.

TEMPLE NATIONAL BANK v. LOUISVILLE COTTON OIL CO.

(Filed September 23, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Banks and banking—Drafts—Bills of lading—Where a bank discounted a draft with bill of lading attached, the goods cannot be subjected by a creditor of the shipper for debt against him.

2 Same—Attachment—An action for the non-delivery of goods pursuant to contract with the shipper, cannot be maintained by attachment against the goods where a draft with bill of lading attached had been discounted by a bank at the time of the shipment, the claim of the bank on the article shipped being superior.

Arthur M. Rutledge for appellant.

Matt O'Doherty for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, 2nd. Chancery Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

On July 29, 1901, the Empire Mill Co., of Temple, Texas, sold to the Louisville Cotton Oil Co., 15 tank cars of prime crude cotton seed oil at 26¼c a gallon, to be loaded in the buyers' tanks at full capacity; 5 tanks to be delivered during the last half of October and 10 in November, the buyer furnishing the tank cars and their routing. There was some complaint that the tank cars furnished in October were not loaded properly, but the 5 tanks to be loaded in October were filled and shipped. On November 5, 1901, the Cotton Oil Co., wrote to the Mill Co., as follows: "Kindly advise by return mail if our tank cars have been delivered to you, and when shipment will be made. We also desire to know when it will be convenient for you to re-eive tanks for November purchases. Our tank cars are very busy at the present time, and we desire the information so we can make our arrangements to have tanks reach you in due time."

The Mill Co., on November 8, wrote in reply this letter: "Replying to your favor of the 5th inst., would ask that you ship us at once six (6) tanks and follow with wire tracer. We will give you instruction for remainder in imple time."

Nothing more occurred until Nov. 18, when the Mill Co. sent a telegram directing their four (4) tanks to be sent. They were immediately shipped but for some reason did not reach Temple, Texas, until after the first of December. The Mill Co. then refused to fill the tanks or fill the order, but wired the cotton oil company that they would sell the oil at 31c F. O. B. cars at Temple, Texas. The Cotton Oil Co. insisted that it should fill the tanks under the old contract at 26½c, but finally sent this telegram on Dec. : "Telegram received, offer accepted, three tanks prime crude, thirty-one, ight draft, with exchange weights and quality guaranteed destination, will old you for difference other three tanks.

(Signed.) "LOUISVILLE COTTON OIL CO."

The Mill Company then loaded the tanks and shipped them, drawing a ight draft for the amount of the price, which it attached to the bill of lading nd discounted to the Temple National Bank. The draft was forwarded to ouisville and protested, and being returned to the bank on the 16th of December was charged back to the Mill Co; but on the 21st the Mill Company bjecting to this and insisting that the bank should follow up its collateral, he mill company was credited again by the amount of the check, and on the 3d, the oil having reached Louisville, it was attached by the Cotton Oil o. in this action brought to recover damages for the non-delivery of the hree tanks of oil, pursuant to the contract for November. The bank filed s petition asserting its claim to the oil, and on final hearing the court gave dgment in favor of the plaintiff, giving it a lien on the oil for the damges sued for; and the bank appeals.

In Sable v. Planters' National Bank, 110 Ky., 299, it was held where the ank had discounted a draft with bill of lading attached, that the goods could ot be subjected by a creditor of the shipper for the debt against him. The se before us on the facts we have stated seems on all fours with that case. ut it is insisted that the bank in this case did not in fact own the draft, nd that the property was always in the Empire Mill Co. The testimony of e officers of the bank is clear and explicit that the draft for $4,071.20, ated December 6, 1901, with bill of lading attached, was discounted by the emple National Bank and the proceeds placed to the credit of the Empire ill Co.; that no other security was taken by the bank except the bill of ding, and that it forwarded the draft to its correspondent for collection; at the Empire Mill Co. has never paid or refunded to the bank any part the amount paid for the draft, and that the bank is now the owner of the raft; that it paid $490 on account of demurrage in the cars; that the Mill ompany was in debt to the bank when the draft was negotiated and has ntinued in debt to it since, being overdrawn even after the draft was redited back to it on December 21st; and that the Mill Company has now sold its property and is no longer carrying on business and is also overdrawn with the bank.

The proof by the plaintiff is that the Mill Co., on December 21st, and therafter, telegraphed to Louisville, proposing to sell the oil and dealing with it as is its property. But the explanation of this is that the cashier of the bank not knowing what to do with the oil or being in the oil business, employed L. F. Cowan to sell the oil for it and Cowan, who was also the president of the Mill Co., sent the telegrams and wrote the letters in the name of the Empire Mill Co.; but this was without the knowledge of the bank and should not prejudice its rights.

To say that the bank did not own this property would be to reject the unimpeached testimony of the officers of the bank—testimony, which on its face, carries with it the unmistakable air of sincerity and truth. The fact that the draft, after it was protested, was charged back to the Mill Co., is explained, its having been done by the bookkeeper as a matter of routine, he not observing that the draft was protected by collateral which it was the duty of the bank to look after, and the mistake was corrected as soon as attention was called to it and two days before the bank had any intimation of any suit or trouble.

We, therefore, conclude that the case falls squarely within the rule laid down in Sable v. Planter's National Bank, and that the property attached cannot be subjected to the claim of appellee against the Mill Co.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded with directions to the circuit court to dismiss the plaintiffs' petition.

CLAY v. CUNNINGHAM.

(Filed September 23, 1904.)

Judge Hobson delivered the following opinion on motion to reinstate injunction.

Lavinia E. Cunningham was, in July, 1899, appointed as guardian of Nannie Clay. On May 21, 1904, the county court which appointed her made an order removing her as guardian for cause. She excepted to the judgment and prayed an appeal to the Bourbon Circuit Court, which was granted. In the same order, the court appointed Brutus J. Clay, Jr., her successor, and directed her to pay over the funds in her hands to him. On May 23, she perfected her appeal, gave bond and had a supersedeas issued.

On August 30, Clay, as guardian, filed this suit, alleging the foregoing facts and obtained an injunction from the clerk restraining her from acting further as guardian, on the ground that her powers had ceased upon the entry of the judgment removing her, and were not revived by the subsequent appeal and supersedeas. On motion the circuit judge discharged the injunction and a motion is now made to reinstate it.

By our statute appeals may be taken from the orders of the county court removing a guardian, and when taken they must be tried de novo in the circuit court. Our statutes also provide that an appeal may be taken in sixty days and that a certain bond must be given. A supersedeas is then issued. The order of the county court removing Mrs. Cunningham is, therefore, no nger in force; and when the case is tried in the circuit court the judgment the circuit court must determine whether she must be removed as guarn or must continue as such. The judgment removing Mrs. Cunningham guardian having been superseded and being no longer in force, cannot be eaded or relied on as the basis of an action. The statute which authorizes e judgment to be entered in the county court, removing a guardian, also thorizes an appeal from that judgment and requires the case on appeal to tried de novo. After the appeal is taken and the judgment is superseded, stands as though is had never been entered, until the case is hard in the rcuit court. This is the necessary effect of our statute. Otherwise no rce would be given to the provisions allowing an appeal in this class of ses as in other cases tried in the inferior courts. The statute making no ception, the court can make none. The cases of State v. McKown, 21 Vt., 3, and Merrell v. Phelps, 34 Conn., 109, relied on for plaintiff, were decided nder statutes materially different from ours. A married woman may be ppointed guardian. (Leavel v. Bettis, 3 Bush, 74; Colton v. Wolf, 14 Bush, 8.) If the appeal bond executed by Mrs. Cunningham is in any manner efective, a new bond may be executed under section 682, of the Civil Code. he sureties of Mrs. Cunningham as guardian will be responsible for all er official acts, now as well as before the judgment of the county court, for ey entered as her sureties with the knowledge that she had the right to ppeal from any order removing her, and, if they wish indemnity or to be eleased, they have their remedy under the statute. If her sureties are not fficient this also may be remedied by proper proceedings.

The motion to reinstate the injunction is overruled.

1. Held—Husband and wife—Contracts with each other—Disability—Comnon law—Statutes—Whilst the common law rule prohibiting married women rom entering into legal contracts has been largely modified by the statutes, nd she may now carry on business on her own account, and, as incident to hese rights, enter into enforceable contracts with a third person, for the purchase and sale of personal property without the consent of her husband, as though she were a feme sole, the common law disability to deal with her husband or make binding contracts with him, has not been changed in this State by legislation respecting the rights of married women, and we are, therefore, of the opinion that appellant acquired no right, enforceable at law, by virtue of the contract entered into with his wife previous to her death.

2. Equities—Land—Improvements paid for by husband—Title taken to wife—Reimbursement of husband—We are of the opinion that, to the extent that appellant, on the faith of the agreement entered into with his wife, advanced his own money for the purchase and improvement of real estate, the title to which was taken to her after the execution of the obligation between them, he is equitably entitled to be reimbursed therefor, either by the sale of the property or a transfer of the title to him. But he is not entitled to be reimbursed for taxes paid thereon or for improvements made upon real estate which she owned in her own right, and to the purchase of which he did not contribute his own money.

Sweeney, Ellis & Sweeney for appellants.

Miller & Todd for appellees.

Appeal from Daviess Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Burnam.

R. M. Stroud and Delia Stroud were married in 1886, and lived together as husband and wife until the death of Mrs. Stroud in 1901. No children were born to them. On the 26th of October, 1898, the following writing was drawn by R. M. Stroud and signed by him and his wife:

"South Carrollton, Ky., Oct. 26, 1898.

"This agreement made and entered into by and between R. M. Stroud and Delia Stroud, his wife, by mutual consent and of their own free will, and do enter into the following agreement for their own protection in case of the death of either party, namely, to-wit: That all of our property, both personal and real, that we have now or that may come into our possession hereafter either by deed or purchase, shall revert to the one that survives, and to be his or hers as the case may be, forever. And furthermore, he or she, as the case may be, shall have the right to sell and convey said property to the best advantage.

"R. M. STROUD,
"DELIA STROUD."

Mrs. Stroud at her death, held the title and was in possession of several tracts of land situated in Daviess, McLean and Muhlenberg counties in this State. After the death of Delia Stroud, appellant brought this action in the Daviess Circuit Court against the appellees, heirs-at-law of his deceased wife, claiming that by virtue of the above writing he held the fee simple title to all the real estate owned by his wife at the time of her death; that his title thereto might be quieted. A general demurrer was sustained to the original petition and the appellant tendered and moved to file an amended petition, in which he alleged that after the execution of the writing supra by himself and wife, and believing that it was a valid and enforcible obligation, he purchased a lot in the town of Sacremento, McLean county, Kentucky, which he paid for with his own money, and had the title thereto taken to his wife; that he subsequently erected on this lot a dwelling house, barn, cistern and other out-buildings at the cost to himself of more than $1,200; and that he also subsequently, relying upon the agreement between himself and wife, purchased of one Ross an undivided interest in a certain tract of land in Muhlenberg county, for which he executed his individual promissory note for $250, and had the title to the property taken to his wife, Delia Stroud. He also alleged that he had expended divers sums of money, in the payment of taxes on real estate owned by his wife in her own right, and asked that he be adjudged a lien upon these two separate pieces of real estate for the money so advanced by him, upon the faith of the agreement, or that the title thereto should be taken to him. The trial court refused to allow the amended petition to be filed and dismissed plaintiff's petition, and he brings his case to this court and asks a reversal. The questions to be decided upon the appeal are; first, whether the writing sued on is enforcible as against the heirs-at-law of the deceased wife; second, if not, whether any equity in favor of the appellant, arises in consequence of his belief in its validity, which would authorize a court of equity to direct the repayment to him of moneys advanced in the purchase and improvement of real estate, the title to which was taken to his wife.

It is contended by counsel for appellant that the act of March 15, 1894, which is embraced between sections 2127 and 2148, of the Kentucky Statutes, has the effect of removing all the disabilities imposed by coverture upon the wife, and authorizes her to make a valid contract with her husband for the conveyance to him of her separate estate. While under section 2128, of the Kentucky Statutes, a married woman may purchase and dispose of her personal property in her own name as if she were unmarried, may make contracts, sue and be sued as a single woman, she cannot sell, mortgage or convey her real estate unless her husband join in such contract. The statutes also provide that any gift, transfer, or assignment of personal property between the husband and wife shall not be valid as to third persons, unless the same be in writing acknowledged and recorded. In Brown v. Dalton, &c., 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1484, the appellant executed a note for unpaid purchase money on real property, which he afterwards transferred to one Dalton, who assumed to pay the note. Dalton transferred his purchase to his wife, J. C. Dalton, and she assumed to pay the note. The appellant having been compelled to pay the note to his vendee, a Virginia corporation, instituted an action to recover thereon from the wife in Kentucky. In that case it was held that the contract of the married woman imposed no personal liability upon her, the court saying:

"This transaction is clearly contrary to the public policy of this State as defined in the statutes in force when it was made, and if it could be enforced, the door might be opened for grave abuses. The wife was entitled, not only to the protection of the husband, but to his counsel and guidance in the management of her affairs, and she had learned that it was her duty to submit to him. If, when the law had imposed this duty upon her, it shall allow him to make contracts with her to pay his debts, and enforce these contracts against her because the debt is payable in another State, it will defeat the purpose of the statute framed to protect married woman and prevent their property being wasted."

In the case of Higgins v. Stokes, &c., 24 Ky. Law Rep., 2427, the appellant owned the fee simple title to a tract of land which her husband sold and conveyed to the appellee, but she did not unite in said conveyance. Appellee took possession thereunder and held it continuously until the death of the husband in 1900. The wife instituted her action after the death of her husband to recover possession of the land. Appellant pleaded as a defense that the plaintiffs' disability as a married woman was removed by the act of March 15, 1904; and that under section 2502, of the Kentucky Statutes, her right to recover the land in controversy was barred by limitation. It was decided that the mere fact that a married woman could have brought her suit during coverture did not deprive her of the benefit of the exception in her favor in the statute of limitation; whilst the common law rule prohibiting married women from entering into legal contracts has been largely modified by the statute, and she may now carry on business on her own account, and as an incident to these rights, enter into enforcible contracts with third persons for the sale and purchase of personal property without the consent of her husband to the same extent as though she were a feme sole, the common law disability, to deal with her husband or make binding contracts with him, has not been changed in this State by legislation respecting the rights of married women, and we are, therefore, of the opinion, that appellant acquired no rights enforcible at law by virtue of the contract entered into with his wife previous to her death. But the jurisdiction of the chancellor has been frequently exercised to enforce contracts and agreements for settlements made between the husband and wife, both before and after marriage, in favor of the wife, and it has also been exerted, though less frequently, to enforce agreements in favor of the husband when the facts and circumstances clearly so warrant. In Livingston v. Livingston, 2 Johns. Chancery 537, a husband and wife agreed by parol that he should purchase a lot in her name and build a house thereon; and that he should be reimbursed the cost thereof, out of the proceeds of another house and lot of which she was seized, which should be sold for that purpose; and the husband having executed the agreement on his part, the contract failed by the sudden death of the wife, who left infant children, to whom the legal estate in both lots descended. At the petition of the surviving husband it was decreed by the chancellor that the agreement should be carried into effect. The doctrine of this case was approved in Hinnan v. Parks, 133 Conn., 197; Burdine v. Amperse, 14 Mich., 96; and in numerous other cases, and we are of the opinion that, to the extent appellant, on the faith of the agreement entered into with his wife, advanced his own money for the purchase and improvement of real estate, the title to which was taken to her, after the execution of the obligation between them, he is equitably entitled to be reimbursed therefor, either by the sale of the property or a transfer of the title to him. But he is not entitled to be reimbursed for taxes paid thereon, or for improvements made upon real estate which she owned in her own right and to the purchase of which he did not contribute his own money. We are, therefore, of the opinion that the trial court erred in overruling the motion to file the amended petition, and the judgment is reversed and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

GOFF v. JANEWAY & CARPENDER.

(Filed September 28, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Sales of merchandise—Guaranty—In an action upon a guaranty that the purchase price of goods sold to a dealer shall be paid at the maturity of the indebtedness, judgment and execution had been obtained by the seller against the purchaser and a return of nulla bona, defense was made that at the time of the creation of the indebtedness the buyers were solvent, and that several terms of court had been held after the creation of the indebtedness before the institution of the action to recover against the guarantor, and a demurrer having been sustained to this answer interposing such defense, judgment was rendered against the guarantor for the amount of the unpaid indebtedness. Held—The petition is not defective in that the action was not commenced upon the failure of the parties to pay when due, or because the petition does not allege notice to the guarantor of the amount of the indebtedness, but it is defective because it fails to allege acceptance of the seller of the guaranty by appellant.

2. Pleading—It has been the uniform rule of this court that the total omission of a fact necessary to constitute a cause of action, cannot be supplied by referring to an exhibit not copied in the petition, but simply filed and referred to as part of the pleading, and it was error in the trial court to overrule a demurrer to the petition, it alleging that there was no notice to the guarantor of the creation of the debt, its maturity, or the failure of the buyers to pay.

Wilfred Carrico and Little & Slack for appellant.

Powers & Anderson for appellees.

Appeal from Daviess Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

The appellant executed and delivered to appellee, a corporation, the following guaranty: "In consideration of sales of merchandise hereafter to be made on credit by Janeway & Carpender, of Chicago, Illinois, to J. C. Stivers & Bro., of Owensboro, State of Kentucky, and in order to induce such credits by Janeway & Carpender, and for other good and valuable considerations the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, I hereby guarantee the prompt payment at maturity of all indebtedness incurred by J. C. Stivers & Bro. to Janeway & Carpender, not exceeding, however, at any one time the sum of one thousand dollars.

"This guaranty is, however, accepted, and such credit as may hereafter be extended, is so extended upon the following conditions: The accounts, or any part thereof, for the merchandise that may be sold by Janeway & Carpender in reliance on this guaranty may, at any time be settled and adjusted between Janeway & Carpender and the principal debtor, by notes of the debtor either endorsed or unendorsed, and with, or without, further security, and said accounts or notes, or other security given therefor may be extended from time to time by Janeway & Carpender to the principal debtor, without notice to the subscriber, and all of which may be done without in any way affecting obligations hereby created. The subscriber hereby expressly waives notice of the acceptance of this guaranty by Janeway & Carpender of all credits extended and goods sold and delivered hereunder, and of the taking of notes or other security for such indebtedness as may be incurred by the principal debtor to Janeway & Carpender.

"This instrument is intended to be, and shall be taken and construed as a continuous guaranty to the extent of the said sum of $1,000, without further notice by Janeway & Carpender and until revoked by the subscriber in writing. Such revocation when made shall apply only to sales thereafter to be affected, or credits extended to the principal debtor subsequent to the service of such notice of revocation, and any payments thereafter made by the principal debtor, shall be credited as may be agreed between him and Janeway & Carpender. In the event of default by the principal debtor in payment of the debt, or any part thereof, recovery therefor shall be had directly against the subscriber without previous notice after the prosecution of the claim against the principal debtor.

"Dated at Owensboro, Ky., Nov. 16, 1900. T. S. GOFF."

Afterwards, the principal debtors Stivers & Bro , purchased of appellees six hundred and forty-one dollars ($641.06) and six cents worth of goods and merchandise on credit, upon which indebtedness they made payments reducing it to a balance of five hundred and forty dollars ($540.04) and four cents. Of this balance, all but the sum of one hundred and eighty-nine dollars ($189.22) and twenty-two cents was settled by the execution and delivery to appellee by the principal debtors, of their three notes for the sums of one hundred and ninety-one dollars ($191.96) and ninety-six cents, one hundred and ninety-one dollars ($191.95) and ninety-five cents, and sixty-eight dollars ($68.22) and twenty-two cents, respectively. None of this indebtedness being paid, appellee instituted an action in the Daviess Circuit Court, against Stivers & Bro., and obtained a judgment, execution, and a return of nulla bona; whereupon this action was instituted by appellees as against appellant, the guarantor, to recover a judgment for the sum due by Stivers & Bro. Appellant filed a general demurrer to the petition, which was overruled; whereupon he filed his answer, admitting all of the allegations of the petition to be true by failing to deny them, but affirmatively alleging that Stivers & Bro., at the time of the creation of the indebtedness of six hundred and forty-one dollars ($641.06) and six cents were solvent, that several terms of the county court, of Daviess county, had been held after the creation of the indebtedness by the principal debtors, before the institution of the action by appellees against them in the circuit court, that appellees might have obtained a judgment on the several notes and the open account constituting its claim, and its failure so to do was laches; that appellees had failed to notify appellant of the creation of the debt by Stivers & Bro., its maturity, or their failure to pay, by reason of all of which he was released from any liability to appellees under his guaranty.

To this answer, appellees filed a general demurrer, which was sustained by the court, and appellant declining to plead further, a judgment was awarded against him as prayed for in the petition. To reverse which, this appeal is prosecuted.

We cannot agree with appellant, that the petition is defective in that the original indebtedness of Stivers & Bro., is not itemized. The allegation of the petition as to this is as follows: "Plaintiff states that, relying upon said written guarantee, and in consideration of the execution and delivery it to plaintiff, as aforesaid, and between the dates of its execution and livery as aforesaid, and the 16th day of August, 1902, it did sell, furnish d deliver goods, wares and merchandise to the said firm of J. C. Stivers Bro., amounting to the sum of $641.06, and which they were reasonably rth, but no part of which has ever been paid except the sum of $80.06, on e 14th day of August, 1902, and the further sum of $67.97, paid on the 27th y of August, 1902, and the further sum of $3.26, paid on the 28th day of gust, 1902, leaving a balance due and unpaid of $540.04. No part of ich has ever been paid though long past due."

Then follows the allegation of the settlement of a part of this balance by e notes of Stivers & Bro., their final failure to pay, the institution of the tion in the Daviess Circuit Court, the rendition of the judgment, the uance of execution, and the return of "no property found."

The case of Webb v. Jeffries, 2 Bush, 221, relied on by appellant, does not pport his contention that the petition is bad for the reason stated. On e contrary, when properly understood, it constitutes authority against
m. In the case cited, the allegations of the petition as to the account ed on were quite as general as those of the petition in the case at bar, and re held to be sufficient. The error in the case cited was not that the petin was bad, but that the answer, which contained general denials of inbtedness, was good, and that the lower court erred in not admitting it to filed, and in not setting aside the judgment by default.

Nor do we think that the petition is defective in that it fails to allege noe to the guarantor of the amount of the indebtedness of Stivers & Bro., their failure to pay when due. In the case of Lowe v. Beckwith, 14 B. n., 150, involving a guaranty similar to the one under consideration, the urt, speaking through Judge Simpson, after an exhaustive review of the thorities, held that notice of the amount of the indebtedness, and the deult of the principal debtor, was not necessary in order to bind the guartor. Upon this subject the court said: "Upon such a guaranty as the esent, notice to the guarantor of its acceptance and an intention to act der it in pursuance of its terms is necessary, because it is in the nature a proposition, which the party addressed may accept or reject at his tion, and until accepted does not constitute a contract between the parties.
t no additional obligation devolves upon the creditor. The guarantor, applying to the party in whose favor the guaranty has been given, can tain information as to the extent of the liability incurred under it, and so whether such liability has been discharged or still exists; and if he has dertaken that the debt shall be paid by the debtor when it falls due, its n-payment by him necessarily involves a breach of this undertaking: or his contract be that he will pay it himself in the event of its non-payment the debtor, the default of the latter renders his undertaking absolute, d he becomes immediately liable to an action, inasmuch as it is his duty, cording to the very terms of his contract, to pay the debt without demand notice. This will form a safe and sound rule upon the subject, and by s practical operation render a guarantee of this description, when accepted d acted upon, of some value to the party who has dealt upon the faith of and trusted to it to secure the payment of his debt."

But the petition is defective, because it fails to allege notice by appellee that it had accepted the guaranty of appellant. (Mast, Crowell & Kirkpatrick v. Lehman, 100 Ky., 464; Lowe v. Beckwith, 14 B. Mon., 150; Steadman v. Guthrie and others, 4 Met., 147; Greer Machine Co. v. Sears, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 2025.) It is urged, however, by appellee, that notice of the acceptance of the guaranty is waived by the very terms of the instrument. It has been the uniform rule of this court, except in the one case to be hereafter mentioned, that the total omission of a fact necessary to constitute a cause of action can not be supplied by referring to an exhibit not copied into the petition, but simply filed and referred to as a part of the pleading. (Bank of Monticello v. Huffaker and Shy, 12 Bush, 291; Gebhard v. Garnier, 12 Bush, 321; Green v. Page, on rehearing) 80 Ky., 370; Artemus v. Asher, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 2416). Newman, in his Pleading and Practice, 250-1, in treating this question, thus announces the rule: "But it (exhibit) can not supply an averment which has been wholly omitted. An exhibit which even forms a part of the pleadings does not dispense with the express averment of all the facts necessary to show the rights of the party; it can only aid in making direct, positive, and certain an allegation which would otherwise be vague and uncertain." In the case of Citizens' Bank of Dyersburg, Tenn. v. Millet, 103 Ky., 1, the court held that the failure to aver protest of a bill of exchange and notice thereof, was cured by the fact that it appeared that the bill, which was filed with, and made a part of the petition, but not copied into it, had printed on its face "no protest," which the court held constituted a waiver of the protest and notice. This is in direct conflict with the cases above cited, and, to that extent, is overruled.

The trial judge should have sustained the demurrer to the petition, and, failing in that, should have carried the demurrer to the answer back to the petition, and adjudged it insufficient for the reason indicated.

When the case returns, the appellant, if he so desires, should be awarded a rule requiring the filing of the original guaranty, or its absence accounted for. Both parties should be allowed to amend their pleadings, if desired.

For the reasons indicated the judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent herewith.

DRYDEN v. POGUE DISTILLERY CO.

(Filed September 27, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Master and servant—Personal injury—Use of dangerous machinery—Ignorance of servant—Peremptory instructions—In an action by plaintiff alleging the loss of a hand by machinery in the use of which he was inexperienced and wherein he testified that he was directed by the superintendent of defendant company, to place himself under the orders of the miller, who put him to work in a dangerous place, of which he was ignorant, with insufficient light, and who assured him it was safe to do the work, and in doing which his hand was caught in the roller and crushed so as to render amputation necessary, it was error in the court, at the conclusion of plaintiffs' testimony, to give the jury peremptory instructions to find for the defendant.

Allan D. Cole and Frank P. O'Connell for appellant.

Thos. R. Phister and Pogue & Pogue for appellee.

Appeal from Mason Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

The appellant, Robert W. Dryden, instituted this action to recover damages against the appellee, the H. E. Pogue Distillery Company, for the loss of his hand, which he alleges was occasioned by the negligence of the agents and servants of the employer company. A trial of the case resulted in the court's sustaining a motion by appellee, at the close of appellant's (plaintiffs') testimony, for a peremptory instruction to find for it, from which judgment this appeal is prosecuted. For the purpose of reviewing the soundness of this ruling of the trial court, the evidence of appellant must be considered as true.

The cause of action, as stated in the petition, is, substantially, that appellant was inexperienced on the subject of machinery; that, as an employe of appellee, he was directed by its superintendent, who had authority so to do, to place himself under the orders of the miller, Will Hays, and to do as he was told; this, he did. That, on the day he was hurt, at about 3:30 o'clock, a. m., when it was dark, he was put to work by Will Hays in raking the meal from what he calls the shaker, into the rollers, by which it was ground, and which were about five inches below the shaker; that he was not furnished with light sufficient to discern the danger he was in, but was assured by the miller, his superior, that it was safe to do the work in hand without a light, although it was very dangerous so to do, owing to the proximity of the rollers to the shaker, of which he was ignorant, but which appellee knew; that relying upon this assurance of safety, and in ignorance of the danger attendant upon the duty, he continued to work until, by accident, his hand was caught in the roller, and crushed in such manner as to render amputation necessary.

All of the allegations of the petition were controverted by the answer, which, also, contains affirmative defenses not necessary for the purposes of this appeal, to be noticed.

Appellants' (plaintiffs') evidence consisted mainly of his own testimony, which fully substantiated the allegations of the petition.

Shearman and Redfield, in their work on the Law of Negligence, volume 1, sec. 186, 5th Ed., say: "Where a servant, seeing a defect, and notifying his master thereof, is nevertheless ordered to continue his work, without any express or implied promise of a remedy, it has been sometimes held that he cannot recover, on the theory that from that time he assumes the risk. But this is unsound. A master's order is at least as much justification for the servants' continuance, as would be another's invitation; and we have seen (Art. 91) that a mere invitation is, in some cases, enough to acquit the person acting upon it from the imputation of contributory negligence. The true rule in this, as in all other cases is, that if the master gives the servant to understand that he does not consider the risk one which a prudent person should refuse to undertake, the servant has a right to rely upon his master's judgment, unless his own is so clearly opposed thereto that, in fact, he does not rely upon the master's opinion. So, if the peculiar risk of the act commanded by the master is not obvious, the servant has a right to assume that he is not sent into any unusual peril, and he is not bound to investigate into the risk before obeying his order. A servant is not called upon to set up his own unaided judgment against that of his superiors, and he may rely upon their advice and still more upon their orders, notwithstanding many misgivings of his own. If the master directs the servant to do some act which is dangerous, but which could be made less dangerous by the use of special care on the part of the master, the servant has a right to assume that such special care will be taken, and does not take the greater risk upon himself. The servant's dependent and inferior position is to be taken into consideration, and, if the master gives him positive orders to go on with the work, under perilous circumstances, the servant may recover for an injury thus incurred, if the work was not obviously so dangerous that no man of ordinary prudence would have obeyed. This, we are glad to say, is now settled law. In short, the law of estoppel applies to such cases. The master is estopped from alleging the falsity of his own representations, unless it appears clearly that the servant did not rely upon them. Yet there are extreme cases in which the danger was so glaring that no prudent man would have entered into it, even under orders. Risks incurred under coercion are not assumed." (Illinois Central R. R. Co. v. Langan, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 500; Shanks v. Citzens Electric Co., 25 Ky. Law Rep., 811; Henderson Tobacco Works v. Wheeler, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 495.)

According to the testimony of appellant, he was uneasy as to the possible danger attendant upon doing in the dark the work which he was ordered to perform, but relied on Hays' assurance of safety. An ignorant or inexperienced servant must, of necessity, rely upon the superior wisdom of his employer, or those who stand in the employer's stead with reference to him, and we are unable to say that the danger in performing the work at which appellant was engaged was so obviously apparent that a prudent man would not have continued it under the circumstances. A careful reading of the testimony in this case convinces us that, under the rule laid down in the authority above cited, the case should not have been taken from the jury.

Wherefore, the judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

BERRY, &c. v. LEWIS, &c.

(Filed September 27, 1904.)

1. Real estate—Sale for division—Vested estate—Value of share—In a sale of real estate under subsection 1 of section 490, Civil Code, on the ground that the remainder interest of certain heirs is a vested estate and the share of each owner is worth less than $100, where the evidence shows that the interest of any one of the joint owners, at the time of the sale, was worth more than 100, the sale is invalid; and this is true though such interest is a life estate, and without reference to the time when it was acquired by the owner.

2. Possession—Remainder interest—Under subsection 2 of section 490, Civil Code, providing that a vested estate may be sold for division, "if the estate be in possession, and the property cannot be divided without materially impairing its value or the value of plaintiffs' interest therein," it is necessary in order to make the sale that the estate should be in possession, and we have uniformly held that remainder interest is not property in possession within the meaning of this subsection.

Reed & Berry for appellants.

Appeal from McCracken Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

In this action it is sought to sell a lot of ground situated in Paducah, Ky., for division of the proceeds among the owners, under section 490 of the Civil Code of Practice. The appellee, Henry Lewis, is the owner of a life estate in the land during the life of Mrs. Margaret Berry, from whom he purchased his estate therein. The children of Mrs. Margaret Berry, eight in number, were originally the owners of all the remainder interest in the estate, but one of them died leaving infant children, and one sold her interest to Thomas Lewis. All of the remaindermen, except Thomas Lewis, resist the sale of the land.

The authority of the chancellor to make the sale is rested by the pleadings both upon subsections 1 and 2 of section 490. The final judgment ordered the property sold and the proceeds distributed in accordance with the prayer of the petition, from which the remaindermen have prosecuted this appeal. The evidence and actual sale under the judgment show the land to be worth $1,400. Mrs. Margaret Berry's age at the date of the judgment was 57 years, and her life estate, under the life tables, was fifty-eighty-two one hundredths per cent of the proceeds, or something over $700.

It is insisted by appellee that the judgemnt of the chancellor may be upheld under subsection 1, on the ground that the remainder interest of the appellants is a vested estate, and the share of each owner is worth less than $100. The principle of law involved in this proposition may be sound (Ward v. Edge, 100 Ky., 757), but the facts upon which it is postulated are not to be found in this case. The record indubitably shows that the share of appellee, Henry Lewis, in the estate under consideration is worth, at least $700, and he is none the less the owner of a share in the property within the meaning of the section, because his interest is a life estate; by the very terms of the statute, the sale cannot be made unless the share of each owner is worth less than $100. The language applies to the value of the share of the owner at the time the sale is sought to be made, without reference to the time the interest is acquired, so that, if one owner purchases the share of another, and thus increased the value of his share to $100 or more, the sale cannot be had under this section, although the remaining shares are each worth less than $100.

Subsection 2 of section 490 provides that a vested estate may be sold for division, "if the estate be in possession, and the property cannot be divided without materially impairing its value or the value of plaintiffs' interest therein." It will be observed, that in order to make a sale under this provision, it is necessary that the estate should be in possession, and we have uniformly held that a remainder interest is not property in possession within the meaning of this subsection. (Swearington v. Abbott, &c., 99 Ky., 271; Malone v. Conn, &c., 95 Ky., 93; Dineen v. Hall, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1615.)

It follows, therefore, that the judgment ordering a sale of the land is unwarranted, and it is, therefore, reversed, with directions to dismiss the petition.

MAYSVILLE & BIG SANDY R. R. CO. v. McCABE, BY, &c.

(Filed September 27, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Railroads—Damages—Instructions—Where appellee and two companions stole a ride on appellant's train, disembarking at Maysville in appellant's yard, sat down on the track and fell asleep when a freight train in passing cut off his leg and killed his companions, he was a trespasser and the company owed him no duty except reasonable diligence to prevent injury to him after his peril was discovered. There being no evidence to the effect that the boys were discovered by those in charge of the train, but on the contrary it appearing that their presence was not discovered, a peremptory instruction should have been given the appellant.

W. H. Wadsworth and L. J. Crawford for appellant.

Jas. C. & B. A. Wright and Geo. Veith for appellees.

Appeal from Campbell Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

The appellee, a lad of fifteen years, and two other boys about the same age, secretly boarded appellant's passenger train, called in the record "The Fast Flyer," at Newport. Ky., and stole a ride to Maysville, Ky., where they disembarked in the yard of appellant at about 11 o'clock p. m., and sat down on the railorad track, smoked cigarettes, and finally fell asleep. At 12:40 o'clock a. m., one of appellant's freight trains came along ran over the sleeping boys, killing his companions and cutting off appellee's leg and foot. To recover damages for this injury this action was instituted. A trial resulted in a verdict for $3,000 in appellee's favor.

The evidence shows beyond a doubt that the boys were asleep on the track in appellant's private yard, and they were, therefore, trespassers. Appellant owed them no duty save to use reasonable diligence to prevent injuring them after their peril was discovered.

The case of Dugan's Adm'r v. C. & O. Railway Co., 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1754, is in all substantial respects similar to the case at bar and is conclusive of it.

There was no evidence that applellant's servants saw appellee prior to his injury; on the contrary, it was shown that they did not see him at all, and did not know until some minutes after the catastrophe, that any one had been hurt. The court should have awarded the peremptory instruction asked by appellant.

The judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent herewith.

IRONTON FIRE BRICK CO. v. TUCKER, &c.

(Filed September 27, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Lands—Heirs at law—In this action by the children of a deceased sister to recover an interest in land of her brother on the ground that he is dead, there being no evidence that he was unmarried or without issue, or that he is not still living, no inquiry appearing to have been made for him at his last known place of residence, and the proof failing to establish that he is dead intestate without issue, a judgment in favor of those claiming, in this record to be his heirs, was unwarranted.

E. B. Wilhoit for appellant.

Armstrong & Woods for appellees.

Appeal from Carter Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

By his will, probated in the year 1861, James Henderson devised to Lydia Mockabee for life and after her death to her two children, William David Mockabee and Martha Ann Mockabee, a tract of land in Carter county. Lydia Mockabee was then living on the land with her children. Shortly afterwards she removed with them to the State of Ohio and thereafter died there on October 4, 1865. Martha Ann, her daughter, married David McGraw, and on September 13, 1866, she and her husabnd conveyed to O. P. Holland her one-half interest in the land.. Holland conveyed to L. L. Tabor, who conveyed to Sarah J. Gill the entire boundary of land. Gill conveyed to Clark and Clark conveyed to those under whom appellants claim. Tabor had a tenant on the land while he held it, but after this it was vacant for a while. Clark got it in November, 1877, and moved on it, and from that time to the bringing of this action it was held by Clark and those claiming under him as their property.

This suit was filed on May 12, 1896, to recover one-half of the land. Appellants are the children of Martha Ann McGraw. They do not claim their mother's one-half of the land, but claim as heirs at law of their uncle, William David Mockabee, alleging that he died intestate and without issue. The only proof to sustain this averment is that about the year 1863, William David Mockabee was in Carter county. He had then enlisted in the U. S. army and wore a soldier's uniform. The only other proof as to him is by appellee, Rebecca J. Tucker, who says that she was thirty-one years of age when she gave her deposition in the year 1896. She says that William David Mockabee was at her mother's house when she was a small child, and that her mother received a letter from him from Vincennes, Ind., in the year 1872; that she heard her mother read the letter and he said in the letter that he was working as porter in a hotel. He also told her to go to Carter county and redeem the land and to keep his part of it, and if he ever needed it he would call on her for it, but that he never expected to return. Her mother wrote to him after that time but received no answer and none of the family have heard from him since.

On this proof it is insisted that it must be presumed that William David Mockabee was dead in 1879, and section 1639, Kentucky Statutes, is relied on.: "If any person, who shall have resided in this State, go from and do not return to this State for seven successive years, he shall be presumed to be dead, in any case wherein his death shall come in question, unless proof be made that he was alive within that time."

It is not easy to see that this statute applies to the case. William David Mockabee was not a resident of this State, and did not go from this State when he went to Indiana. He was a resident of Ohio and went from Ohio to Indiana. The common-law rule was that to raise the presumption of death the person must have been absent from his home or place of residence. (Commonwealth v. Thompson, 87 Am. Dec., 685; 22 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 1248; Spur v. Trimble, 1 A. K. Marshall, 278.) But aside from all this if it could be presumed that William David Mockabee was dead there is nothing in the record to show that he died without issue or died intestate.

There is no evidence as to how long William David Mockabee had lived in Vincennes, Ind., when he was last heard from there, or that he had any other home. There is no showing that he was unmarried or without children. It is not shown that he is not still living at Vincennes, for no inquiry appears to have been made there for him. His mother died in 1865. His only sister died in 1878. His only relatives were her children, the oldest of whom only saw him once when she was a little child and afterwards changed her name in marriage and her residence. The proof, therefore, fails to show that he is dead intestate and without issue, or that appellees, who are the children of his sister, are his heirs at law or have any interest in his share of the land. (Martin v. Royse, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 775.)

Appellees have not made out their claim for the property and the judgment in their favor is unwarranted. The only appellants before us are the Ironton Fire Brick Co and N. D. Tabor. As to them the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the petition.

FORDSVILLE BANKING CO. v. THOMPSON, &c.

(Filed September 27, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Note—Sureties—Liability—Defenses—Verdict—Peremptory instructions—The defendants admit they signed the note sued on as sureties, and it is not denied that the Thompson Coal Co. got the money thereon by reason of their signatures, but they seek to escape liability, first, because C. C. Roberts, who signed the name of the "Thopmson Coal Co." to the note, had no authority to do so; second, that said coal company, after the maturity of the note, frequently had to its credit in the bank a sufficient sum of money to have paid the note, and negligently permitted the money to be checked out for other purposes; third, that the note sued on was embraced in a mortgage for $1,034.96 given to the bank March 24, 1898, by C. C. Roberts. In our opinion the proof wholly fails to make out a valid defense on either ground, and the verdict of the jury in favor of the appellees is palpably and flagrantly against the evidence. A peremptory instruction to find for the plaintiff should have been given.

R. L. Greene and Robt. Crenshaw for appellant.

R. A. Burnett for appellees.

Appeal from Trigg Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

Appellant for the second time appeals from a judgment rendered in favor of the appellee upon the verdict of a jury. The opinion upon the first appeal is reported in 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1276, and contains a full statement o the issues raised by the pleading, and the testimony introduced upon the former trial. The judgment upon the $200 note was paid, and only the note executed on the 12th of May, 1897, for $350 was in issue upon the last trial. The testimony thereon was not materially different from that introduced upon the first trial. The appellants, Hickman and Pointer, admit that they signed this note as securities, and it is not denied that the coal company got the money thereon by reason of their signatures, but they, nevertheless, ek to escape liability on three grounds. First, because as they allege G. Roberts, who signed the name of the Thompson Coal Company to this ligation, was not authorized by the company to do so; and that for this ason, it is not an enforcible obligation against the company, nor against em as securities. The only testimony introduced to support this defense that of the witness, M. S. Thompson, for whom the money was borrowed. hile he denies the right of Roberts to borrow money and sign the firm me to the obligation therefor, he admits that the company got the money ereon and appropriated it to its needs. He further testifies that he was sent from the company's place of business most of the time, and gave up e management of the business to Roberts, who had express authority to form all acts necessary for the conduct of the business. On this point berts testifies that he was the superintendent and general manager of the l company, and transacted all its business at the mines from the time y started to do business, and that this included the supervision of its ancial affairs; that he procured Mrs. Pointer, his sister and Mr. Hick- n, his friend, to sign the note as an accommodation to him. While on e other hand, I. C. Adair, the cashier of the banking company who made e loan, testifies that Roberts represented to him that he was a member of e firm, and by virtue of his position as general superintendent and man- er had authority to sign its name; that Thompson had also previously vised him in writing that Roberts would attend to all the financial busi- ss of the company; and that he subsequently acknowledged his indebted- ss for the obligation sued on, and repeatedly promised to pay it. The timony of Arthur E. Smith, the teller of the bank, fully corroborates se statements. It seems to us that the testimony wholly fails to support defense.

t is next contended that the Thompson Coal Company, after the maturity the obligation sued on, frequently had to its credit in bank a sufficient n of money to have paid the note, and that the banking company were lty of such negligence in permitting the company to check this money , as to relieve them from liability on their obligation. On this point berts testifies that the account of the coal company with the bank gen- lly showed an overdraft, but that on several occasions it had a balance ts credit, out of which the obligation sued on could have been paid, if the pany had been vigilant and charged up the note; and he specifically es that in the month of November, 1897, he deposited orders on the treas- r of the Illinois Central Railroad Company for coal sold them, which regated $1,500 and $1,700, out of which the note could have been paid. admits, however, that he drew a check on this deposit for $390, in favor W. F. Browder, and another in favor of the Frazier Grocery Company $245, and the balance to the sheriff of Ohio county in settlement of cer- executions he held against the coal company. He also admits writing umber of letters addressed by him to the bank, at the time he would e deposits, calling the attention of the bank to the fact that there were tanding checks against such deposits. For instance, on the 26th of Sep- ber, 1898, he wrote the following letter:

Dear Ike: Enclosed find check for $165, which you will please place to credit to pay check given 21st and 22d. I will have $300 from Mrs.

Pointer this next week, and have written Capt. Stone to send me check for $500, this month. I will get it. Ike, I want all the checks I have out paid, the amount sent you to-day will more than do it. I will make out R. R. bills to-day and will see you Wednesday. The Thompson debt must be transferred to me or I may require you to bring suit on it and judgment assigned to me. When I see you, will devise way and means. See that no check given 21 and 22 is returned but all paid. I will be all right with the bank and you this week.

"Yours, ROBERTS."

On the 30th of September, 1898, he wrote as follows:

"Ike: Have just finished making out bills for coal shipped this month. Local bills $760.59 and $212.12. Have requested that all remittances be sent to Fordsville Banking Co. I have done fairly well this month considering how short handed I was at start, then too the same old story-not cars enough. I will be up early next week, and we will arrange about the Thompson debt. I want it transferred to me, if we can arrange about it. F. T. Gunther will take the Wagon Factory note, pay note and take stock. You might write to him.

"Yours, ROBERTS."

On the other hand the cashier of the bank and its book-keeper, both testify that there never was at any time after the maturity of the obligation sued on, a day when the coal company had to its credit sufficient funds to pay the note; that the account was almost always overdrawn, as contemporaneously with making deposits the coal company drew check on the funds so deposited, generally more than sufficient to consume it, and the itemized account of the coal company with the bank, filed in the record, supports this testimony. On the 24th of July, 1898, G. C. Roberts, executed a mortgage to the bank to secure the payment of a note for $1,032.96, and he testifies that this sum covered the entire indebtedness of the coal company to the bank, including the obligation sued on, and appellees rely upon this testimony as conclusive evidence of payment. When this mortgage was executed, Thompson had retired from the firm, transferring the business to Roberts. Adair, the cashier of the bank testifies that this mortgage was given to secure an unpaid balance of $985.66 and interest on a note given June 3, 1898, which had been secured by a claim against the I. C. R. R. Co., but which they had failed to pay, and that a note was given simultaneously with the execution of the mortgage; that it had no connection whatever with the note sued on, and they were not included in it; and that suit was then pending to enforce the payment of that note, and his testimony was fully supported by that of the assistant cashier. This in brief is a summary of the testimony upon the defenses relied on by appellees. In our opinion it wholly fails to make out a valid defense upon either ground, and the verdict of the jury in favor of appellees was palpalby and flagrantly against the weight of evidence. A peremptory instruction to find for the plaintiff on the obligation should have gone, on the trial of the case.

For reasons indicated the judgment is reversed, and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

GEOGHEGAN v. TURNER, &c.

(Filed September 27, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Forcible entry—Uninclosed land—It is not necessary for the maintenance of forcible entry, that the land in controversy should be enclosed.
2. Possession—Division line—Lane—Where the plaintiff was in possession of land to an old division line between him and defendant, the fact that he moved his fence in, so as to leave a lane for his own convenience, between him and defendant, was not an abandonment of his possession to said line, and an entry by defendant within said lane, made him liable for a forcible entry.

L. A. Faurest and J. P. O'Meara for appellant.

J. S. Worthan and C. H. Moorman for appellees.

Appeal from Hardin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The appellees instituted a proceeding against the appellant for forcible entry and detainer before the judge of the Hardin County Court. Upon the trial it was adjudged that appellant was guilty and a judgment of restitution entered. A trial in the circuit court upon appeal resulted in the affirmance of the judgment of the county court, and defendant appeals.

Appellant and appellees and those under whom they claim have owned adjoining tracts of land for more than forty years before the institution of this proceeding, and a division fence had been maintained between their respective tracts. The line as marked by the fence was not a perfectly straight one. About twelve years before the institution of this proceeding, the appellant, Geoghegan, and William Turner, who was the father of appellee, W. T. Turner and the husband of appellee, S. W. Turner, in order to straighten the line between them, verbally agreed that Turner should set a stone at one end of the line on the turnpike road, and Geoghegan should set one at the other end of the line on the bank of the Ohio river; and that a straight line connecting these two stones should be the division line between their respective tracts of land; and that the division fence should be moved to and maintained on this new line. The line was a long one and the terminal point thereof, could not be seen from either end. Some time after the setting of these stones, the parties employed George G. Taylor, a surveyor, to run the line. When they met on the land for this purpose, it was discovered that Geoghegan's stone on the bank of the river was missing. Turner, however, insisted that the line should be run from the stone in the edge of the turnpike road to the point where he claimed the stone had been placed on the bank of the river. Geoghegan refused to abide by his agreement, and insisted that the line between them should be run without reference to the stones and by the calls of his deed. Being unable to come to an understanding, no survey was made and the old fence continued the division line between them. William Turner, Sr., died in January, 1900. After his death, his widow and only child, the appellee, W. T. Turner disconnected their end of the division fence, pursuant to notice, and set their fence back on their land sixteen feet from the old division line, for the avowed purpose of leaving a lane sixteen feet wide on the outside of their fence along the old division line for their own use and convenience. Several weeks after they had built the new fence, the appellant took possession of about onethird of the sixteen feet left for the lane, and enclosed it with a fence with the residue of his tract. To recover the strip of land so enclosed this proceeding was instituted.

Appellant's chief, and in fact his only contention upon this appeal is, that appellees did not have actual adverse possession of the strip of land enclosed by him at the time of the entry; and that consequently the writ of forcible entry was not available for its recovery. The main basis for this contention is that parol agreement between the elder Turner and appellant fixing the division line with the stones as they terminate, it being insisted that from this time the line fixed by the stones was the true line; and, that Turner ceased thereafter to be either in the actual or constructive possession of the land outside of that line. In a number of well-considered case it has been decided that an oral agreement, fixing a dividing line, between adjoining lands of antagonistic parties is not within the statute of frauds and perjuries and may be enforced in equity. (Jannison v. Petit, 6 Bush, 669; Brown v. Crow, Sneed, 108; Brisby v. Combs, 14 Ky. Law Rep., 651.) But in our opinion the facts of this case do not bring it within this rule. Even if it be conceded that the elder Turner and appellant actually agreed upon the new division line, it is equally clear that before this agreement could be carried into effect one of the terminal stones was removed from some cause, and that appellant subsequently refused to carry the agreement into effect, and apparently by mutual consent the agreement was abandoned, each party remaining in possession of the land separated by the old fence. There can be no doubt that appellees were in the actual and adverse possession up to the old line at the time they set the fence back for the lane, and the law is settled that it is not necessary for the maintenance of an action for forcible entry that the land in controversy should be enclosed. (Howard v. Whitaker, 17 Ky. Law Rep., 1775.)

The judgment is, therefore, affirmed.

ALTSHELER, &c. v. CONRAD.

(Filed September 28, 1904.)

1. Action for damages—Limitation in an action by plaintiffs against the defendants to recover damages on the allegation that by reason of the failure of defendants to repair an iron apron at the side of the door, to a building which plaintiffs had rented from defendants, and which defendants promised to repair in a reasonable time, and by reason of such failure one of plaintiffs' employes was injured by falling on said defective apron, for which injury plaintiffs were compelled to pay said employe damages in the sum of $205, the limitation to plaintiff's cause of action is five years.

2. Consideration—Demurrer—A demurrer of defendant to plaintiffs' petition should have been sustained because it does not allege that there was any consideration for the promise or agreement made by defendants to repair said apron.

3. Pleading—Breach of contract—An amended answer filed by defendant alleging that the person injured was in the employe of plaintiff at the time of his alleged injury, which occurred on December 11, 1896, and that plaintiff's action is founded on said alleged injuries to said employe, and is barred by limitation, which they plead and rely on, is not a good plea, and the plaintiffs' demurrer thereto should have been sustained, as the plaintiffs' action is not founded on the injury to his employe, but, upon the failure of defendants to comply with their contract to repair the apron by reason of which plaintiffs sustained the loss of $205.

O'Neal and O'Neal for appellants.

M. A., D. A., and J. G. Sachs for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

This appeal is from a judgment of the lower court in overruling a demurrer to an amended answer pleading the statute of limitations, to the cause of action set forth in appellants' petition. The petition in substance sets forth the following facts; that appellants had rented from the appellee a business house on the corner of Eighth and Main streets in the city of Louisville, for the term of three years for the purpose of conducting a wholesale grocery business therein. That they discovered an iron apron, at the side of Eighth street door, in a dangerous condition; that it was placed at too great an incline and made it dangerous for one passing merchandise into and out of the building, over it; that they called appellee's attention to the dangeorus condition and improper construction of this apron and requested him to have it changed or altered so as to make it safe. That he then promised and agreed to do so within a reasonable time, but did not make such change, or any change in the apron, and violated his promise and agreement with reference thereto, and alleged that one of their epmloyes, by the name of Breen, while in the exercise of his duties, slipped and fell on this apron and broke one of his limbs; that Breen brought an action against these appellants for, and on account of the damages he had received for the injuries stated, and recovered of these appellants a judgment, including costs, amounting to $205, which they were compelled to and did pay Breen; that this payment was the result of the failure of appellee to comply with his promise and agreement to repair and make safe this apron, and they sought judgment against appellee for that sum.

The appellee demurred to this petition, which was overruled. He then answered, making a general denial of all the allegations in the petition and in another paragraph undertook to plead the statute of limitation. A demurrer was filed to this paragraph by the appellants, which the court sustained, and the appellee then filed an amendment to this paragraph as follows: "The defendant, for amendment to his answer herein, and to make more definite, specific and certain his plea of limitation herein says that P. Breen was a servant of the plaintiffs and in their actual employment at the time of the alleged injury to the said Breen. This defendant says that the alleged injury to said Breen occurred on the 11th day of December, 1896, in the city of Louisville, Ky., where said Breen was acting in his capacity as servant and employe of plaintiff aforesaid and this actiou is founded on said alleged injuries to plaintiff's servant and employe, Breen, as afore said. This defendant says that under the law of the statute of Kentucky the plaintiffs' causeof action is long since barred, and he pleads and relies upon the law of theState of Kentucky in such cases made and provided as a bar to any recovery herein."

The court erred in overruling a demurrer to this plea of the statute of limitations. The appellants had no right to maintain an action for the injuries to Breen, their servant; this right alone existed in Breen, and the appellee is in error when he says that applelants' action is founded on such injuries. As appears from the petition itwas founded on the violation of the alleged contract made by appellee with appellants to repair and make safe this iron apron, and on account of such failure and violation of contract they sustained this loss of $205. If it had been brought for the injuries to Breen, the twelve-months' statute would apply, but if it had been brought to recover the $205, which they had lost by reasdn of the breach of this contract or agreement, then the five-years' statute would apply, and this time had not elapsed at the time of the institution of this action.

We are of the opinion that the court erred also in overruling the demurrer to the petition. It is not stated in the petition that this promise and agreement on the part of the appellee to repair and make safe this apron, was in writing, nor was there any writing filed with the papers showing any such promise or agreement; therefore, it must be deemed that this promise and agreement was verbal. Such being the case it was indispensably necessary for the appellants to have alleged, in their petition, a consideration for this promise and agreement. There is not an intimation in the pleadings that they paid or promised appellee anything to make this repair. (1 Mar., 538; 2 Mar., 139 and 382.) Unless there was a consideration paid or promised the appellee for the making of this repair, the appellants can not sustain their action on appellee's promise to repair. (Elbin v. Miller, 78 Ky., 371; Proctor v. Keith, 12 B. M., 252.)

Wherefore the judgment of the lower court is reversed and the cause remanded with directions to sustain the demurrer to both the amended answer and the petition.

REYNOLDS v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed September 28, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Criminal law—Instructions—An instruction which told the jury that if defendant in sudden affray, or in sudden heat and passion, without previous malice and not in his necessary, or apparently necessary self-defense, shot and killed deceased, the crime was manslaughter, was proper where the proof showed that appellant and deceased were in a fist fight, during which appellant shot and killed his adversary.

Tye & Denham and T. C. Morrow for appellant.

N. B. Hays, and Loraine Mix for appellee.

Appeal from Whitley Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

In this appeal from a judgment convicting appellant of manslaughter, his principal criticism of the trial court's ruling is, as to the instruction defining manslaughter. This instruction told the jury that if the defendant in sudden affray, or in sudden heat and passion, without previous malice, and not in his necessary, or apparently necessary, self-defense, shot and killed the deceased, the crime was that of manslaughter. The court told the jury also that "an 'affray' is a mutual combat voluntarily engaged in by two or more persons in a public place."

Unobjectionable instructions were given on the subject of self defense. There was proof tending to show that appellant and the deceased were fighting with their fists at a public gathering in the town of Corbin, during which appellant shot and killed his adversary. From the testimony of the Commonwealth witnesses it appears that the affray came up over some trivial remark, or maybe, by reason of some previous feeling. The jury, under their interpretation of the evidence accepted this view of the matter, and rejected appellants' evidence tending to show self-defense. Under the evidence we are of opinion that the case called for the instruction as given, and that the definitions used by the court are correct. (2 Bishop's Crim. Law, section 701 East Pl., Cr., 244; 4 Bl. Com., 145.)

Judgment affirmed.

DARRELL v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed September 23, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Criminal law—Rape—Evidence—Upon the trial of appellant for rape, evidence tending to show that he endeavored to procure medicines for the purpose of bringing about an abortion, was improperly admitted where the accused testified that he had sexual intercourse with the prosecutrix and that he had had such relations with her on many occasions Had he denied these relations, then it would have tended to contradict him, because the jury might have inferred that he was not willing to produce the abortion unless he was responsible for her condition.

2. Same—Conduct of prosecuting attorney upon the trial—Upon the trial of appellant in this action he filed an affidavit of Gaddis and moved for a continuance. During the argument for the Commonwealth, the county attorney, in commenting upon the affidavit, said: "The affidavit of Gaddis is a lie and they knew it. I don't care who resents it." This statement was improper and prejudicial to the rights of the appellant.

Watkins & Birkhead for appellant.

N. B. Hays and Loraine Mix for appellee.

Appeal from Daviess Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The appellant was found guilty under an indictment charging him with the offense of rape upon the person of Lillie Thomas Darrell, his niece. From appellant's admissions with reference to his sexual relations with the complainant, he is shown to be brutal and without the slightest claim upon good people for their respect. While this is true he is entitled to have a fair tiral under the indictment charging him with rape.

It is urged that the court should have given a peremptory instruction to find the appellant not guilty, because the prosecutrix did not make an outcry at the time she claims the offense was committed, it having occurred at a place where she might have expected some one to have heard and come to her rescue, and because she did not tell of the occurrence for months after wards and continued to sustain friendly relations with the appellant, and for other reasons not necessary to mention. The circumstances relied upon to show that the court should have given a perepmtory instruction, were simply admissible as tending to show that she consented to the act which she now claims was a rape. The jury might well have reached the conclusion that the sexual act was with her consent; this, however, was a question for the jury, not for the court.

On the trial of the case the court admitted evidence tending to show that the appellant endeavored to procure medicines for the purpose of producing an abortion upon the prosecutrix, she having become pregnant. The tendency of this evidence was to show that the appellant had it in mind to commit another offense. In admitting this evidence the court erred. It had no legitimate bearing upon the question at issue. The court admitted it for the purpose of contradiction. The accused admitted that he had had sexual intercourse with the prosecutrix at the time she claims he committed the rape, and declared that he had had such relations with her on many occasions. Had he denied that he had had sexual intercourse with her, then it would have tended to contradict him, because the jury might have inferred that he was not willing to produce an abortion unless he was responsible for her condition.

The appellant filed an affidavit and moved the court for a continuance of the case. In the affidavit he stated what certain absent witnesses would prove. The court allowed it to be read as a deposition. The affidavit was competent and material. During the argument for the Commonwealth, the county attorney, in commenting on the affidavit which was read as a deposition, (one of the witnesses was named Gaddis) said "that the affidavit of Gaddis was a lie and they knew it. I don't care who presents it," and he again said: " I say the statements in the affidavit, that Gaddis had relations with this girl, is a lie, and they knew it when they made it." Objections were made to the statements of the attorney, and the court simply admonished him to keep within the record. The defendant was entitled to have the statements made in the affidavit as to what an absent witness would prove to be, considered by the jury as the evidence of the absent witness. It was entirely improper for the county attorney to endeavor to break the force of the testimony by stating that the defendant lied when he made the affidavit and knew it. We think the statements of the county attorney were improper and prejudicial to the rights of the defendant. Under the facts of this case the defendant, having made the admission that he had sustained improper relations with his niece, was calculated to arouse a strong feeling of condemnation in the jury, hence the remark of the county attorney added to that feeling, because it imported that he had been guilty of the offense of false swearing in addition to the offense admitted by him, and the one which the Commonwealth was endeavoring to establish.

The judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

COMMONWEALH v. ROBT. AND LULA VINEYARD.

(Filed September 23, 1904.)

Indictment--Taking property—Owner—Peremptory instruction—Under section 128, Criminal Code, providing: "If an offense involve * * * the taking of property and be described with sufficient certainty to identify the act, an erroneous allegation * * * as to the owner of the property taken * * * is not material," on the trial of an indictment alleging that the property stolen belonged to the Columbus Stave Co., and that it was an incororated company the failure of the Commonwealth to prove that the company was incorporated, did not authorize the trial court to give a peremptory instruction to the jury to find defendants not guilty, as it was not necessary to allege or prove that the company was incorporated.

N. B. Hays and Loraine Mix for appellant.

J. M. Nichols & Son for appellees.

Appeal from Carlisle Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The indictment charged that the defendants stole certain manila ropes from the Columbus Stave Co., which was a duly incoprorated company. The evidence introduced by the Commonwealth tended to show that the ropes were stolen from the Columbus Stave Co., and that they belonged to that company and that it was incorporated. The Commonwealth did not introduce the records to show that it was a duly incoprorated company. For this reason the court gave the jury an instruction to return a verdict for the defendants. The case was brought here to review the action of the court.

Section 128, Criminal Ccde of Practice, reads as follows: "If an offense involve the commission of, or an attempt to commit an injury to person or property, or the taking of property, and be described in other respects with sufficient certainty to identify the act, an erroneous allegation as to the person injured or attempted to be injured, or as to the owner of the property taken or injured or attempted to be injured, is not material."

The indictment was sufficiently certain without an averment that the Columbus Stave Co. was an incorporated company, therefore, it was unnecessary to aver that it was an incorporated company. The offense could have been committed whether the company was incorporated or not. Although the indictment averred that it was a corporation, had the evidence upon trial shown that it was not a corporation, still a case would have been made out against the defendants. It was to meet this and similar cases that section 128 was enacted.

In our opinion the court erred in giving the peremptory instruction. The case is not reversed because there can not be another trial.

COMMONWEALH v. PHILLIPS.

(Filed September 27, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Criminal law—Evidence—Confession of guilt—Upon the trial of appellee charged with the offense of housebreaking, the confession that he had made to a police officer was held not to be voluntary, and he was acquitted. No rule can be stated as to just what will make a confession voluntary, as the facts attending each case are different. The evidence in this action, however, that the defendant was in possession of the stolen goods was admissible, and if he had not produced them, evidence that they were found where defendant said they were, was admissible.

W. H. Hester, N. B. Hays and Loraine Mix for appellant.

Appeal from Graves Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The defendant, Phillips, was indicted for housebreaking with intent to steal therefrom. On the trial the attorney for the Commonwealth introduced witnesses and offered to prove by them that the defendant had made a confession of guilt, and that on the same day produced the goods which had been stolen from the house by those who had broken into it. The court, after hearing the witnesses, ruled that the confession was not voluntary, because he had been improperly induced to make it by a police officer who had him in custody, although not under a warrant of arrest, but for the purpose of obtaining a confession from him. The improper inducement by the officer was made some two hours before the confession was made, and if it had any effect on the mind of the defendant, it was to induce him to return the stolen goods to the owner, whereupon he made a confession to the owner and officer.

If the court did not err in holding that the improper inducement was still operating on the mind of the defendant, and that he was thereby influenced to make the confession of guilt, still the evidence that he was in possession of the stolen goods and produced them, was admissible. Even if he had not produced them, and they had been found where he in the course of a confession said they were, the evidence that they were found, together with the statement of the accused as to their location, would have been admissible. (Jane v. Commonwealth, 2 Met., 32; Rector v Commonwealth, 4 Ky. Law Rep., 32; Whitley v. Commonwealth, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 2526.)

It is not necessary to enter into a discussion of the question as to whether the court erred in reaching a conclusion that the confession had been improperly obtained, as no rule can be stated as to just what will render a confession voluntary, as the facts and circumstances attending each confession, are different. As there cannot be another trial of the case, the clerk will certify this opinion to the lower court.

STANDARD OIL CO. v. DOYLE.

(Filed September 28, 1904.)

1. Pleading—Sufficiency—Conspiracy to injure another's business—Use of unlawful means—Damages—In an action for damages by one who alleges that the defendants maliciously conspired and confederated together to injure and destroy plaintiff's business, (who was a rival of the defendants) by the use of unlawful means for that purpose, the conspiracy becomes actionable and the plaintiff may recover for any loss or damage suffered in consequence thereof.

2. Same—It was most assuredly unlawful to harrass and annoy plaintiff's employes when engaged in the discharge of their duties, in selling and distributing oils to plaintiff's customers, to threaten paintiff's customers, to shut up their business if they continued to deal in plaintiffs' oils, to cause and procure false and injurious reports concerning plaintiff and his business, to be circulated in Lexington and vicinity, where plaintiff's business was located, and to procure plaintiff's arrest and prosecution on false charges in connection with his business in the sale of oils for the purpose of estranging plaintiff's customers and patrons.

3. Reasonable inference—Where it is shown by the evidence that a purpose was accomplished by unlawful means, and when we consider the relation of the parties, their manifest motives of self-interest, the manner in which the purpose was carried out and the declarations of the parties, it is reasonable to infer that this purpose was carried out by concert of action and agreement of the defendants.

4. Co-conspirator—Declarations—A conspiracy having once been established or facts having been adduced which justify the inference of a conspiracy, the acts and declarations of each conspirator, made pursuant and in furtherance of the conspiracy, are competent evidence against all.

5. Same—Where one enters into or becomes a party to a conspiracy it matters not how prominent or inconspicuous a part he may take in the execution of the unlawful purpose, or the use of the unlawful means, he is responsible to the fullest extent for all that precedes, as well as for all that follows, in connection with the plot, whether done by himself or by one or more of his associates. The only limitation upon the rule, is, that what is said and done must be said and done after the formation of the conspiracy and in furtherance and pursuance thereof. But, what may be said and done by any one of the conspirators after the completion of the purpose for which the conspiracy was formed, can be used only against the one saying or doing it.

6. Depositions—Private conveyance—Under section 588, Civil Code, requiring the officer taking depositions to send them to the clerk by mail or private conveyance, it is lawful for the officer to send them by the Adams Express Co., where the agents of the company, through whose hands they passed, made affidavit that the depositions had not been opened by them or by any person in transit.

7. Damages—Amount—Inequality—Excessive—Province of jury—It is within the province of the jury to determine from the evidence who was most in fault and who would be benefitted most by the formation and success of the conspiracy, and it is reasonable to presume that this accounts for the inequality of the amounts adjudged, and if it be true, as the jury seems to have determined, that the conspiracy was formed and in pursuance thereof, defendants fraudulently caused plaintiff's oils to be condemned and wilfully reported to be below the legal test, and had plaintiff arrested upon the false charge of selling condemned oil, and obstructed and annoyed plaintiff's employes when delivering oil, for the purpose of driving the plaintiff out of business, a verdict of $2,500 in damages against the Standard Oil Company, and of $300 against C. B. Gilman, is not excessive.

Breckinridge & Shelby and E. L. Hutchison for appellants.

Morton, Webb & Wilson for appellee.

Appeal from Fayette Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

This appeal is prosecuted from a judgment of the Fayette Circuit Court, awarding appellee $2,300 in damages, against Standard Oil Co. and $300 against C. B. Gilman, and involves some interesitng questions. The appellants claim that a cause of action was not stated in the petition and the court erred in overruling their demurrer thereto.

It was, in substance, alleged in the petition that in the spring of the year 1901, in the city of Lexington, Ky., the appellants, C. B. Gilman and M. F. Griffith, oomposing the firm known as the Brilliant Light Oil Co., and the Standard Oil Co., a corporation, did maliciously, unlawfully and wickedly conspire, combine, confederate and agree together, between and among themselves to estrange and alienate the acquaintances, customers and patrons of the appellee, to ruin, oppress and impoverish the appellee and drive him out of the business of selling and contracting for the sale of oils, gasolines, etc., and to deprive him of all benefit and profit under his said contract, with the Wilburine Oil Works Co.

After setting out the series of wrongful acts, which we will hereafter refer to, it continued as follows; that each and all of the wrongful acts were done in pursuance of the conspiarcy alleged as existing between and among the several defendants, and that by reason of such conspiracy and of the commission of the named wrongful acts, in furtherance and execution thereof, appellee had been forced to give up and quit the business of buying, selling and dealing in illuminating oil, gasolines, etc., in the city of Lexington and vicinity, and had been forced to cancel his contract with the Wilburine Oil Works Co., and had been thereby deprived of all benefit and profit arising therefrom, and had been deprived of the opportunity to earn a livelihood for himself and family, and had been wrongfully prevented from engaging at his own home in the business and vocation of his life, which he had been pursuing for many years, and for which, from his long experience therewith and his extensive and favorable acquaintance in Lexington and vicinity, he was thoroughly fitted.

It is contended that the acts of appellants, and each of them, as alleged, were legitimate for the purpose of building up their own business and as against the appellee as a competitor, and if the appellee suffered any damages it was damnum absque injuria and cite the following cases as sustaining their position. Boulier v. McCauly, 91 Ky., 136; Chambers v. Baldwin, 91 Ky., 121; Brewster v. Miller Sons & Co., 101 Ky., 368; Baker v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1174; West Va. Transportation Co. v. Standard Oil Co., 50 West Va., 611; Continental Ins. Co. v. Board of Underwriters, 67 Fed., 310. These cases are easily distinguished from the case at bar. The first two cases cited, in effect, decide that a third party can not be made responsible in damages for causing a party to a contract to break it, unless force or fraud is used in accomplishing the result. In such cases, without an allegation and proof of force and fraud, the party breaking the contract must be regarded as having broken it of his own will and for his own benefit, and is alone responsible to the other party to the contract in damages. The third case cited. in substance, decides that no cause of action arises in favor of a person who is refused the right to purchase articles from a dealer; the merchant or dealer having the lawful right to sell or refuse to sell to whom he pleases. In the case of Baker v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. it was sought to recover damages from the company, and charged it with maliciously combining and confederating with other companies to prevent him (Baker) from receiving employment as an insurance agent at Lexington for the term of two years, and in pursuance of such conspiracy the Metropolitan Co. discharged him from its employment, without any fault on his part, and by reason thereof he had been deprived of earning his livelihood. The court decided the case against Baker for the reason that he alleged in his petition that his employment was for an indefinite length of time, and he had, therefore, the right to quit whenever he saw proper, and the company had also the right to terminate the employment at pleasure; and the court also approved the principles announced in the case of Brewster v. Miller Sons & Co. to the effect that it is lawful in one to decline to enter into a business undertaking with any one. The other two cases referred to do not support appellant's contention.

In the petition a malicious conspiracy and confederation on the part of appellants to injure appellee in his business, was charged, also the means employed by them to effectuate their purpose and the injury and damage resulting to appellee by reason of the alleged wrongs. The charge of malicious conspiracy, confederation, etc., against appellants, even if true, did not give appellee a cause of action unless the means used by them to carry out their purpose, were unlawful, and that by such means they succeeded in injuring appellee's business. Malice and bad motive alone do not constitute a cause of action, but where one exists they only make it worse for the defendants. Undoubtedly one man may, by fair methods, compete with a rival until by sheer force of competition, by under-selling or outbidding him, his own business is built up to the detriment and ruin of his rival. The damage in such case is, in the eye of the law, damnum absque injuria. But a different case is presented where one seeks not only to build up his own business at the expense of a rival's, but to impair, and, if possible, destroy that rival's business by the use of unlawful means, by saying and doing that which he has no lawful right to say and do, in so far as it works loss and damage to his rival. It is also true whether a conspiracy formed for the purpose of injuring or driving one out of business be lawful or unlawful so far as the purpose is concerned, yet, where unlawful means are used in effectuating that purpose, the conspiracy becomes actionable, and any loss or damage suffered in consequence, may be recovered.

The petition, in apt words, alleged the conspiracy, the means used to effectuate the purpose and the resulting loss to appellee. The remaining matter to be determined is, whether the alleged means used to injure or drive appellee out of business were lawful or unlawful; if lawful, the petition did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; if unlawful, it did, and the lower court did not err in overruling appellant's demurrer. That part of the petition which describes the means used to effectuate their purpose is as follows: "By wanton and malicious interference with plaintiff's business and the conduct thereof, in obstructing, harrassing and annoying plaintiff's servants and employes while engaged in the discharge of their respective duties, in selling and distributing oils, etc., to plaintiff's customers and patrons, and by wilfully enticing, persuading and otherwise influencing such servants and employes to leave plaintiff's employ, against the will and consent of plaintiff, by threatening certain wholesale customers of plaintiff to shut them up in their business if they continued to purchase and deal in plaintiffs' oils, etc., and by threatening both wholesale and retail customers of plaintiff, that it, the Standard Oil Co., aforesaid, would refuse to sell them oil, gasolines and other commodities dealt in by said defendant, as long as they continued to purchase such articles, or any of them, from plaintiff; by causing and procuring false and injurious reports concerning plaintiff and his business, to be circulated in and about the city of Lexington, and published in certain of the daily newspapers of the city; by causing and procuring plaintiff to be arrested on various charges of violating the ordinances of said city, and the criminal and penal laws of the city of Lexington and Commonwealth of Kentucky, and to be prosecuted therefor, and by divers and sundry wrongful acts to estrange and alienate the acquaintances, customers and patrons of the plaintiff, to ruin, oppress and impoverish the plaintiff and drive him out of the business of contracting for the sale of oils, gasoline, etc."

It was most assuredly unlawful to obstruct, harass and annoy appellee's employes when engaged in the discharge of their duties in selling and distributing oils to appellee's customers; to threaten customers of appellee to shut them up in their business if they continued to deal in appellee's oils; to cause and procure false and injurious reports concerning appellee and his business to be circulated in Lexington and vicinity, and to procure appellee's arrest and prosecution on false charges in connection with his business in the sale of oils, for the purpose of estranging and alienating the acquaintances, customers and patrons of appellee. (69 Wis., 483; 42 Hun., 153; 52 N. J. L., 284; 46 Am. Rep., 379; 49 Am. Rep., 666; 5 W. Va., 611.)

The appellant's claim that the court erred in refusing to give a peremptory instruction on their behalf at the close of appellees' evidence, and at the close of all the evidence. The testimony is voluminous and mostly circumstantial. That introduced by appellee tended to show the following state of facts; that appellee, prior to April, 1901, had been in the employ of the appellant, the Standard Oil Co. for fifteen or twenty years in the sale of oil, etc., in the city of Lexington and vicinity. At the date named, Doyle resigned as its agent, and made an arrangement with the Wilburine Oil Works Co., of Cincinnati, to furnish him oils for sale in that city and vicinity. He was furnished this oil in carload lots and did a thriving business in the months of May, June and a part of July. He sold or contracted one carload of the oils to M. F. Griffith, a party defendant to this action, who was in the business of selling and distributing oils under the name of The Brilliant Light Oil Co. Dolye sold other oils to wholesale and retail dealers.

Some time in the month of June, one Bonnycastle, representing the Standard Oil Co., arrived in the city of Lexington to look after the business interests of the Standard Oil Co. in Kentucky, by increasing its sales of oil, by making for it new customers and, if possible, to regain the customers lost by reason of Doyle's connection with the Standard Oil Co. having been severed. According to his statement, he first approached appellant, C. B. Gilman, who was the oil inspector for Fayette county, for aid and advice. They concluded that the best thing to do was to furnish wagons and oil to one Fisher, who was deputy oil inspector under Gilman, to sell and distribute oil in opposition to Griffith who was running the Brilliant Light Oil Co. Immediately after this Bonnycastle and one Guthrie, another agent of the Standard Oil Co., went to the house of Griffith and asked him why he had quit buying oil of the Standard Oil Co., and Griffith told them that the company had not treated him right by not giving him a sufficient rebate. They then proposed that if he would ship back the oil he had purchased from Doyle they ,would then consider giving him a rebate of one cent per gallon, and also that if he did not ship the oil back, that they would put wagons on the route in opposition to him and ruin his trade. As a result of this and subsequent conversations, Griffith returned the oil he had purchased from Dolye, and formed a partnership with appellant, Gilman, and they continued in partnership, under the name of The Brilliant Light Oil Co. for six months, when Gilman bought Griffith's half interest in the business. During this partnership and afterwards, Fisher, who was the deputy oil inspector, was secretary and treasurer of the concern. They received two wagons from the Standard Oil Co. to be used in peddling the company's oils.

Appellee's evidence tends to show that they were furnished without charge, while appellant's, that they were purchased. These wagons were run by drivers of the Brilliant Light Oil Co. in opposition to the appellees' wagons and the proof of applelee shows that they obstructed, annoyed and harassed the driver of appellee by following him and, some times getting in front of him and stopping at every place where appellee's driver stopped. Some times going into the residence with appellee's driver and there offering to sell oil at a cheaper rate and offering to give their oil without charge, if they would not buy oil of appellee. In one or two instances cursing and abusing the driver of appellee. Some times they would stand for hours at one place awaiting the movement of appellee's driver. It was in proof that this conduct of the drivers of the Brilliant Light Oil Co., was authorized and directed by the appellant, Gilman. Gilman stated that he did not authorize the abuse, nor any of the improper conduct, but stated that the Brilliant Light Oil Co. had their cans deposited at different residences throughout the city, and they did direct the drivers to follow up the drivers of appellee and see to it, that the oils sold by the appellee be not deposited in their cans, and if the people at the places where their cans were deposited did not desire to continue to trade with the Brilliant Light Oil Co., then to take up their cans. That the following up of appellee's driver was continued only for a day and a half.

Appellee's proof shows that in some instances Gilman's drivers persisted in this conduct at places where the Brilliant Light Oil Co. had no cans on deposit. Appellee proved that after he discovered that the Standard Oil Co. had made an arrangement or contract with appellant, Gilman, the oil inspector of Fayette county, to receive and dispose of its oils in competiton with him, he then became fearful that his oils would not receive a fair inspection at the hands of his rival in business, and he had the next carload of oil run across from Cincinnati to Ludlow, in Kenton county, and there inspected by the oil inspector of Kenton county and then shipped on to him at Lexington. When this car reached Lexington, appellant and his deputy, Fisher, inspected it. Fisher first, and afterwards appellant, and they reported that it was below the test of 180 deg. F. The Kenton county inspector reported that it was above the legal test. When appellee learned of the action of the appellant and his assistant he, with a friend, took samples of this oil from four or five barrels to the A. & M. College, and there had Profs. Scovel and Peters, expert chemists, make the test and they found it above the legal test, and on the next day Gilman and R. J. O'Mahoney, an ex-oil inspector for that county, took samples of this oil and made tests themselves, and had the same chemists, Scovel and Peters, make tests of it, and they found that the oil would burn at 129 Deg. F. Gilman then branded this carload of oil and condemned it as unsafe for illuminating purposes. Then Gilman caused his deputy, Fisher, who was also a deputy clerk, to issue a summons against appellee to appear before the court to show cause why he should not be punished for selling unsafe oils. At the time of the issual of this summons, appellee was in the State of Illinois visiting his father. On his return the summons was served and on motion of defendant it was dismissed for the reason that it was illegally issued. Then appellant, Gilman appeared before a magistrate and made affidavit and caused a warrant to be issued against appellee, charging him with selling and offering to sell unsafe and condemned oils. On the trial of this case before County Judge Bullock, the court selected two persons to select four or five samples of this condemned oil, and had them brought into court, and there had tests made in his presence by Gilman, O'Mahoney, B. Tansey, the inspector for Kenton county, and Profs. Scovell and Peters. After hearing all the evidence and witnessing these tests he dismissed the charge against appellee. After Gilman condemned this carload of oil he reported verbally and in writing to the customers of appellee, that the oils had been condemned, and that they must not buy it or sell it, that if they did they would be prosecuted for it. After this notice, these customers of appellee did not sell any more of this oil nor purchase any more oil from him.

It was shown that the next carload of oil that was shipped to appellee was tested by Gilman and his assistant and showed that it was above the legal test, as was reported by the inspector. Appellee introduced as a witness one Haffey, who was formerly in the employ of the Brilliant Light Oil Co., who stated that before this carload of oil was condemned by Gilman and his assistant, he was present and in a conversation which took place in the office of the Brilliant Light Oil Co., when Gilman said to the witness and Bonnycastle, the agent of the Standard Oil Co., that appellee had not treated him right in having this oil inspected in Kenton county and trying to cut him out of his fees for inspection, and then remarked: "I dont think it will stand the test anyhow and I will condemn it.' Bonnycastle then said, "Condemn it and we will see you through it." Appellee also introduced one W. C. Chipps, who stated that he was in the employ of the Standard Oil Co. in Louisville at the time this competition arose between appellee and appellants, but soon thereafter ceased his connection with the company and went to the city of Chicago and engaged in the oil business with another company. That he returned to Louisivlle in August or September of the same year and visited the office of appellant. That while he was there he remarked to Capt. Harrison, who was the manager for the appellant for the State of Kentucky, "I understand that John Bonnycastle is now agent for the company at Lexington." He made an affirmative reply and I then asked him how Mr. Doyle was getting along in the oil business there, and he replied, "It has been reduced to a minimum, as we made arrangements with some peddlers that were already there and furnished them wagons and oil and put them out, and that soon settled the matter."

The proof also showed that during this contest for supremacy in the oil business at Lexington, that Bonnycastle and Gilman were often together in private conversation, each visiting the others' office frequently. It was also in proof that Bonnycastle, about the time this oil was condemned, stated to one, J. R. Dodd, a grocery merchant, who bought oil from appellee, that in the event he continued to buy oil from the appellee that he, Bonnycastle, would stop his wagon from delivering oil to him. He also told one Martin, another grocery merchant, that he could not buy oil from both parties. If he bought Doyles oil he could not get any more from the Standard Oil Co. This evidence, the statements of Bonnycastle to the customers of appellee, was not introduced for the purpose of showing illegal acts on the part of appellant company, for, as stated, it had the right to sell or refuse to sell its products to whom it pleased, but it was introduced to show the connection bewteen it and those composing the firm of the Brilliant Light Oil Co. as a circumstance tending to show the conspiracy charged in the petition. It appears from all the testimony of appellee that he was injured and damaged in his business by unlawful means used by appellants.

While the evidence was conflicting upon all the questions at issue, and especially upon the issue of conspiracy, yet we are of the opinion that there was sufficient evidence upon that point to authorize a submission to the jury. A conspiracy is a combination between two or more persons, by concerted action, to accomplish an unlawful purpose or to accomplish a lawful purpose by unlawful means. It is shown by the evidence that a purpose was accomplished by unlawful means, and when we consider the relation of the parties, their manifest motives of self-interest, the manner in which the purpose was carried out and the declarations of the parties, it is reasonable to infer that this purpose was accomplished by concert of action and agreement of appellants.

Appellants complain that the court permitted statements made by appellant, Gilman, to be considered against himself and appellant, Standard Oil Co. jointly, and statements made by the agents of the company to be considered as against Gilman. This was done upon the idea that there were sufficient circumstances and evidence shown and introduced to authorize the jury to find that a conspiracy actually existed between appellants. The conspiracy being once established, or facts having been adduced which justify the inference of a conspiracy, the acts and declarations of each conspirator made pursuant to and in furtherance of the conspiracy, are competent evidence against all.

It matters not, in either case, when one enters into or becomes a party to the conspiracy, how prominent or inconspicuous a part he may take in the execution of the unlawful purpose, or the use of the unlawful means, he is responsible to the fullest extent for all that precedes as well as all that follows in connection with the plot, whether done by himself or by one or more of his associates. The only limitation upon the rule is, that what is said and done must be said and done after the formation of the conspiracy and in furtherance and in pursuance thereof. Of course what may be said or done by any one of the conspirators after the completion of the purpose for which the conspiracy was formed, can be used only against the one saying or doing it. The main contentions of appellants are, that the petition did not state a cause of action and that the proof did not authorize the submission of the case to the jury.

The lower court did not agree with them, and gave to the jury seven instructions which were admirably drawn and met every phase of the issues involved, and if erroneous in any particular, it was because one or two of them may have been more favorable to appellants than they were entitled to. The court, in these instructiouns, did not authorize the jury to find any damages for appellee for any loss sustained, if any, by the breaking of his arrangement or contract with the Wilburine Oil Works Co., and, therefore, appellants have not cause for complaint upon this point.. The appellants also complain that the lower court erred in not a suppressing the depositions of Carrie Shrader and W. C. Chipps, because they were transmitted from the examiner at Louisville, the place where they were taken, to the clerk of the Fayette Circuit Court at Lexington, where the action was pending, by the Adams Express Co.

Soetion 588, of the Civil Code, requires that the officer taking the depositions shall deliver them to the clerk of the court in which the action is pending, or send them by mail or private conveyance. If sent by private conveyance, the person by whom sent must make oath that they were not opened by him or any one else in their transit. In this case the officer taking the depositions made affidavit as to the individual agent of the express company to whom she delivered the depositions, and this agent, with all others of the express company into whose hands the depositions passed, to the time they were delivered to the clerk of the Fayette Circuit Court, made affidavit that the depositions had not been opened by them or any person in transit. The clerk made affidavit that the depositions reached him in a sealed envelope directed to him, as clerk, with an endorsement showing the style of the action and contained depositions. This, in our opinion, met the requirements of the Code and is not in conflict with the opinion in the case of Breeding, &c. v. Stamper, 18 B. M., 175. This opinion construed section 646 of the Civil Code of 1854, which is unlike the present Code. The Code of 1854 did not authorize depositions to be transmitted by private conveyance.

It is shown by the bill of exceptions that after the case was submitted to the jury, they returned to the court room and asked for information, to wit: "If the jury believe that three were in a conspiracy can they find against two of them and leave the other one out." The court, in response to that question, said to the jury, "If the evidence in the case, under the law as is given by the court, shows that three defendants were in a conspiracy, and that the plaintiff, under the law and facts in this case, is entitled to a verdict against all three, the jury should so find. The jury may, however, if they think, that under the law and facts in this case, such verdict is warranted, find a verdict against the different defendants in different amounts, etc."

Appellants say that this last part is not responsive to the question asked by the jury and was prejudicial to them. We do not so understand it. The court stated an undoubted proposition of law, as had already been stated in the fifth instruction, and this oral re-statement of the proposition by the court could not have been prejudicial to the defendant's rights. At least not to such an extent as would authorize a reversal of the case. The objection to and criticism of the argument of appellee's counsel in his closing remarks to the jury, are not well taken. The effects of the remarks objected to amounted only to his opinion of the great desire of the Standard Oil Co. to relieve itself of a competitor in the oil business in the city of Lexington.

Appellants also complain of the amount of inequality of the verdict, and claim that it is an evidence of passion and prejudice on the part of the jury. It was within the province of the jury to determine from the evidence who was most in fault and who would be benefitted most by the formation and success of the conspiracy, and it is reasonable to presume that this accounts for the inequality of the amounts adjudged against appellants.

If it be true, as the jury seems to have determined, that this conspiracy was formed and in pursuance thereof the appellants fraudulently caused appellee's oils to be condemned, and willfully reported the oils to be below the legal test, when they knew or had reason to believe that they were not below the test, and had appellee arrested upon the false charge of selling condemned oil and obstructed, harassed and annoyed appellee's driver when delivering his oil, for the purpose of injuring and driving appellee out of the business of selling oils, we can not say that the verdict is excessive.

Perceiving no error prejudicial to the substantial rights of appellants, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

Whole court sitting.

HALL v. HALL.

(Filed September 28, 1904.)

1. Husband and wife—Mortgage on wife's land—Duress of husband—Surety of wife—Limitation—Appellant, with her husband, executed a note to appellee secured by mortgage on her land. In this suit against her and the administrator of her deceased husband to recover upon the note and enforce the mortgage, her defense was that her signature to the mortgage had been obtained by the duress of her husband, and that she was surety only on the note and was released by the seven years' statute of limitation. Held—Even though she had been induced by the fraud of her husband to sign and deliver the mortgage, yet her subsqeuent admission before the officer taking her acknowledgment, that she had voluntarily executed it for the purpose of giving it validity, and appellee, in ignorance of the truth, and relying upon the officer's certificate of her acknowledgment, parted with the consideration, she is bound.

2. Same—Appellant's plea of duress is not good because it fails to allege that the creditor at the time he accepted the mortgage, knew of her alleged coercion by her husband, and a demurrer to that part of her answer was properly sustained.

3. Certificate of officer—To avoid the certificate of an officer on the ground of fraud practiced by the party benefitted, it must appear that the grantee in the instrument was guilty of the fraud or had knowledge or notice of it before the transaction was completed.

4. Rights of married women—Surety—Pledge—Under section 2127, Kentucky Statutes (Act March 15, 1894), providing that "no part of a married woman's estate shall be subjected to * * * answer for the debt, default or misdoing of another, including her husband, unless such estate shall have been set apart for that purpose by deed or mortgage," married women as to becoming sureties were left precisely as they were before the adoption of the statute, and it is impossible now as it was then for a married woman to become personally bound as surety for any one, but she may bind her specific estate by an appropriate conveyance or pledge. That did not constitute her a surety, nor could she, against such conveyance, be availed of the seven-years' statute of limitation for the benefit of sureties.

5. The demurrer should have been overruled to appellant's plea of coverture so far as it presented that fact as a defense of her personal liability, and a personal judgment should not have been rendered against her.

Clay & Hardin for appellant.

R. L. Greene and A. C. Tharp for appellee.

Appeal from Harlan Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

Appellant, Lucy Hall, with her husband, W. F. Hall, executed a note to appellee, secured by mortgage upon appellant's land. In this suit against appellant and the administrator of her deceased husband, to recover upon the note and to enforce the mortgage, appellant's defense was that her signature to the mortgage had been obtained by the duress of her husband, and that she was a surerty only in the note, and as more than seven years had gone since the note was due, she and her estate were released by the statute of limitation applicable to sureties. (Section 2551, Kentucky Statutes.)

The duress of the husband, by which he procured his wife to mortgage her land to secure his debt, is, if true, as pleaded, a fraud upon her rights, and would vitiate the transaction. The mortgage would be voidable by her at any time, unless she had thereafter ratified it, or have estopped herself from contesting its validity. So far as the pleadings show, the consideration for the note and mortgage was simultaneous with their execution. It is not alleged that appellee knew at that time, or had notice then, that the mortgage as signed and acknowledged by appellant, as shown by the county court clerk's certificate, was not her free and voluntary act. The law is that the clerk was obliged to read and explain the instrument to the feme covert not in the presence of her husband, and if she thereupon acknowledged that she freely and voluntarily signed it, it was his duty to certify to that fact, whereupon the instrument was admissible to record so as to pass her title according to its expressed intent. In this case the clerk's certificate fully imports his compliance with the statutory requirements. The natural and proper effect of which is an assurance in the most solemn and deliberate form of the truthfulnesss of the facts recited in the certificate. Even though appellant had been induced by the fraud of her husband to sign and deliver the mortgage, yet if she subsequently admitted that she had voluntarily executed it, for the purpose of giving it validity, and appellee in ignorance of the truth, but relying upon the officer's certificate of her acknowledgment, parted with the consideration, she is bound.

It is not claimed that the officers' certificate is a mistake. It is admitted on the contrary, that it is true. Its legal effect is to establish, beyond future controversy, the facts required therein to be stated and done. Every person subsequently dealing with that title may rely implicitly on the verity of the certificate of the officer. (Harpendings Ex'or v. Wylie, 14 Bush, 380; Cox v. Gill, 83 Ky., 669.) Latent equities and facts that would impeach the certified act, must yield to the public policy that establishes land titles upon a permanent basis. Section 3760, Kentucky Statutes, is that "no fact officially stated by an officer in respect of a matter about which he is required by law to make a statement in writing, either in the form of a certificate, return or otherwise, shall be called in question, except upon the allegation of fraud in the party benefitted thereby, or a mistake on the part of the officer," unless in a direct proceeding against the officer or his sureties.

In the two cases just cited (Harpending v. Wylie; and Cox v. Gill) it was held that when the officer certified to the feme covert's acknowledgment, it could not be collaterally impeached by her on the ground that her husband had been present (presumably exercising some act of coercion thereby) or that it had been acknowledged in a different county from that stated in the certificate.

In Aultman Taylor Co. v. Frazure, 95 Ky., 429, where it was permitted to impeach the certificate of acknowledgment by showing that it was in the presence of the husband of the feme covert, and by his coercion, it appears that the mortaggee's agent was also present and participating in the efforts to overcome the reluctant wife's refusal to mortgage her property. To avoid the certificate on the ground of fraud practiced by the party benefitted, it must appear that the grantee in the instrument attacked was guilty of the fraud, or had knowledge or notice of it before the transaction was completed. The instrument was solely for his benefit. That another incidentally derived benefit through the transaction and committed fraud in inducing it, cannot alone satisfy the requirement of the statute just quoted. Appellant's plea of duress is not good, because it fails to allege that the creditor, at the time he accepted the mortgage, knew of her alleged coercion by her husband. The demurrer to that part of the answer was, therefore, properly sustained.

Section 2127, Kentucky Statutes, being the act of March 15, 1894, giving to married women the right to control their property, and to contract with reference thereto, contains this limitation: "No part of a married woman's estate shall be subjected to the payment or satisfaction of any liability upon a contract made after marriage, to answer for the debt, default or misdoing of another, including her husband, unless such estate shall have been set apart for that purpose by deed or mortgage or other conveyance."

It has been frequently and uniformly held since the adoption of the above statute, that the only way in which a married woman could bind her estate as security for another was by pledging it. (Postell v. Crumbaugh, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 2193; Deposit Bank v. Stitt, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 671, 107 Ky., 49; Russell v. Rice, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 1613.) The purpose of the statute was to enlarge the rights of married women with respect to their property and their contractual capacity. But as to becoming sureties, they were left precisely as they had been for many years before the adoption of the statute, supra.

In Hobson v. Hobson, 8 Bush, 635, citing a number of earlier cases from this court, it was said that the right of the married woman, under our statutes regulating conveyances, to alienate or convey her general estate, even by deed or mortagge, to secure the prior debts of her husband, is now too well settled to admit of doubt; but it was there denied that her attitude was that of a surety for him in the meaning of the statute. It is impossible now, as it was then, for a married woman to become personallly bound as surety for any one. Nevertheless she may now, as she might then, bind her specific estate by an appropriate conveyance or pledge. That did not constitute her a surety, nor could she, as against such conveyances, be availed of the provisions of the seven-years' statutes of limitation for the benefit of sureties.

The circuit court sustained a demurrer to this paragraph of the answer, and upon final hearing rendered a decree foreclosing the mortgage lien, as well as gave a personal judgment against appellant. The court is of opinion that the demurrer should have been overruled to the plea of coverture in so far as it presented that fact as a defense of appellant's personal liability; nor should the personal judgment against her have been rendered in the present state of the case.

For the reasons, and to the extent indicated, the judgment is reversed and cause remanded for proceedings not inconsistent herewith.

STITH v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed September 28, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Criminal law—Evidence—Upon the trial of appellant upon an indictment charging him with feloniously administering poison to another, it was improper for the Commonwealth's attorney to ask a witness for the prosecution if it was not current talk that Stith, the appellant, had not poisoned his father and mother, and it was error in the trial court to admit this question over defendant's objection, or to fail to exclude the witness' answer on defendant's motion.

N. B. Hays, J. R. Layman, L. Mix and L. A. Faurest for appellant.

H. L. James and J. D. Irwin for appellee.

Appeal from Hardin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

The appellant was tried upon an indictment charging him in substance with wilfully, maliciously and feloniously administering poison to one Malissa Stith, by putting poison in the flour owned and used by her for making bread to eat, and of which she did eat and was poisoned, but from the effects of which she did not die, the name and kind of poison being unknown to the grand jury. Upon the trial he was convicted and given two and one-half years in the State penitentiary.

The evidence upon which he was convicted was circumstantial and not entirely conclusive of his guilt. After the appellant testified in his own behalf, the Commonwealth introduced several witnesses who stated that they knew his moral character and that it was bad. Among these witnesses was one Tom Bush, who was then deputy sheriff of the county. The Commonwealth's attorney asked him this question: "I will ask you if it is not current talk that Luther Stith poisoned his father and mother?" The witness answered, "Yes, sir, I have heard that talked." The appellant objected to the question and also to the answer, and moved the court to exclude the answer of the witness from the jury. The court overruled the motion and the appellant excepted.

This was very prejudicial to the appellant, and it is possible that it may have had great influence in bringing about his conviction. This is not one of the cases where it is permissible for the Commonwealth to prove previous offenses of the like kind for the purpose of showing guilty knowledge or intent, such as the uttering of a forged instrument and the like.

Wherefore, the judgment of the lower court is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

SILER, &c. v. ARCHER'S GD'N.

(Filed September 28, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Infants—Sales of real estate—In an action to sell the real estate of an infant, where there was no averment or proof of the value of the infant's interest, or what would probably be realized therefor, and no sufficient proof showing that such sale would benefit the infant, the judgment of the chancellor directing a sale will not be upheld.

2. Same—In an action to sell the real estate of an infant for the purpose of re-investment, subsection 2, of section 492, Civil Code, and subsection 3, of section 36, must be complied with, and the failure to comply with these provisions are such irregularities as to render such sale without effect.

Tye & Denham and Johnson & Snyder for appellant.

K. D. Perkins for appellee.

Appeal from Whitley Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

On the 16th of April, 1892, John Archer and his wife, Charity Archer, acquired jointly, title to a tract of twenty-eight acres of land in Whitley county, on which there was a dwelling house and other improvements, and which they occupied together until the death of the wife in 1901. Three children survived her, Amanda, Ben and Joie. Ben died in infancy, unmarried. Amanda, after she became twenty-one years of age, conveyed her interest in the property to her father, John Archer. John Archer subsequently conveyed all his right, title and interest in the tract, which included the one-half interest which he held under the joint deed to himself and wife, the interest which he acquired by purchase from his daughter, and also his right as tenant by the courtesy in the interest which belonged to his infant daughter, Joie. After this sale by John Archer, the plaintiff, L. L. Peace, as statutory guardian of Joie Archer, brought this action under sub-section 5, of section 489, of the Civil Code, against his infant ward and the other defendants, in which he asked that the one undivided one-fourth interest in remainder in the entire tract of land belonging to his ward, should be sold for re-investment in other more remunerative property. The petition alleges that the one-fourth interest belonging to the infant in the entire tract of land could not be laid off without impairing its value, and also the value of the residue of the tract, and that he believed a sale of his ward's interest and its re-investment in other property would be for her benefit. A judgment was entered in accordance with the prayer of the petition, decreeing a sale of the one undivided one-fourth interest of the infant in the entire tract of land, and directed that the proceeds be invested in other property more remunerative to her. From this judgment the defendants, Adam and Nancy Siler, have appealed and ask a reversal.

While it is alleged in the petition that the share of the infant defendant in the tract of land, and the reinvestment of the proceeds in other property, would be for the best interest of the infant, no facts are alleged to support this declaration. There is no averment or proof of the value of the infant defendants' interest in the land, or what would probably be realized therefor, and no sufficient proof showing how the sale would be beneficial to the interest of the infant.

It appears, both in allegation and proof, that the interest of the infant could not be separated from the residue of the land without impairing its value and the value of the rest of the tract. It would, therefore, seem necessarily to follow that a sale of this undivided one-fourth interest would result in its sacrifice, as there would be no temptation for any one to bid for the property except the owner of the residue. This is especially true, as her interest is subject to the life estate of her father, and possession thereof indefinitely delayed. Subsection 2, of section 492, requires that the title papers or copies of them, under which the property is held, should be filed with the petition in sales made under section 489 and 491 of the Code. This requirement has not been complied with.

Subsection 3, of section 36, of the Code, provides that no judgment shall be rendered against an infant who is summoned in this State, until the regular guardian, or committee or guardian ad litem of such defendant, shall make defense, or have filed a report stating that after careful examination of the case, he is unable to make defense. In this case no such report or defense in behalf of the infant was made. As the proceeding is in the name of the statutory guardian, the best interest of the infant required the appointment of a guardian ad litem, which is always in the sound discretion of the chancellor. (McMeekin v. Stratton, 82 Ky., 229.)

The irregularities pointed out require the reversal of the judgment appealed from, and the cause is remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

YATES, COUNTY CLERK, &c. v. COLLINS.

(Filed September 28, 1904.)

1. Elections—Voters—Registration—Taxpayers—Authority to sue—Constitutionality of amended act—In order to carry out the provisions of the act of the General Assembly, approved February 11, 1904, entitled "An act to amend an act, entitled 'An act, to regulate elections in this Commonwealth,'" some expense for printing must be incurred by each county of the State, which must be paid out of the county levy, and, therefore, a taxpayer who is a qualified voter has such an interest in the matter, as will entitle him to sue to test the constitutionality of said act.

2. Same—Section 145 of the Constitution provides the qualification of voters and certain disqualifications. Section 147 provides as follows: "That the General Assembly shall provide by law for the registration of all persons entitled to vote in cities and towns having a population of 5,000 or more, and may provide by general law for the registration of other voters in the State. Where registration is required only persons registered shall have the right to vote. The mode of registration shall be prescribed by the General Assembly." That the State Constitution may prescribe what qualifications shall be possessed by those upon whom it proposes to confer the elective franchise, none will deny. And it is equally true that that instrument may empower the legislature to prescribe the mode of its exercise, in which case the authority of the latter body to enact such laws as may be necessary to the proper exercise of the power thus conferred, cannot be questioned.

3. Same—The act, in our opinion, is not open to the criticism that it will tend to disfranchise voters otherwise qualified. The voter is put to no inconvenience in obtaining the registration certificate, it is given to him when he registers, and the provision which allows him, in the event of its loss, to procure another of the county clerk by filing with that officer his affidavit proving such loss, relieves the voter of the disfranchisement that would otherwise necessarily result from its loss. It is to be taken for granted that the loss will rarely occur except through the fault or neglect of the owner, for which reason it were better to put upon the one in fault the duty of paying the clerk for the duplicate certificate, than to compel the unoffending officer to perform the service without compensation.

4. Same—The act is not defective in that it fails to provide penalties for its violation, as it is an amendment to the statute in regard to registration, already in existence, which contains penalties that will apply to violations of the statute as amended. The fact that such penalties will not cover all offenses that may arise under the statute does not make the amendatory act unconstitutional.

5. Same—The failure of the act to provide for the issual of original certificates of registration to persons who may be registered by him during the three days of supplemental registration provided by sections 1498, 1499, Kentucky Statutes, does not affect the validity of the amendment, as such officer may, under the amended statute, issue to the voters admitted to registartion by him, certificates of registration which shall as fully entitle them to vote at the election as if they had been issued by the officers entrusted with the duty of holding the first or regular registration.

6. We are not required to pass upon the policy of its enactment, but as to the constitutionality of the act we have no doubt.

Eli H. Brown, Furber & Jackson and Lewis McQuown for appellants.

Burton W. Vance and D. W. Fairleigh for appellee.

Appeal from Kenton Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

This action was instituted in the Kenton Circuit Court by the appellee, J. D. Collins, against the appellant, John C. B. Yates, clerk of the Kenton County Court, to restrain him by injunction from carrying out the provisions of the act of the General Assembly of Kentucky, approved February 11, 1904, entitled, "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate elections in this Commonwealth', approved June 30, 1892." (Acts 1904, page 31.)

It is conceded that the appellee is a male citizen, resident and taxpayer of Kenton county, Kentucky, that he possesses the qualifications under the Constitution and laws of the State which entitle him to vote at the approaching November election, and no objection is urged against his right to institute this action. Nor do we question his right to do so, for in order to carry out the provisions of the act, supra, some expense for printing must be incurred by each county of the State, through its county clerk, which is required to be paid out of the county levy. If, therefore, the act in question is unconstitutional, this expense should not be placed upon the counties, and a taxpayer like the appellee has such an interest in the matter as will entitle him to sue as he has done to test its constitutionality.

Section 145, of the Constitution, provides that "Every male citizen of the United States of the age of 21 years, who has resided in this State one year, and in the county six months, and the precinct in which he offers to vote, sixty days, next preceding the election, shall be a voter in said precinct and not elsewhere, but the following persons are excepted and shall not have the right to vote: 1. Persons convicted in any court of competent jurisdiction of treason or felony or bribery in an election, or of such high misdemeanor as the General Assembly may declare shall operate as an exclusion from the right of suffrage, but persons hereby excluded may be restored to their civil rights by executive pardon. 2. Persons who, at the time of the election, are in confinement under the judgment of a court for some penal offense. 3. Idiots and insane persons."

Section 147 provides that "The General Assembly shall provide by law for the registration of all persons entitled to vote in cities and towns having a population of 5,000 or more, and may provide by general law for the registration of other voters in the State. Where registration is required, only persons registered shall have the right to vote. The mode of registration shall be prescribed by the General Assembly."

So much of section 147 as provides for registration in cities and towns having a population of 5,000 or more, is clearly mandatory, and in pursuance thereof the General Assembly soon after the adoption of the present constitution by the people of the State, enacted such laws as were found necessary to carry this provision into effect. (Ky. Statutes, sections 1486 to 1506 inclusive.) But no attempt was made by that body to exercise the discretion conferred by the same section of the Constitution to require registration of voters, other than those in cities and towns having a population of 5,000 or more, until the passage of the amendatory act now complained of by appellee. This act requires registartion of all qualified voters, in all the cities and towns of the State, without regard to population. It amends section 1488, of the original statute, by adding to the end of that section the following: "The officers of registration shall issue a certificate of registration to each voter registering at the time he registers, showing that he has registered, and the date of his registry, and no person who is required to register under the provisions of this act shall have the right to vote at any election held in this Commonwealth, until he shall have presented to the election officers his certificate of registration.

"Any person who has registered, and whose certificate of registration has been lost or otherwise destroyed after the registration books containing his registration have been filed with the clerk of the county court, may, upon filing his affidavit before the county court clerk showing that fact, obtain a duplicate certificate of registration, and, upon filing such an affidavit before the county court clerk, it is hereby made the duty of the said clerk to issue said certificate, for which he may charge the applicant a fee of fifty cents; and said certificate shall entitle the person named therein to vote as if issued by the officers of registration, and for the purpose of better enabling the officers of registration to carry out the provisions of this act, it is hereby made the duty of the county court clerk to furnish with the registration book, as in this act required, a sufficient number of printed certificates of registration to meet the requirements of this act, and for which he shall be paid a reasonable compensation out of the county levy of the county."

It is insisted for appellee that the amendatory act is unconstitutional, because of the provision requiring the voter to produce to the election officers when he presents himself to vote, a certificate of registration from the officers of registration, or in the event of its loss a duplicate certificate of registration from the county clerk. And because of the further provision that he shall not be permitted to vote unless he produces such certificate or duplicate certificate, to the election officers. It is being urged that these provisions constitute qualifications of the voter, in addition to those contained in the Constitution, that they impose unreasonable regulations and burdens upon him, and tend to obstruct and destroy the right of suffrage. We agree with counsel that the right of the legislature to enact laws requiring registration existed before the adoption of the present Constitution, though the former Constitutions were silent on that subject. And that in passing upon a registration law enacted while the third constitution was in force, Judge Lewis, in Commonwealth v. McClelland, 85 Ky.. 686, said: "It is only where such laws add to the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution, or impose unreasonable conditions to the exercise of the privilege of voting, that courts will interfere."

An examination of the subjoined authorities, cited and relied upon by counsel for appellee, will show that, though expressed in different language, they do not enlarge the ground for interference upon the part of the courts with legislative action of this character, beyond the rule announced by Judge Lewis in the case, supra. (McCreary on Elections, section 126; Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, 7th edition, section 907; City of Owensboro v. Hickman, &c., 90 Ky. 6-9.)

That the State Constitution may prescribe what qualifications shall be possessed by those upon whom it proposes to confer the elective franchise, none will deny. And it is equally true that that instrument may empower the legislature to prescribe the mode of its exercise; in which case the authority of the latter body to enact such laws as may be necessary to the proper exercise of the power thus conferred, cannot be questioned. "The judicial power of the government may so far regulate and control the legislative department as to set aside and declare void laws enacted by it, where such laws are in conflict with the Constitution. But this is upon the theory, not that the judicial department is superior to the legislative, but that the Constitution is superior to both, and that it is the province of the former to construe both the Constitution and the statutes, and determine whether there is a conflict. If there is, it is the Constitution that controls and limits the legislature, and not the courts." (Works on Courts and Jurisdiction, page 191.)

It was said by Judge Cooley on this subject: "Nor can a court declare a statute unconstitutional and void, solely on the ground of unjust and oppressive provisions, or because it is supposed to violate natural, social or political rights of the citizen, unless it can be shown that such injustice is prohibited, or such rights guaranteed or protected by the Constitution." (Cooley's Const. Lim., 7th Ed., page 232.)

"If the courts are not at liberty to declare statutes void because of their apparent injustice or impolicy, neither can they do so because they appear to the mind of the judges to violate fundamental principles of republican government, unless it shall be found that these principles are placed beyond legislative encroachments by the Constitution." (Cooley's Const. Lim., 7th Ed., page 237.)

"Nor are the courts at liberty to declare an act void because, in their opinion, it is opposed to a spirit supposed to pervade the Constitution, but not expressed in words." (Cooley's Const. Lim., 7th Ed., page 239; Edmunds v. Baubury, 28 La., 272; State, &c. v. Dillon, 32 Fla., 545.)

In Kinneen v. Wells, 144 Mass., 497, it is said: "The qualifications of voters are fixed by State legislation. The requirements as to ownership, citizenship, sex and residence, in connection with the right of voting, vary with the Constitutions, or laws of the several States. However unwise or unjust or even tyrannical its regulations may be, or seem to be in this record, the right of each State to define the qualificatons of its voters is complete and perfect, except so far as it is controlled by the fifteenth article amendments of the Constitution of the United States."

As before remarked, section 147 of the Constitution declares that "The mode of registration shall be prescribed by the General Assembly." The power thus delegated is comprehensive. By it the General Assembly is not only authorized to fix the plan or method of registration, but also to provide every detail thereof Of the many registration laws of the States it will, we doubt not, be found that hardly any two of them are alike. In some of the States the voter in registering is required to make oath as to his name, age, residence, etc. In others it is necessary to enter in the registration book a description of his person, in addition to his name, age and place of residence.

We are told by counsel that in one State the voter is required to sign the registration book, and also the election book, so that his identity may be established by a comparison of signatures. In several of the States the law, as in this State, requires the registration officers to issue a certificate to the voter when he registers, and this certificate he must preserve and present to the election officers on election day as a prerequisite to voting. "Registration," as applied to elections, is defined by the Century Dictionary, as follows: "In the United States it is a system for the preventing of frauds in the exercise of suffrage by requiring voters to cause their names to be registered in books provided for the purpose, in each election district, with appropriate particulars of residence, age, etc., to enable investigation to be made and the right of the voter to cast the ballot, to be challenged, if there be occasion. In Great Britain and Ireland, the word registration, as used with reference to elections, means the making up of a list of voters, which, after judicial revision, is the accredited record of the electors entitled to vote." The word "registration," as the dictionary will show, has other meanings than that given above. But accepting the definition here given, it does not follow that the issuing of a certificate by the registration officers to the voter when he registers, is not a part of the plan of registration, for the certificate is intended to furnish the voter, as well as the election officers, with evidence in addition to that furnished by the registration book, that he is a registered voter, and, therefore, entitled to vote.

The principle thing intended is that the certificate shall furnish better means of identifying the voter. His possession of the certificate, though conclusive as to the fact that the person named therein has been registered, will not be conclusive of his right to vote, for, if unknown to the election officers, they may require other proof of his identity. In other words, as argued by counsel, the registration certificate does not mean "vote bearer" unless "bearer" be known to the election officers to be the person named therein. It is equally true that the exercise of due care upon the part of the election officers in requiring identification of holders of registration certificates who are unknown to them, would practically exclude from voting those who, through their loss by the owners, or other improper means, might get possession of them. The act is not, in our opinion, open to the criticism that it will tend to disfranchise voters otherwise qualified. The voter is put to no inconvenience in obtaining the registration certificate, it is given him when he registers, and the provision which allows him, in the event of its loss, to procure another of the county clerk by filing with that officer his affidavit proving, such loss, relieves the voter of the disfranchisement that would otherwise necessarily result from its loss.

There will doubtless be bribing of voters under the registration statute, as amended by the act in question, as there was under the former law, for while corrupt voters may, under the present law, be induced to sell their certificates of registration and thereby deprive themselves of the right to vote, under the former law the same result was reached by hiring them not to register, or to remain away from the election after registering, by which they were also prevented from voting. It is to be deplored that such evils should be associated with the elective franchise, but we must look to the Genearl Assembly for relief against them in the form of more stringent laws for their suppression. It is also argued that the act imposes a burden upon the voter not contemplated by the Constitution, in that it compels him, in case of the loss of his certificate of registration, to incur expense to the amount of fifty cents in order to procure another of the county clerk. It is to be taken for ganted that the loss of registration certificates will rarely occur, except through the fault or neglect of the owners, for which reason it were better to put upon the party in fault the duty of paying the clerk the nominal fee for the duplicate certi ficate, than to compel that unoffending officer to perform the services required of him, without compensation.

Under the law the officers of registration or those of the election may, if unacquainted with a person desiring to register or vote, require proof of his identity, and would, doubtless, be authorized, at the instance of such person, to issue subpœnas for witnesses to be summoned to prove his identity, if so, or such person should find it necessary to hire a vehicle to convey to the place of registration, or the voting booth witnesses to prove his identity, would it be contended that he would not be legally liable for the expense of summoning or conveying his witnesses to the place of giving their testimony, and, if under these circumstances the voter would be responsible for the expense incurred in proving his identity, would it be any greater hardship to require him to pay the clerk's fee for the certificate allowed to be issued by that officer?

It is further urged in criticism of the act, that it is defective because it allows the county clerk to issue registration certificates in lieu of those lost by voters, without other proof of such loss than their mere affidavits, and does not, in express terms, provide for the preservation of such affidavits. The first of these objections overlooks the fact that the registration books are on file in the county clerk's office from the time they are completed and returned by the registration officers. And when an application is made to the county clerk for a certificate in lieu of one claimed to be lost, an examination of the registration books by the clerk would show whether or not the name of the applicant appeared therein, and if not, it would clearly be the duty of the clerk to refuse him the certificate notwithstanding his affidavit therefor. The second objection seems to be equally untenable. The requirement of the act is that affidavits showing the loss of registration certificates by the voters, must be filed with the clerk. When filed they become records in his office, and are to be preserved as such like other records that are required to be filed.

It is further urged that the act is defective in that it fails to provide penalties for violations on its provisions. It must be borne in mind that the act in question is intended to amend a statute in regard to registration, already in existence, which statute contains penalties that will apply to violations of the statute as amended. The fact that such penalties will not cover all offenses that may arise under the statute as amended, does not make the amendatory act unconstitutional. The remedy lies in the enactment by the legislature of a further amendment providing such additional penalties as may be needful.

Our attention has been called to the fact that the act fails to provide for the issual by the county clerk of original certificates of registration to persons who may be registered by him during the three days of supplemental registration provided for, by sections 1498-1499, Kentucky Statutes. This omission does not, in our opinion, affect the validity of the amendment. As the county clerk is the only officer authorized to register voters entitled to avail themselves of that right during the period fixed for supplemental registration, it will require no tortured construction of the statute, as amended, to say that he may issue to the voters admitted to registration by him, certificates of registration which shall as fully entitle them to vote at the election, as if they had been isued by the officers entrusted with the duty of holding the first or regular registration. We are not required to pass upon the policy of its enactment, but as to the constitutionality of the act we have no doubt.

Wherefore, the judgment of the lower court is reversed and cause remanded with directions to that court to sustain the demurrer to the petition, and for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Whole court sitting.

McKINNEY v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed September 28, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Homicide—Verdict—Flagrantly against evidence—Question for jury—The determination of the guilt of one accused of crime is a question solely for the jury, where there is any evidence authorizing the submission of the case to them, and this court cannot reverse the case because the verdict is flagrantly against the weight of the evidence.

2. Self-defense—Instructions—On a trial of one charged with murder and convicted of manslaughter, where the deceased was drunk, armed with a pistol and was approaching the house of accused where he and his wife and the children were in an insecure house, and who shot and killed deceased, an instruction that "one may lawfully defend his home from the wilful assault of another, and in so doing may use such force as appears to him, in the exercise of a reasonable judgment, to be necessary to repel such assault or to avert any danger to himself, his home or his family, real or to him apparent; but in so doing he may not lawfully use any more force than appears to him, in the exercise of a reasonable judgment, to be necessary in order, to avert that danger to himself or family, real or apparent," is erroneous.

3. Wilful assault—Necessary force—Belief as to danger—The word wilful should have been omitted from the said instruction. As a matter of fact, one's right of self-defense may exist perfectly without reference to his belief as to his danger. If it is in fact necessary, and if the jury, from the evidence, should be authorized to find that it was in fact necessary for the defendant to have used the force that he did in repelling the assault upon himself or inmates of his house, he had the right to use that force, whether or not he believed at the time that it was necessary; or if, as a matter of fact, it was not necessary to use the force that he did, but if by the exercise of a reasonable judgment it appeared to him to be necessary, he had the right to use the force that he did.

4. Impeaching witness—Effect on jury—Sallie McKinney, a twelve-year-old child of accused, testified that deceased had his pistol presented at appellant when he came to the door, an instant before he was shot. She was asked if she had not told Mrs. Turner that deceased had laid down his pistol out upon a raft of logs, and that after he was killed, her mother went out and got it and took it to her father. She denied having made the statement. Mrs. Turner proved that she made said statement, whereupon the court gave to the jury this admonition, viz: "I desire to give you the same caution that I gave you in regard to the other witness who testified on the same point, Lloyd Lewis, that is to say to you that, in so far as it may contradict the witness, Sallie McKinney, and only as affecting her testimony and not as substantial testimony against the defendant, and not to affect the defendant's case in no further except to impeach Sallie McKinney." Literally this charge had the effect of telling the jury that Mrs. Turner's evidence did impeach the witness, Sallie McKinney, removing from the jury the right to weigh the evidence and determine whether or not it had that effect.

T. G. Lewis, Cleon K. Calvert, J. G. Forrester and S. H. Kash for appellant.

N. B. Hays and Loraine Mix for appellee.

Appeal from Leslie Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

Appellant was convicted and sentenced to twenty-one years' imprisonment.

in the penitentiary for the degree of manslaughter under an indictment charging him with the murder of William Griffey. One Henry Maggard, who, with his wife had been stopping at appellant's home for about two weeks, was ejected by appellant from his house because of a broil between Maggard and his wife, in which Maggard was guilty of violent conduct towards his wife in the presence of appellant's family, as well as destroying the property of applelant, his bedding, etc. Maggard went to the home of John Minniard, about a mile and one-half distant, and attempted to borrow a gun for the purpose of returning to appellant's home and renewing the trouble, or taking vengeance upon appellant. Failing in this, upon the following day, which was Sunday, he got in company with the deceased, William Griffey. The two became drunk, and went together, late in the afternoon to appellant's home. Deceased had a pistol. They indulged in loud cursing and other boisterous demonstration, including the firing of the weapon along the road, and within a short distance of appellants' home, which was isolated from neighbors. There was evidence that Maggard and Griffey made certain threats against appellant about the time they started for his house. Arriving within a few yards of the house they stopped at a pile of logs and, according to the statement of Maggard, requested that appellant send his things out to him. Appellants' version is, that, continuing the threats and boisterous conduct, they began shooting at his house. Bullet holes were found in the house. The building was a small one, built of plank boxing, through which the bullets could have entered, and according to some evidence did enter. Aside from appellant and his wife there were five small children, the oldest about twelve years, in the house. Deceased advanced upon the house, according to the testimony of appellant, with his pistol in one hand and a bottle of whisky in the other, continuing to threaten appellant and pointing his pistol at him as if to shoot. Appellant got his double-barrelled shotgun, loaded with small squirrel shot, whereupon the deceased turned to run behind a nearby stump, when appellant fired a charge into his back, instantly killing him.

The testimony of Maggard, the only eye-witness to the occurrence other than appellant and his family is, that appellant invited deceased to lay down his pistol, promising that he would set aside his gun, and invited him to his house; that appellant complied, when within a few feet of the door appellant grabbed his gun and shot deceased. Besides the hostile feelings evinced by the witness, Maggard, he is thoroughly impeached as to his character. His mission was evidently one of violence. The deceased was shown by a great number of witnesses, without any contradiction, to have been a notoriously violent and dangerous man, who habitually went armed, and was evidently a terror in any community in which he lived. His presence on this occasion was procured by Maggard for no proper purpose, so far as the record before us discloses. The jury have returned a verdict of guilty, as stated.

We are asked to reverse the judgment upon the verdict because it is flagrantly against the weight of the evidence. This, however, is not within the province or according to the practice of this court. The determination of the guilt of one accused of crime is a question solely for the jury, where there is any evidence authorizing the submission of the case to them. The court properly defined in its instructions to the jury, murder, manslaughter and self-defense, and gave, in addition, the following instruction: "One may lawfully defend his home from the wilful assault of another, and in so doing may use such force as appears to him, in the exercise of a reasonable judgment, to be necessary to repel such assault, or to avert any danger to himself, his home or his family, real or to him apparent, even to the taking of human life; but in so doing, he may not lawfully use any more force than appears to him, in the exercise of a reasonable judgment, to be necessary, in order to avert that danger to himself or his family, real or to the defendant apparent."

This instruction is open to at least two criticisms, which, in view of the facts developed upon the trial, we are of opinion were highly prejudicial to the substantial rights of the accused. It being in evidence that deceased was drunk, it may have been a question in the minds of the jury whether his assault was wilful in the popular signification of the term. It was not incumbent upon one so assaulted to ascertain whether the assault was wilful or not, before he could lawfully exercise his right of self-defense, or of protecting his family. The fact that the assault was violent, or reasonably appeared to put him, or some member of his family in danger of losing his life, or of great bodily harm, raised his right to defend himself or those of his home from the real or apparent danger. The word wilful should have been omitted in the clause quoted.

But there is a more substantial error than that in the instruction. It will be noted that the jury are told that the defendant's right of self-defense, or the defense of his home depended upon his, the defendants' belief, in the exercise of a reasonable judgment, whether it was necessary for him to use the force that he did. As a matter of fact one's right of self-defense may exist perfectly without reference to his belief as to his danger. If it is, in fact, necessary, and if the jury from the evidence should be authorized to find that it was, in fact, necessary for the defendant to have used the force that he did use in repelling the assault upon himself or inmates of his home, he had the right to use that force, whether or not he believed at the time that it was necessary. In addition to that, if, as a matter of fact, it was not necessary for him to use the force that he did, but if in the exercise of a reasonable judgment it appeared to him to be necessary, he still had the right to use the force that he did. The importance of this distinction will be better appreciated when it is stated that the accused, upon the hearing for bail at a former day, which was proven against him on this trial, had testified that when he shot and killed the deceased it was not because of what he was doing, but because of what he had done. From which it might have been and, doubtless, was argued to the jury, that it did not appear to him, defendant, at the time, that he or any member of his family was in danger.

Appellant being violently attacked and shot at in his home, was not bound to retreat, or to seek other place of safety, nor to wait till his assailant had got behind an object of protection to better prosecute his assault. In such case, the party attacked had the right to use such force, even to the taking of the life of his assailant, as was necessary, or as to him in the exercise of a reasonable judgment seemed necessary to avert the danger to himself or family.

Sallie McKinney, the twelve-year-old daughter of appellant, was a witness in his behalf. She had testified to the fact that deceased had his pistol presented at appellant when he came to the door, an instant before the fatal shot was fired. For the purpose of impeaching her the prosecution asked whether she had not, on the morning after the shooting, told Mrs. Polly Turner, that Griffey had laid the pistol down out about a raft of logs, and that after he was killed her mother went out and got the pistol, and took it to her father. The child denied having made the statement. Mrs. Turner, the mother-in-law of Henry Maggard, was then called to prove that the child had made that statement to her, and did prove it. Whereupon the court gave to the jury this admonition: "Gentlemen of the jury—I desire to give you the same caution that I give you in regard to the other witness who testified on the same point, Lloyd Lewis, that is to say you will take and receive this evidence, in so far as it may contradict the witness, Sallie McKinney, and only as affecting her testimony, and not as substantial testimony against the defendant, and not to affect the defendant's case in no further except to impeach the witness, Sallie McKinney."

It is likely the stenographic report of the judge's admonition is not accurate, but for the puprose of this trial we cannot safely proceed otherwise than in assuming that it was given as reported. Literally it had the effect of telling the jury that Mrs. Turner's evidence did impeach the witness, Sallie McKinney, removing from the jury the right to weigh the evidence and determine whether or not it had that effect.

For the reasons indicated the court is of opinion that the judgment below should be reversed, and the cause is remanded for proceedings not inconsistent herewith.

MONTGOMERY COUNTY v. BEAN, &c.

(Filed September 28, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Turnpikes—Use of land by—In an action by the devisees of James Bean to recover a lot from Montgomery county which had been used as a toll house by a turnpike company before the ownership and control of the road had passed to the county, a judgment in favor of the heirs and devisees was proper, where it appeared that, by the terms of the agreement between James Bean and the company, the property should revert to him and his heirs when the company ceased to use it.

2. Where it was not shown that entries offered in evidence were in books of original entry, kept in the course of business, and those who made the entries were dead, such books and entries were not competent evidence, and were properly rejected by the trial court.

Turner & Hazelrigg for appellant.

B. F. Day and J. Coleman Reid for appellees.

Appeal from Montgomery Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

Appellee's testator, James Bean, owned a farm of 410 acres near Mt. Sterling, abutting upon the Mt. Sterling and Winchester turnpike road. About 1858 the road was built by the turnpike company. It obtained from James Bean the right to occupy and use a lot of one-half acre of that farm, for tollhouse purposes. There is no deed or other written evidence of the terms of the agreement between Bean and the turnpike company. There is but one witness testifying in the record who professes to have been present when the agreement between the parties was made. She testified that the agreement was between Newton Congleton, her uncle, and then president of the turnpike company, and James Bean, made at her uncle's home, and that she was present. That they agreed that the turnpike company was to have the use of the half acre in question for the purpose named, so long as its use was continued for this purpose, ceasing which it was to revert to Bean and his heirs; that Bean was to have the right of free travel for himself and family, and those occupying his farm, for the use of the lot.

In 1897 the turnpike company, under the provisions of the statute known as the Free Turnpike Act, sold its road and franchises to Montgomery county. In the deed conveying them it included the half-acre lot in question, but expressly stated that it only quit-claimed the title to the lot. The county has since used the lot and the building on it, not in direct connection with the maintainance or operation of that road, but by renting it out and appropriating the rent for turnpike purposes.

This suit was brought by the devisees of James Bean to recover the lot in question from the county under the allegation of ownership and grant of the easement above mentioned, coupled with the further allegation that the turnpike company and its grantee, the county, had abandoned the use of the toll-house lot for the purpposes to which it was originally dedicated by the former owner, James Bean. Aside from the customary use continued since 1858, to the date of sale by the turnpike company, there is no evidence of the company's having or claiming or exercising any other right than that conferred by the agreement above related. Such possession and use, not otherwise explained, is not inconsistent with the terms of the easement, and was not in any sense adverse to the title of the holder of the fee. The county offered evidence which it claims tends to support its plea that there was an absolute sale of the lot to the turnpike company, which was of this character: The record book kept by the company, which included the accounts kept by its secretary and treasurer, showed entries, about 1858 or 1859, where $60 was paid by the treasurer of the turnpike company to James Bean "for toll-house lot." It was not shown, nor offered to be proved, that these entries were made upon books of original entry, kept in the usual course of the company's business. Those who made the entries were dead when the suit was brought. The books were not evidence in the company's behalf on this point, and were properly rejected by the trial court.

Appellant next contends that in equity appellee should be required to restore to the county, as vendee of the turnpike company, at least the amount that the improvements put upon the lot enhanced its value. In the absence of an agreement between the contracting parties to that effect, this will not be allowed. If the house had been removed before the reverter occurred, the fee simple holder would have had no cause to complain, but upon a reverter all the property belonging to the realty goes to him who holds the title. One witness, introduced by appellees, testified that James Bean, on one occasion, told him that the effect of the agreement by which the turnpike company was occupying his lot, was that in case of its abandonment, the lot would belong to him and the house to the company. While this is in the nature of an admission against interest, and is relevant as evidence tending to show what was the real contract bewteen the parties, when considered in the light of the testimony of Mrs. Scobee, which established the original agreement, it appears to have been more in the nature of an expression of opinion by Mr. Bean, than a recital of the facts of the agreement.

The judgment of the circuit court is in accord with this opinion, and with the following decisions of this court construing similar easements and reversions, and is, therefore, affirmed (Cynthiana & Raven Creek T. P. Co. v. Hutchison, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 1232; Mitchell v. Bourbon Co., 25 Ky. Law Rep., 512; Halley v. Scott Fiscal Court, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 1471; Harrison v. Lexington & Frankfort R. R. Co., 9 B. Mon., 470.)

WATER SUPPLY CO., &c. v. CITY OF GEORGETOWN.

(Filed September 29, 1904.)

Victor F. Bradley and Montgomery & Lee for appellants.

J. B. Finnell for appellee.

Appeal from Scott Circuit Court.

Judge Barker delivered the following response to petition for rehearing:

The court did not decide that appellant might run its pipe over property of the water company under the permit from the city. That question was not presented by the record. The only question decided is as to appellant's right to take water from the spring or the spring branch. How it may acquire the right to lay its pipe on property not owned by it, in order to reach the spring or the branch, or what rights it has as to such property to lay a pipe on it for this purpose, are questions not presented or determined. Only the rights of the parties in the spring and the water flowing from it, are determined.

Petition overruled.

MASON, GOOCH & HOGE CO. v. MECHANICS' LIEN & TRUST CO &c.

(Filed September 29, 1904.)

Injunction—Dissolution—Damages—Failure to assess—Subsequent action—Under Civil Code, section 295, providing that "Upon the dissolution, in whole or in part, of an injunction to stay proceedings upon a judgment, the damages shall be assessed by the court, which may hear the evidence and decide in a summary way, or may in its discretion cause a jury to be impaneled to find the damages, etc.," where an action was brought in the Franklin Circuit Court by the appellants against the German National Bank and others, and an injunction obtained enjoining the sheriff from selling certain engines and cars, on the ground that appellants had a prior lien thereon by virtue of certain warehouse receipts, and which injunction was dissolved by said Franklin Circuit Court, but no order was entered assessing damages on the injunction, Held—That the damages not having been assessed in the action in which the injunction was dissolved, no recovery can be had in an action subsqeuently brought in the Kenton Circuit Court upon the injunction bond therefor.

T. L. Edelen for appellants.

W. H. Mackoy for appellees.

Appeal from Kenton Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

The Home Construction Co. being indebted to the Mason, Gooch & Hoge Co. in a large amount, undertook to pledge to it certain locomotives and cars owned by the construction company, as security for the debt, and as evidence of the pledge, issued to it a paper called a warehouse receipt. The Mason, Gooch & Hoge Co borrowed from the German National Bank of Covington, Ky., something like $15,000, and to secure the loan, placed with it as collateral the warehouse receipt which it had received from the constructon company. The Mechanics' Trust Co. had a large debt against the Home Construction Co., upon which it obtained a personal judgment against it. Execution was issued on the judgment and levied on the locomotives and cars above referred to. After this levy was made, the Mason, Gooch & Hoge Co , the German National Bank, W. F. Dandridge, who was named as trustee in the warehouse receipt, H. P. Mason and Charles E. Hoge, who were sureties in the debt to the bank, instituted an injunction suit in the Franklin Circuit Court, enjoining the sheriff from selling the engines and cars under the execution, on the ground that they had a prior lien on the property by virtue of the warehouse receipt. The circuit court sustained the plaintiffs, but upon appeal to this court it was held that the warehouse receipt created no lien on the property, and the judgment was reversed with directions to the circuit court to dismiss the plaintiff's petition. (Mechanics' Trust Co. v. Dandridge, &c., 18 Ky. Law Rep., 625.) On the return of the case to the circuit court the petition was dismissed and the injunction dissolved, but no order was entered assessing damages on the injunction. Thereafter this suit was brought in the Kention Circuit Court against the plaintiffs in that action and their sureties on the injunction bond. Among other things, the defendants pleaded that there had been no assessment of damages in the action in which the injunction was obtained, and relied on this, in bar of the action, insisting that a finding of damages by the court which dissolves the injunction, is a condition precedent to the right of action on the bond.

Section 295, of the Civil Code, reads as follows "Upon the dissolution, in whole or in part, of an injunction to stay proceedings upon a judgment, the damages shall be assessed by the court which may hear the evidence and decide in a summary way, or may, at its discretion, cause a jury to be impaneled to find the damages. If the collection, payment or use of money be enjoined, the damages may be any rate per cent. on the sum released by the dissolution, which, in the discretion of the court, may be proper, not exceeding 10 per cent. And, if the delivery of property have been delayed by the injunction, the value of the use, hire or rent thereof shall be assessed; judgment shall be assessed; judgment shall be rendered against the party who obtained the injunction for the damages assessed, and the assessment shall be conclusive against the surety of such party."

This provision of the Code is taken verbatim from section 325 of the former Code, and has more than once been construed by this court. In Crawford v. Woodworth, 72 Ky., 745, Crawford had obtained a judgment to sell a tract of land and some oxen, and thereafter Woodworth asserting a claim to the oxen filed his petition enjoining Crawford from selling them as directed in the judgment. The injunction was dissolved, but the damages were not assessed. Then Crawford filed a suit to recover damages upon the bond. The court held that the petition stated no cause of action, as it did not show that the damages had been assessed by the court in dissolving the injunction. After setting out the provisions of section 325 of the Code then in force, which as we have said were verbatim the same as section 295 now in force, the court said: "This mode of proceeding is not merely cumulative, but is the only remedy afforded a party for recovering special damages upon the dissolution of an injunction, and, as conclusive of this question, the language of the section is not only that the court shall assess damages, but this assessment is made conclusive against all the obligors in the bond, including the surety."

This case was followed in Logsdon v. Willis, 77 Ky., 183, and was again followed in Mallory v. Dauber's Ex'or, 83 Ky., 241, where Mallory had enjoined the selling of certain land under execution, on the ground that it was his property. His injunction was modified by the circuit court without the assessment of damages. He appealed and Dauber prosecuted a cross appeal, complaining that the injunction had not been dissolved, and that there had been no assessment of damages by the court in dissolving the injunction. The court, however, affirmed the judgment on the original and cross appeals, holding that only nominal damages should be given, and that it would not reverse the judgment in order that nominal damages might be assessed.

The court said: "If, therefore, the appellant had an equityas against the appellee, although the injunction was improperly granted, the court had the power to give mere nominal damages on its dissolution, but having failed to dissolve the injunction, this court will not reverse on the cross appeal for that error alone, in order that the court below may determine the damages the appellee is entitled to recover."

The question was again presented to the court in Hayden v. Phillips, 89 Ky., 1, where Hayden had enjoined a writ of possession in the sheriffs' hands for execution. The injunction was dissolved, but upon the dissolution the court did not assess damages for the wrongful suing out of the injunction, and in this condition of things Phillips filed suit against Hayden on the injunction bond and recovered judgment in the circuit court. On appeal to this court the judgment in his favor was reversed and the cause remanded to the circuit court with directions to sustain the demurrer to the petition. After referring to the previous cases the court said: "It may now be regarded as settled that the remedy given by section 295, of the Code for the assessment of special damages upon the dissolution of an injunction, enjoining proceedings on a judgment, is exclusive of all other remedies."

We cannot now depart from a rule of construction of the statute so authoritatively settled. Section 285 of the Code provides that an injunction to stay proceedings on a judgment shall not be granted in an action brought in any other court than that in which the judgment was rendered. The words of this section "To stay proceedings on a judgment" are in effect the same as in section 295, and under it, it has been often held that a sale of property under execution cannot be enjoined except in the court which rendered the judgment on which the execution issued." (C. & O. R. R. Co. v. Reason, 84 Ky., 368; Mallory v. Dauber's Ex'or, 88 Ky., 241; McConnell v. Rowe, 8 Ky. Law Rep., 348; Stahl v. Brown, 84 Ky., 335.)

It is perfectly clear from the previous decisions of this court that it has proceeded upon the idea that the words "To stay proceedings upon a judgment" in section 295 mean the same thing as the like words in section 285, and include an injunction to stay proceedings on an execution issued on a judgment no less than to stay the judgment itself in other respects. An execution which is issued on a judgment is a proceeding to enforce it, and the court has evidently treated these sections as embracing all injunctions to stay proceedings on a judgment. We, therefore, conclude that the damages not having been assessed in the action in which the injunction was dissolved, no recovery can be had in this action on the injunction bond therefor.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

Whole court sitting.

BEASLEY v. ADAMS.

(Filed September 29, 1904.)

1. Primary election—Contest—Appeal—In a contest before the governing authority of a political party in the holding of a primary election for the nomination of a candidate for county school superintendent, the decision of the governing authority of such party, awarding the certificate of nomination is final, and no appeal from its decision lies to the circuit or to any court.

2. Rules of committee—The fact that the committee or governing authority may have, in one of its rules governing such contest, provided for such an appeal, will not authorize the appeal, as the committee, under the statute, could regulate the proceedings of the contest before themselves, but could not confer jurisdiction on the circuit court.

Wm. Carnes and Harrison Beasley for appellant.

Clore, Dickson & Clayton and Robt. L. Greene for appellee.

Appeal from Grant Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

The appellant, Annie R. Beasley, and the appellee, Claude Q. Adams, were rival candidates for the nomination of the Democratic party for the office of school superintendent for Grant county, Kentucky, at a primary election held on the second day of April, 1904. After the election, the returns were canvassed by the Democratic executive committee, the governing authority of the party in the county, who awarded the certificate of nomination to appellee.

On the 30th day of April, 1904, appellant being dissatisfied with the action of the committee as a canvassing board, filed with them grounds of contest in writing, in which she set forth various reasons why the certificate of nomination should be awarded her instead of appellee. On May 9th, 1904, amended grounds for contest were filed, and, on the same day, the committee met, and all having been duly sworn to faithfully discharge their duty as members of the contest board, it was then moved and carried that rules governing the proceedings of contest be adopted, and it was resolved as follows:

"Rule No. 1. The committee shall first proceed to hear and determine at this meeting, any objection of the contestee, C. C. Adams, to the sufficiency of the notice of contest, and to dismiss said contest if said notice and grounds are insufficient; and resolved:

"Rule No. 2. That in the event the said committee should hold that the notice of contest states sufficient grounds of contest to authorize the investigation of facts and the hearing of proof, that the contestee shall have ten days time, after this date, to file an answer to counter contest, and the contestant shall have ten days after notice of the filing of same has beenserved upon her in which to reply, and thereupon the committee shall proceed to direct how, and in what manner, the testimony may be produced before said committee; and this meeting will, in that event, be adjourned to meet on the call of the chairman to provide said rules for the production of the testimony, and it shall be the duty of said chairman to forthwith call a meeting at some date, not later than ten days after the filing of said reply, for the purpose of promulgating the rules governing the production of evidence and the further hearing of the contest.

"Rule No. 3. In the event the committee shall hold that the notice of contest is insufficient, and does not state grounds to authorize an investigation of the facts or the hearing of proof, then the contest shall be dismissed, and the committee finally adjourned from the consideration of the said contest."

The parties to the contest were treated as litigants in court, the appellant being plaintiff, and her grounds of contest, her petition; the appellee, who was defendant, filed a general demurrer to the petition as amended, and this, after being duly considered, was sustained, and the petition dismissed, whereupon appellant prayed an appeal to the Grant Circuit Court, which was allowed her by the committee, under amended rules governing the contest, which were adopted on her motion, and which are as follows:

"Rule No. 1. It is ordered that should the contestant or contestee offer any amendments, they should be considered as to the sufficiency or insufficiency of them in this contest.

"Rule No. 2. It is ordered that in the final hearing of this contest, the party defeated may have an appeal to the Grant Circuit Court, if they so desire."

At the June term of the Grant Circuit Court, a motion was made to dismiss appellant's appeal, which was afterwards sustained, for want of jurisdiction, from which judgment this appeal is prosecuted. The question for adjudication on this submission is whether or not an appeal lies from the decision of the committee to the circuit court. Section 1551, Kentucky Statutes, is as follows: "All primary elections held in this Commonwealth by the various political parties shall be held and conducted in the same form and manner, and under the same requirements as or shall be provided by law for the holding of regular State elections, except in such particulars as herein excepted."

Section 1563: "The duly-authorized and contstituted committee or governing authority in the couunty or district in which a primary election may be held hereunder, is hereby empowered to count the votes received by all candidates in such primary elections, and to declare the candidate or candidates, in cases where candidates for more than one office are to be nominated, receiving the highest number of votes the nominee of such political party for the office for which he was voted for at such primary election. In all cases of a tie vote or contest, the committee or governing authority of the political party holding such primary election, shall have the power to hear and determine such contest, and decide who shall be entitled to the nomination. The proceedings in such cases shall be in such form and manner as the committee or governing authority shall determine upon. Before entering upon the discharge of the duties set forth in this article, the committee or governing authority shall be sworn by some officer authorized by law to administer an oath, to faithfully and honestly discharge the duties herein imposed, and the failure upon the part of any member of the committee or governing authority to discharge such duties faithfully and honestly, shall be deemed a misdemeanor, and the persons so offending shall, upon indictment and conviction in the circuit court of the county or district, be fined not less than $100 nor more than $500, and be imprisoned in the jail not less than sixty days nor more than one year."

Appellant insists that, under the language of section 1551, she is entitled to an appeal from the decision of the committee to the circuit court, for the reason that the law regulating the holding of elections authorizes an appeal from the decision of the board of contest to the circuit court, in contests for State and county offices. This position would, undoubtedly, be sound, were it not for the language in section 1568, which limits the right of contest in primary elections to a trial before the governing authority under whose auspices the election is held, and which is as follows: "In all cases of a tie vote or contest, the committee or governing authority of the political party holding such primary election, shall have the power to hear and determine such contest and decide who shall be entitled to the nomination. The proceedings in such cases shall be in such form and manner as the committee or governing authority shall determine upon." This makes the decision of the contest committee final. The language, that the committee shall have the power to hear and determine such contests, and decide who shall be entitled to the nomination, precludes the idea that there shall be an appeal; the entire matter is referred to the governing authority of the party for its decision, and this is eminently proper, as the question is purely political. This construction is consonant with sound reason, and any other would violate the elementary canon of statutory construction, that the law should not be so interpreted as to make it vain or illusory. Primary elections are held for the purpose of nominating party candidates for the regular State election thereafter to be held for the selection by the whole people of their official servants. The right of political parties to so select their nominees has been deemed sufficiently important to safeguard the official machinery by which the elections are held, with the protection of the law, but if, where there are contests over the nominations, the defeated candidates may appeal to the courts, it would necessarily follow, that the State election would be held before the contests could be settled, and the political party whose nominees were thus involved in litigation would have no place on the ticket for the offices in question, and the statute rendered abortive. If subsection 12, of section 1596a, Ky. Statutes, authorizes an appeal from the decision of the board of contest to the circuit court in a primary election, then it also authorizes an appeal from the judgment of the circuit court to the Court of Appeals, and this being true, it is not believed that it would ever be possible to finally settle by adjudication a contest for a party nomination in time for the regular election. The conclusion we have reached is in line with all the utterances of this court on the subject. In Cain v. Page, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 977, the question was whether or not the committee, of which one O'Neal was chairman, was the governing authority; it was necessary to decide this question, and the court did decide, that this committee, having been recognized by the State Central Committee as such, was the governing authority, and its decision in the matter of the contest was upheld. (Moody v. Trimble, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 692; Davis v. Hambrick, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 815.)

The case of Henry v. Secrest, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1505, in nowise militates against this view. In that case, it was sought by mandatory injunction to force the committee to act upon a contest alleged to be pending before them, and of which they refused to take cognizance. This court held that there was no contest pending, and reversed the judgment awarding the mandatory injunction.

There is no substantial ground for the inference drawn by counsel for appellant, that, because this court took jurisdiction in Cain v. Page and Henry v. Secrest, it has jurisdiction of the case at bar. Neither of those cases involved an appeal from the decision of the governing authority of a political party. In Cain v. Page as said before, the question was, whether the committee, which heard the contest, was or not, the governing authority. That question alone, was settled by this court, and then it was held that the committee's action could not be reviewed. In Henry v. Secrest the court took jurisdiction not for the purpose of reviewing the decision of the governing authority, but upon proper showing, of requiring them to decide between the parties in the matter of contest. In the case at bar, the governing authority of the party has acted upon the sufficiency of appellant's grounds of contest, and rendered a decision adverse to her. This judgment can not be reviewed by us. Courts will often require officials to act in matters, the decision of which is exclusively within their discretion, when they refuse to do so, although they will not review the decision when made, however erroneous it may be.

Appellant further contends that, although the statute, alone, may not afford her the right of appeal, yet she is entitled to it under the resolution of the committee, that either party dissatisfied with their decision, should have an appeal to the Grant Circuit Court, based upon the provision of section 1563, that "the proceedings in such cases shall be in such form and manner as the committee or governing authority shall determine upon." The language of the statute in nowise authorizs the resolution of the committee; they could, under it, regulate the proceedings of the contest before themselves, but could confer no jurisdiction on the Grant Circuit Court.

The motion to dismiss the appeal is sustained.

LEE v. MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE CO., OF NEW YORK, &c.

(Filed September 29, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Insurance—Transfer of policy—Charles D. Skeggs, who owed $200 in bank, with Leeman and Lee as sureties, in consideration of the payment by Lee of the paper, assigned the latter his policy of insurance, his wife joining in the assignment. Lee took up the paper in bank and kept the policy of insurance in force, and at Skeggs' death sought to collect the insurance. Mrs. Skeggs set up claim to it and alleged that she was induced to sign the paper by which he took it, upon the understanding that he was only to use it as collateral, and that her signing was necessary to enable him to make such use of it. She was willing that he should be paid with interest, but denied beyond that amount he had any interest in it. Held—Judgment in accordance with her contention was proper.

2. Same—In some of the States it has been decided that, where a person obtained an insurance upon his life and pays the premium himself, he may make the policy payable to one who has no insurable interest in his life, and can at any period, sell and transfer the policy for value, to one who has no insurable interest in his life, who will become invested with the complete title thereto, but in this state a different rule prevails.

Montgomery & Lee for appellant.

Clare, Dickerson & Clayton and A. G. DeJarnett for appellees.

Appeal from Grant Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

On the 20th of December, 1890, the Mutual Life Insurance Company, of New York, insured the life of Charles B. Skeggs for $1,000, the policy being known as a "twenty year distribution policy." Skeggs assumed to pay an annual premium of $42.20, on the 20th of December, of each year. He paid this premium for five years. On the 24th of January, 1895, he borrowed from the Bank of Williamstown $200, for which he executed his note with J. A. Leeman and J. L. Lee, as sureties, and, simultaneously, assigned and transferred to Leeman and Lee as collateral to indemnify them against loss, the above policy of insuarnce. Shortly after the execution of this note Skeggs, having contracted "tuberculosis," removed to Colorado. The note ran along until January, 1898, when the bank demanded its payment of the sureties. Skeggs' health had steadily grown worse, and Lee demanded that the insurance policy should be transferred to him in fee. On the 1st of February, 1898, C. B. Skeggs, Jane M. Skeggs, the beneficiary and wife of C. B. Skeggs, and J. A. Leeman, signed the following writing which was forwarded to them in Colorado, by Lee:

"For one dollar to me, in hand paid and for other valuable consideration, the receipt of which is acknowledged, I hereby assign, transfer and set over to J. L. Lee, whose P. O. address is Williamstown, Ky., all my right, title and interest in policy No. 441597, issued by the Mutual Life Insurance Company, of New York; and for the consideration above expressed, I do for myself, my executor and administrators, guarantee the validity and sufficiency of the foregoing assignment to the above named assignee, their executors, administrators, and assigns, and their title to the said policy, will forever warrant and defend.

"Dated Anaconda, Colo., this 8th day of February, 1898.

"C. B. SKEGGS,
"JENNIE M. SKEGGS,
"J. A. LEMON."

Lee thereupon took up the obligation of Skeggs to the bank and executed his own obligation in lieu thereof. He also paid the annual premium on the policy until the death of C. B. Skeggs, in 1903. After the death of Skeggs, he demanded payment of the policy, claiming to be the sole owner thereof under and by virtue of the assignment, supra. This was denied by Jennie M. Skeggs, who notified the company not to pay the insurance money to Lee Lee thereupon, brought this suit against the insurance company, asking a personal judgment for the full amount of the policy. Mrs. Skeggs was made a party to this proceeding on her own petition, and admitted that Lee was entitled to have repaid to him all the various sums of money, with interest thereon, which he had paid for her deceased husband; but denied that he had any interest in the overplus due upon the policy, and alleged that she was induced to make an absolute assignment thereof by his representation to her that this was necessary to enable him to use it as collateral, in the renewal of his note to the bank, and that he agreed that when he had been fully reimbursed the various sums of money which he had assumed to pay, that she should have the overplus, if any. She further alleged that Lee was not related by blood or otherwise to her deceased husband, had no insurable interest in his life, except as a creditor, and asked that the company be adjudged to pay the note due the bank with interest, and the premiums which had been advanced by Lee with interest, and the residue of the $1,000 to her. The insurance company in their answer admitted that they owed the $1,000, for which the policy was issued, and by agreement paid the money into court, and asked that they should be protected in any judgment which might be rendered therein. A judgment was entered upon final submission of the case, in accordance with the contention of Mrs. Skeggs, and Lee has appealed.

He insists that he assumed to pay for C. B. Skeggs and wife, the full pecuniary value of the policy at the time of its transfer to him, in 1898; and that Mrs. Skeggs is estopped from asserting any claim to the proceeds by her unconditional assignment thereof to him. In some of the States it has been decided that where a person obtains a policy on his life, and pays the premium himself, he may make the policy payable to one who has no insurable interest in his life, and can at any period sell and transfer the policy for value to a person who has no insurable interest in his life, and who thereby became invested with the complete title thereto. But in this State a different rule prevails. In numerous adjudications of this court it has been held that no one can enforce a policy of insurance issued upon the life of another, without having an insurable interest in the life of such person. (Basye v. Adams, 81 Ky., 228; Caudell v. Woodward, 96 Ky., 645.)

And in Beard v. Sharp, 17 Ky. Law Rep., 1029, it was decided that where a son had, for a number of years kept up an insurance policy upon the life of his mother, and he consented in order to carry the policy, to allow a stranger to become a joint beneficiary with himself, and where, in accordance with this agreement a new certificate was issued, it was held that the certificate was void to the stranger, and that he was only entitled to be paid out of the proceeds of the policy, after the death of the insured, the amount actually paid by him in premiums, with interest thereon. This rule was adhered to in Barbour's Adm'r v. Larue's Ass'ee, 106 Ky., 546 and in New York Life Ins. Co. v. Brown's Adm'r, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 2070. Under these various adjudications it is quite clear that appellant has no valid ground of complaint of the judgment appealed from.

Judgment affirmed.

LANGAN, &c. v. BITZER, &c.

(Filed September 29, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Street construction—Costs of improvement—Mistake in name of owner of property—A mistake in the apportionment warrant for street construction, by which the name of the owner of the property was incorrectly given, was no defense in an action to enforce the lien for improvement. No personal liability is created in such proceeding, but only a lien on the property. The proceeding to enforce the lien is in rem.

2. Same—The grade of the street having been fixed for thirty years, it was not necessary for the council to take any further action in regard thereto, and the fact that grade was fixed by resolution and not by ordinance, is immaterial.

Matt O'Doherty for appellant.

Pirtle, Trabue and Doolan & Cox for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

A sidewalk was constructed on West Second street in front of the property of Annie Burgess, now Annie Langan, and an apportionment warrant was issued for so much of the cost of the improvement as fell against her property. By a clerical error the name of the owner is given in the apportionment warrant as Adam Burgess, when it should have been Annie Burgess, and this is relied on in defense of the action. By section 2234, Kentucky Statutes, the lien for the improvement, with interest, at the rate of 6 per cent. is against the respective lots, and by section 2235, the cost must be apportioned to the front foot, as owned by the parties respectively fronting the improvement. No presonal liability is created by the proceeding, but only a lien on the property. The proceeding to enforce the lien is a proceeding in rem. The clerical error, by which Adam was written for Annie in giving the name of the owner of the property, did not affect the validity of the proceeding. The basis of the action is the ordinance of the council, the contract and the apportionment to the property. The error in the name of the party is one of those things which are provided for by section 2234, Kentucky Statutes, by the provision that no error in the proceedings of the general council shall exempt from payment, after the work has been done as required by either the ordinance or the contract, but the general council or the court in which suits may be pending may make all corrections, rules and orders to do justice to all parties concerned. The error in the name of the owner of the property is not shown to have prejudiced appellants in any way, and there is nothing in the record to break the prima facie case created by the statute. No new apportionment is necessary and, therefore, interest was properly allowed on the warrant. It is only where a new apportionment against the property must be made, that interest will not be allowed. (Allen v. Woods, 20 Ky Law Rep., 59; Barfield v. Gleason, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 141.)

It is also objected that the ordinance and contract were for the pavement on both sides of the street and that this was improper. But this is not shown to have prejudiced appellants in any way, or that anything more has been apportioned against the property than would have been apportioned against it upon the basis contended for by them. (Barrett v. Falls City Stone Co., 21 Ky. Law Rep., 669.)

The grade of the street having been fixed over thirty years ago, it was not necessary for the council to take any further action in regard thereto, unless it was desired to change the grade as already established. The fact that the grade was then fixed by resolution, and not by ordinance, is immaterial. (Augusta v. McKibben, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 1224: Gaertner v. Louisville Artificial Stone Co., 24 Ky. Law Rep., 140; Barrett v. Louiville Artificial Stone Co., 21 Ky. Law Rep., 669; Louisville v. Cassidy, 105 Ky., 424.)

A prima facie case under the statute was made out by the plaintiff and no proof was taken by the defendant to overthrow it.

Judgment affirmed.

EWING'S ADM'RS v. EWING.

(Filed September 24, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Decedent's estate—Claims against—Evidence—Where two notes were held by one, since deceased, one for $1,118 95 and the other for $318, and on August 8, 1899, there was endorsed a credit on the latter for $500, which over paid it, defense by the payor, in an action by the administrators of the decedent, that he had paid $1,000, instead of $500, will not be upheld where it appears that, on the date of the endorsement on the note he paid by check, to the owner of the note $500 and took his receipt for that amount which recited that it was to be credited on note, the check not indicating the purpose for which it was given. The burden being upon the appellee to establish his contention of the payment of the 1,000, and failing to do it, it was error in the lower court to allow it.

C. W. Goodpaster and Alex Conner for appellants.

Hazelrigg, Chenault & Hazelrigg for appellee.

Appeal from Bath Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The decedent, F. M. Ewing, held two notes, executed by appellee, G. M. Ewing, one was for $1,118.95, which was secured by mortgage, upon which certain payments had been made; the other note was for $318. On August

8, 1899, F. M. Ewing endcrsed on the latter note a credit of $500, which overpaid the principal and interest $82.10. F. M. Ewing died and his personal representatives instituted this action to recover the alleged balance on the notes and to enforce the mortgage. The appellee pleaded that on the 8th of August, 1899, he paid the decedent $1,000, instead of the $500, with which he was credited. The question for determination is which of the sums did he pay. No oral testimony was offered on the trial of the case. The only evidence offered by the appellee was a check dated August 8, 1899, for $500 and a receipt bearing the same date for a like amount. The check reads as follows:

No. "Owingsville, Ky., August 8, 1899.

"Farmers Bank.

"Pay to F. M. Ewin. or bearer, $500.00

"Five Hundred——Dollars.

For "G. M. EWING."

The receipt is as follows:

"$500.00.

"Received of G. M. Ewing Five Hundred Dollars to be credited on note as of this Aug. 8th, 1899.

"F. M. EWING."

It will be observed that the check does not indicate the purpose for which it was given, or as to how the proceeds were to be applied or used. The check might have been given as payment on a debt for property or for some other purpose. It is stated in the receipt that the $500 received is to be credited on note as of that date. When the two papers are read together, in the absence of any explanation, the conclusion to be drawn is that on August 8, 1899, the appellee paid the decedent $500 by check and the receipt was intended to be an evidence of that payment.

The appellee claims that he paid the $500 in cash and the receipt is for that money, and that the check was an additional payment. The burden was upon the appellee to sustain his claim, which he failed to do. There is an entire absence of evidence to show that $500 was paid in cash on the day mentioned. If he paid the $1,000, as he claims, it would seem that a receipt would have been given for $1,000 instead of $500. Again, if the parties had intended the receipt to be an evidence of the payment of $500 in cash, and that the check was to be the evidence of another payment, it would have been recited in the receipt that it was for cash. We are of the opinion that the court erred in allowing a credit for $1,000, instead of $500, of date August, 8, 1899, because the appellee failed to sustain his claim by sufficient evidence.

The judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

BOARD OF COUNCILMEN OF THE CITY OF FRANKFORT v. ALLEN.

(Filed September 30, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Damages—Negligence—Liability of city for negligence of contractor—Appellee recovered a judgment against appellant for damages sustained from falling off a rock on a street of the City of Franfkort, which had been placed there by its contractor. The accident happened in a densely-populated section of the city where children were accustomed to play upon the streets. The appellee was a boy of nine years. He testified that he did not know the rock was dangerous and had not been warned to keep off of it, while there was testimony that he had been so warned. The city defended on the idea that it had let the contract to Lynch and took bond for the faithful performance of his duties; that he was an independent contractor and was alone responsible. Held—That section 3451, Kentucky Statutes, which has application to improvements like this in third-class cities, requires that there should be a provision in such contracts that the work be executed under the immediate supervision of the mayor and city engineer, subject to the acceptance of the council; and that even conceding that Lynch was an independent contractor, the law makes it the duty of the city to keep its streets in a reasonably safe condition for use by the public, and the judgment awarding damages will not be disturbed.

T. H. Crockett and Ira Julian for appellant.

J. A. Violett and J. W. Rodman for appellee.

Appeal from Franklin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

This is an appeal from the judgment of the Franklin Circuit Court for the sum of $500 recovered by reason of personal injuries received by appellee under the following circumstances:

One Lynch, under contract with appellant, was putting in some curbing along Ewing street in South Frankfort. He had caused some heavy stones to be hauled and deposited on this street for that purpose. One of them was unloaded at the corner of Fourth and Ewing streets, which stone was nine feet long, nineteen inches wide and five inches thick and estimated to weigh a ton or more. The stone was set up on an incline at the junction of the two streets, one end resting on the sidewalk and the other end extending out into the street in an unstable position. It was placed in this position for the purpose of dressing it and had remained so, according to the witnesses, for from eight to seventeen days. The appellee, a boy then about nine years of age, got upon it, and when he started to get off, it fell upon him, crushing one of his legs. This was in a densely-populated portion of the city, and many children were accustomed to play upon these streets. The boy stated that he did not know that it was dangerous to get upon this rock, and he had not been warned to keep off of it, while there was some proof that he had been warned.

The city undertook to relieve itself by pleading that it had let the contract for this curbing to Lynch and took his bond for the faithful performance of the work, and that he was an independent contractor, and contends that Lynch alone is responsible. We cannot agree with appellant's contention in this. Section 3451 of the statutes, which has application to improvements like this in third-class cities, requires that there should be a provision in all such contracts that the work be executed under the immediate supervision of the mayor and city engineer and subject to the acceptance of the common council. But, even conceding that Lynch was an independent contractor, the law made it the duty of the city to keep the sidewalks and streets in a reasonably safe condition for the use of the public. This is a primary duty of the city and it can not relieve itself thereof by a contract of any kind.

In the case of the City of Louisville v. Keber, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 2006, after discussing several decisions of courts of other States, the court said: "The rule on which these opinions rests, is that the city, having exclusive control over its streets, and being charged with the duty of maintaining them, must keep its streets in a reasonably safe condition for public travel, and for a failure to do this, is primarily liable, although the defect in the highway may be due to the act of some contractor or third person done by authority of the city."

In curbing this street in the manner stated, it was the duty of the appellant to use at least ordinary care to see that these heavy stones were not placed and kept in a dangerous condition, so that persons, and especially children congregating there, might not be injured. In the case of Bransom's Adm'r v. Labrot, &c., 81 Ky., 641, which was a case where a child was killed by a heavy piece of timber falling on him, the timber having been negligently piled in an unsafe manner, the court said: "It appears to us that a man who leaves in a public place, along which persons, and amongst them children, have to pass, a dangerous machine, which may be fatal to any one who touches it, without any precaution against mischief, is not only guilty of negligence, but of negligence of a very reprehensible character, and not the less so because the imprudent and unauthorized act of another may be necessary to realize the mischief to which the unlawful act or negligence of the defendant has given occasion." And also, on page 645 of the same opinion, the court said: "It was, therefore, the duty of appellees, in placing this timber upon the lot, to do it in such manner as to make it reasonably safe and secure against injury to children coming there."

The instructions of the lower court were in accordance with these principles and were unobjectionable.

Perceiving no error prejudicial to the substantial rights of the appellant, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

COMMONWEALTH v. BAILEY.

(Filed September 30, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Criminal law—Bribery—Sufficiency of indictment—Where it was averred in an indictment for bribery that William Cundiff was under an indictment for murder, that the wife of the deceased was a witness, on the indictment, for the Commonwealth to the killing, and that Cundiff corruptly offered a house and lot to her if she would absent herself from the trial and not testify against him, knowledge that she was a witness for the Commonwealth in the prosecution was necessarily implied from the recitation of these facts in the indictment, and amounted to a charge that he had knowledge that she was a witness for the Commonwealth at the time of the commission of the crime, and it was error for the trial court to sustain a demurrer to the indictment, it being in accord with the requirements of sections 122 and 124 of the Criminal Code.

2. Same—One of the essential elements of the offense of offering to bribe a witness is, that the accused should know that the person to whom the bribe was offered was a witness; but it is not essential, in all cases, that the indictment should contain the express allegation to this effect, as in many cases it is implied from the circumstances surrounding the commission of the offense, or a statement of the acts constituting them.

Joseph Huffaker for appellant.

Aaron Kohn and Morton K. Yonts for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Criminal division.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

A general demurrer, filed by the appellee, L. H . Bailey, was sustained to the following indictment returned against him by the grand jurors of Jefferson county: "The grand jurors of the county of Jefferson, in the name and by the authority of the Comomnwealth of Kentucky, accuse said L. H. Bailey of the offense of bribery, committed in manner and form as follows to-wit: That heretofore, one, William T Cundiff, being at that time under an indictment in this court for wilfully killing and murdering one Thomas Bishop, and Lulie Bishop, widow of the said Thomas Bishop, being a witness on the said indictment for the Commonwealth to the said killing, he, the said L. H. Bailey, did, on or about November 18, 1908, in the county of Jefferson, State of Kentucky, and within one year prior to the finding of this indictment, offer, corruptly and feloniously, to the said Lulie Bishop a certain reward or thing of value, to-wit, a house and lot in the city of Louisville, if she, said Lulie Bishop, would absent herself from this court and not testify as a witness on the trial of the said Wliiam T. Cundiff under the said indictment, all of which tended to the obstruction of the administration of justice, and is against the peace and dignity of the Commonwealth of Kentucky.

"Witnesses: LULIE BISHOP,
"KATIE BISHOP."

It is urged for appellee, upon this appeal, that this indictment is fatally defective because in the naming or accusative part the offense is bribery, while the specific description of the alleged offense only set out a case of attempted bribery. Second, that the indictment does not specifically allege that the witness sought to be bribed, had been summoned or recognized as a witness, or that her testimony was material, and also because it fails to aver specifically, knowledge on the part of the defendant that Lulie Bishop was a witness for the Commonwealth at the time the alleged offer was made. There can be no doubt that at common law an indictment would lie for bribery or attempting to bribe or dissuade a witness from appearing before a court, pursuant to a subpœna. (22 Encyclcpædia of Pleading and Practice, 1351, and authorities there cited.) And it is equally certain that the offense of bribery embraces any attempt to bribe. (2 Whartons' Criminal Law, 9th Ed., 1857: E. Greenleaf on Evidence, 71; A. Fook, 62 Call, 493; United States v. Worral, 2 Dallas, 384.)

Section 120, of the Criminal Code, provides: "When an indictment is found, the names of all the witnesses who were examined must be written at the foot of or on the indictment."

The placing of the name of Lulie Bishop on the indictment was a sufficient designation of her as a witness. (United States v. Bettinger, 15 Am. Law Rep., 49:; U. S. v. Kee, 39 Fed. Rep., 603.) If the defendant knew that her name was on the foot of the indictment, he was charged with knowledge that in due course of law she would be subpœnaed, and he could not anticipate the issuing and service of the subpœna upon her. Bribing and intimidating or persuading witnesses not to testify, or not to attend court, are among the easiest and most corrupting of this class of misdemeanors, and it will not do to say that a defendant could escape responsibility for attempting to bribe a witness because she had not actually been subpœnaed to attend a trial. (State v. Keys, 80 Am. Dec., 454; Curran v. Taylor, 92 Ky., 537.)

It must be conceded that one of the essential elements of the offense of offering to bribe a witness is, that the accused should know that the person to whom the bribe was offered was, in fact, a witness. But it is not essential in all cases that the indictment should contain express allegation to this effect, as in many cases it is necessarily implied from a statement of the acts constituting the offense. In discussing the question of scienter, Wharton, in his Criminal Pleading and Practice, used these words: "This is so whenever knowledge is an essential ingredient of the offense and not implied in the statement of the act itself."

The averments of the indictment in this case are that Willlliam Cundiff was under indictment for the murder of Thomas Bishop, and that Lulie Bishop, his widow, was a witness on the indictment for the Commowealth to the killing, and that the defendant corruptly offered a house and lot in the city of Louisville to her, if she would absent herself from the court and not testify as a witness on the trial of Cundiff.—Knowledge that Lulie Bishop was a witness for the Comonwealth in the prosecution is, we think, necessarily implied from the recitation of the above acts contained in the indictment, and amounted to a charge that he had knowledge that she was a witness for the Commonweath at the time of the commission of the alleged offense. In our opinion the indictment substantially conforms to the requirements of section 122 and section 124 of the Criminal Code, and the trial court erred in sustaining a demurrer thereto. An interesting discussion of the question is found in Pettibone v. United States, 148; U. S., 305, and in 15 Encyclopædia of Pleading and Practice, 19.

The judgment is, therefore, reversed and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

LUTTER & VOSS, &c. v. GROSSE, &c.

(Filed September 30, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Assignment—Attachment—In this action a contractor, in building a schoolhouse, sub-let most of the work to different persons, and when the work was completed was indebted to his sub-contractors in a much larger sum than the Board of Education, with whom he had contracted, was indebted to him, and gave orders to certain of his creditors to the Board of Education for amounts due them. Other contractors, who had not been paid in full, instituted suits of attachment and garnished the funds in the hands of the Board of Education. These suits were consolidated and referred to the master commissioner, who reported that these contractors who held the orders, were entitled to priority, and this report was properly approved and confirmed. The orders constituted an equitable assignment of the fund at their date, which preceded the issuing of the attachments.

M. L. Harbeson for appellants.

S. D. Rouse, D. A. Glenn and J. W. Bryan for appellees.

Appeal from Kenton Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

In 1895, the appellee. C. Chas. Grosse, contracted with the Board of Education of Ludlow to construct a school house. He sub-let most of the work to different parties whom he failed to pay in full. At the completion of the building there was due him, from the Board of Education, $3,800, and he was indebted to his sub-contractors in a much larger sum. Before the completion of the work he had given to the J. M. Blair Brick Co., orders directed to the Board of Education requesting them to pay to the brick company $546. He had also given similar orders in favor to Mitchell Bros. for $450, who had a claim for brick furnished to a sub-contractor, and to Foyle & Aspey for $164. The other sub-contractors, who had not been paid in full the amount due them, instituted attachment suits in the Kenton Circuit Court against Grosse, seeking to garnishee in the hands of the Board of Education, the respective amounts due to them, to-wit, T. W. Spinks, $113; James Farrel, $170; Lutter & Voss, $711.20; Carl Bros., $1,569.58; J. H. Lutter, $1,931.53; Frank Voss, $478.45.

All these cases were consolidated and referred to the master commissioner to ascertain the claims and to report liens on the $3,800 due Grosse, and their priority. In the commissioner's report, the sub-contractors, who held orders on the Board of Education, were given priorities over the attaching creditors upon the theory that these orders constituted an equitable assignment of the fund coming to Grosse at their date, which, preceeding the issuing of the attachments, and the attaching creditors were given liens in the order in which they were sued out.

The report of the commissioner was approved and confirmed and the judgment entered in accordance therewith. To reverse judgment a part of the attaching creditors have appealed, claiming that they should have been adjudged a priority in the distribution of the amount found due Grosse.

In our opinion the judgment of the chancellor is in accordance with the law and former adjudications of this court, as in a contest between equities merely, that which is prior in time must prevail. Newby v. Hill & Million, 59 K., 530, where this question is decided in a well-considered opinion by Judge Duvall, and which has since been followed in numerous decisions of this court.

Judgment affirmed.

ASHER v. JOHNSON, &c.

(Filed September 29, 1904.)

1. Lease—Tenancy—An agreement, in writing, by which "C. agreed with A. to allow A. to enter C.'s field at the lower end of the meadow, on the left side of the creek, coming up the creek and proceed up through the field to the upper end thereof, to build a tramway through the field to be operated with tram-cars, pulled by mules and horses over which to haul logs, lumber, feed and goods, in consideration of $35 per year, not to exceed three years," is a lease, under which A. was C.'s tenant, and gave A. the right to enter upon and take possession of a strip of C.'s land and occupy it with his tram-road for three years for the agreed rental.

2. Expiration of lease—Holding over for 90 days—Effect—Under Ky. Statutes, section 2295, providing that if proceedings to dispossess a tenant are not instituted within 90 days after the expiration of his tenancy then none shall be allowed for one year, A. having remained in possession for 90 days, after his lease expired, he was entitled to remain for one year, after the expiration of his lease by paying the rental for said year.

Hazelrigg, Chenault & Hazelrigg and W. R. Ramsey for appellant.

Logan & Jeffries for appellee.

Appeal from Whitley Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The appellant, Asher, was largely engaged in the timber and lumber business. He desired to construct a tram-road, about seventeen miles long, for the purpose of hauling his lumber products to a railroad for shipment. To do so it was necessary to secure the right to construct the tram-road over the lands of the appellee, Carnes; thereupon, Carnes executed and delivered to the appellant a writing which reads as follows:

"Pineville, Bell County, Ky., May 22, 1900.

"I, J. L. Carnes, this day agree with A. J. Asher and obligate myself to allow A. J. Asher to enter my field at lower end of meadow on the left side of the creek, coming up creek and proceed up thorugh field to the upper end of same and out. Asher is to be allowed to build a tram-road through the field, to be operated with tram-cars, to be pulled by mules and horses, over which to haul logs lumber feed and goods. Asher is not to put any rocks in said road and is to put a gate at each end of field and is to pay any damage done to Carnes' land or crops by said gates being left open, and to be allowed to pass up creek to Botner Bingham's land. Consideration for said privilege to be $35.00 per year. Time of lease not to exceed three years.

"J. L. CARNES."

Asher constructed his tram-road covering the distance of seventeen miles, which in part was over the land of Carnes mentioned in the contract. He continued to use his tram-road for the purpose of transporting his lumber until September, 1903, when the appellees prevented him from using it over the Carnes land, necessitating the unloading of the cars at the point of entry upon the Carnes land, and hauling it by wagons around it to the tram-road and again loading it upon the tram-cars to be carried to the railroad, thus causing loss and damage to the appellant.

The appellant paid the stipulated rent for three years and avers that he is ready and willing to pay for the year beginning May 22, 1903.

The facts detailed are substantially averred in the petition, to which the court sustained a demurrer. To review that action of the court the appeal is prosecuted. The theory of the appellee is, that the writing which Carnes gave Asher is a license, but, if not that, it is an easement for the period of three years, determinable at the will of the appellee. The appellant claims that it is a lease, therefore, having remained in possession from the date of its expiration, May 22, 1903, until September, he was, by virtue of the statute, entitled to hold it for one year after the expiration of the lease.

5 Lawson on Rights and Remedies, section 2668, defines a license as follows: "A license is an authority given to do some act or acts on the land of another, without giving any estate in the land itself. It differs from an easement in that the latter is a permanent interest, with a right at all times to enter and enjoy it, while the continuance of the former depends on the will of the person who has created it."

There is a distinction between an "easement" and a "license" although in some cases it is difficult to see a substantial difference between them. An easement is a privilege in land founded upon a deed or other writing or upon a prescription. (Hazelton v. Putnam, 54 Am. Dec., 158.) An easement is a permanent interest in another's land with the right to enjoy it fully and without objection. An easement may attach to the land and pass with the dominant tenement as an appurtenance thereto. The writing in question gave Asher the right to enter upon and take possession of a strip of the grantor's land, and occupy it with his tram road for a period of three years, at a stipulated rental. Asher had the actual possession of the strip of land so occupied, as completely as he would have, had he raised corn or other products upon it. He enjoyed the profits of the strip occupied by him as much as he would have done if he had cultivated it.

Bouvier defines a lease to be:

"A species of contract for the possession and profits of lands and tenements, either for life or for a certain term of years, or during the pleasure of the parties."

In Waller v. Morgan, 18 B. M., 186, the court said:

"To create the relation of landlord and tenant, no particular words are necessary; but it is indispensable that it should appear to have been the intention of one party to dispossess himself of the premises, and of the other to enter and occupy as the former himself had the right to do, pursuant to the agreement between them."

In order that Asher might have become Carnes' tenant, it was not necessary for him to take possession of Carnes' entire farm. He could become a tenant on a part of it as well as of the whole, depending upon the terms of the contract. The contract contemplated that he should take possession of the land for three years at a fixed rental. We conclude that the contract was a lease, and Asher was Carnes' tenant.

Section 2295, Kentucky Statutes, reads as follows:

"If by contract a term or tenancy for a year or more is to expire on a certain day, the tenant shall abandon the premises on that day, unless by express contract he secures the right to remain longer. If, without such contract, the tenant shall hold over, he shall not thereby acquire any right to hold or remain on the premises for ninety days after said date, and the possession may be recovered without demand or notice, if proceedings are instituted within said time. But if proceedings are not instituted within said time, then none shall be allowed until the expiration of one year from the day the term of tenancy expired; and, at the end of said year the tenant shall abandon the premises without demand or notice, or stand in the same relation to his landlord that he did at the expiration of the term or tenancy aforesaid; and so from year to year, until he abandons the premises, is turned out of possession or makes a new contract."

Asher having remained in possession of the land for ninety days after the expiration of his lease, he was entitled to remain for one year thereafter. It is suggested that the statute was intended for the benefit of the tillers of the soil, as it would be supposed that if the tenant remained on the premises during that period, he would have pitched his crop; therefore, should not be disturbed, in the enjoyment of the premises for the year ensuing the expiration of the lease. This may have been the consideration which induced the enactment of the statute, but its terms are broad enough to cover other leases. It applies to a case where a house is rented without a foot of ground attached to it, susceptible of cultivation. It necessarily applies to the case under consideration. In our opinion the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the petition.

The judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

ÆTNA LIFE INSURANCE CO. v. MILWARD.

(Filed September 30, 1904.)

1. Accident policy—Death—Proof—Circumstantial evidence—Suicide—Verdict—Decedent held a $10,000 accident policy, payable upon the condition that he came to his death by "violent external and accidental means." He was found dead from the effect of a pistol shot wound in his head, his body partially disrobed as he had slept, lying in a small entry at the rear of his residence. By his side were two pistols, both loaded, but in one a discharged cartridge. The shot entered his head on the left side behind the ear and passed through, nearly in a straight line. The pistols were lying rather to his right side. He was right handed. His domestic relations were pleasant, being happily married, with two young children, good health, prosperous in business, 34 years old, of good habits and character and no taint of insanity. The loaded pistol was his, the owner of the one with the discharged cartridge was unknown. The question being submitted to the jury, whether his death was caused by suicide or by accidental means, they found the latter—Held, That the jury were warranted, under the evidence, in finding that the death was not by suicide.

2. Pleading—Necessary allegations—Negative averments—In an action upon an accident policy it is necessary to allege and prove that the insured came to his death by violent, external and accidental means, within the time covered by the policy; but it is not necessary to negative any of the provisions of the policy not made conditions precedent to his right to institute the suit. It is enough for the plaintiff to declare, upon the clause of the contract under which he deems himself entitled to recover, stating the facts, showing prima facie such right.

3. Evidence—Verdict of coroner's jury—In an action to recover upon a policy of insurance, payable upon the death of the insured, caused by violent, external and accidental means, the finding of a coroner's jury that the death of deceased was caused by suicide, was properly rejected as irrelevant and incompetent evidence.

4. Proof of death—Notice to the company—Decedent's death having occurred November 21, 1900, an averment in the petition "that on December 11, 1900, the plaintiff made out and presented to defendant proof of the death of deceased, and that said death was the proximate and sole result of violent external and accidental means, to-wit, a gunshot wound, and within ten days thereafter defendant acknowledged having received such proof, and that same was in due and proper form," was a sufficient allegation as to furnishing proof of death.

Breckinridge & Shelby for appellant.

C. J. Bronston and John R. Allen for appellee.

Appeal from Fayette Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

This is an appeal from a judgment for $5,000, in favor of the appellee (plaintiff below), as the designated beneficiary in a policy insuring her husband, Charles S. Milward, against accidental death. The defense, as made by the answer, consists of a denial that the death was the result of an accident, and a claim that it was due to suicide. The principal points of complaint presented on this appeal are, that the verdict was unauthorized by the evidence; that the petition was insufficient, and that competent evidence on appellant's behalf was rejected by the trial court.

The insured was found dead from the effects of a pistol shot wound in the head. His body, partially disrobed as he had slept, was discovered lying in a small porch or entry, which was partially enclosed, at the rear of his residence. By his side were two pistols, both loaded, but in one a discharged cartridge. The shot entered his head on the left side, behind the ear, and passed through in nearly a straight line. The two pistols were lying rather to his right side. He was right handed. His domestic relations were apparently pleasant, being happily married. He had also two young children. His health was good. His mercantile business was prospering satisfactorily. He was about 34 years old, and a man of good habits and character. The shot which killed him was fired about dawn November 21, 1900. It was heard by but one person, who testifies in the record. The tragedy was unseen by any witness in the case.

Appellee, widow of deceased, and her two infants, slept in an up-stairs room, but were not aroused by the shot. There were no other evidences of violence, nor of the presence of another person at the scene of the killing. The back yard where it occurred, had walks leading to it which were paved, and would not, for that reason, have shown tracks.

One of the pistols probably belonged to deceased, or had recently been in his possession. It was a nickel plated Iver Johnson revolver. The other, a blued steel barrel pistol, was not identified as to its ownership. It was from the latter the fatal shot was fired.

There was some evidence that the insured was a man of intense application to business, was of a nervous temperament; that he had, a year or so previous to his death, consulted a physician who advised him to take a rest on account of nervous exhaustion or depression, and that he took a vacation of two or three weeks in the Northwest. After his return the physician found him restored to health and quit treating him. A few days before his death deceased complained of pain in the back of his head.

Appellant argues that the verdict is flagrantly against the evidence, because, it is contended, the evidence, of which the foregoing is a fair epitome, shows clearly that the death was suicide. Or, in any other view of it, it fails to show that the death was caused by accidental means, and, therefore, there was a failure of proof on behalf of the plaintiff.

As indicated, the evidence is wholly circumstantial. It may none the less point as unerringly to a correct conclusion as if detailed by eye-witnesses. It will not do to say that in such case the jury is required to "guess" the cause. It is unlike, when the circumstances do not show the cause of the occurrence, as in Louisville Gas Co. v. Kaufman, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1069, and Hurt v. Louisville, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 759. The nature of the wound shows conclusively that the cause of the death was both violent and external. The date of the occurrence is within the duration of the policy of insurance. The only remaining question was, whether it was accidental in the meaning of the contract. Aside from legal presumptions, about which the jury were not instructed in this case, though they may properly have been, we are unable to say from the evidence that the verdict is not true. It is reasonably clear, at least most probable, that if decedent had a pistol at all, it was the one, and so far as the record shows, the only one, to which he had access—the nickle-plated revolver, from which the fatal shot was not fired. That it was not fired by him is indicated by the place of the wound, its entry being on the opposite side of the head from that which would have been the easiest and most natural, if suicide had been done. Absence of scorching of the hair and of powder burn in sufficient quantity, also negative the theory that a right handed man had placed the muzzle of the pistol where it must have been done, if done by decedent, to have inflicted that shot. That the pistols were found on the right side of the body seems to refute the theory that decedent, contrary to his habit and instinct of using his right hand, used his left in this act. The instantaneous effect of such a wound is to produce paralysis of the volition. Death was immediate, in so far as the ability to dispose of anything in his hand was concerned. The surrounding circumstances are not in harmony with the view that the insured took his own life. They tend to show that the act was not the probable course of a sane person who was bent upon destroying his life. There was no hint in the evidence of any symptom of insanity. Circumstantial evidence tells the story of a past transaction by the similitude between the things shown to have been done, and what, in the experience of mankind, has been found to be generally the cause or result of similar occurrences. From these the mind deduces the most probable cause of the occurence in question. The result of this process of reasoning has been found to be so unvarying as to justify its adoption as a rule of evidence. The jury were authorized to apply to the facts detailed, their knowledge of human nature, and to indulge, in aid of deduction, predicated upon the established facts, those presumptions which common experience has established, and which therefore, the law allows. The love of life is instinctive; self-preservation is its first, as it is its strongest law. In the absence of mental derangement, of any known fact calculated to unseat the judgment and to overcome the love of life, the inquiring mind naturally and properly looks for other causes of the deed, when death by violence occurs. When all the facts are inconsistent with the theory of suicide, except simply that of the dead body in the presence of its instrument, it would be unnatural and illogical to confine the inquiry to that incident and declare the death suicide. The act of suicide is not only unnatural, but is highly immoral and criminal. The presumption of law is against it. So is the presumption of fact. The jury ought to have given place to that presumption in determining what, in the light of the evidence, was the cause of the death. By this process they were warranted under the evidence in this case, in saying that the death was not suicide.

Nor does the law presume that murder or other crime was committed. There was not enough evidence probably to say that murder was done. Still, the inquiry had led the jury to logically say that the death was from a cause violent and external, and not purposely self-inflicted.

Such a wound not having been inflicted with suicidal intent, was necessarily done by the decedent unintentionally, or, as the evidence indicated to be more likely, was done by some one else. As the presumption is also against crime, in the absence of evidence of the fact the jury was not authorized to say that the wound was purposely inflicted by another. The conclusion, from this state of the record, inevitably follows that decedent came to his death by an unintentional, that is, an accidental shot, fired either by himself, or by some other person unknown to the jury. Nor does it matter so far as the liability of appellant is concerned, which it was. In either event it was an accidental death within the meaning of the policy of insurance.

2. In an action upon an accident policy of insurance, it is necessary for the plaintiff to allege and prove that the insured came to his death by violent, external and accidental means, within the time covered by the policy. It is as necessary to allege and prove the last as either of the other requisites. Though appellant complains that in this case the burden was not so imposed, we think it was. The petition so charged. The court so ruled in the admission of evidence. In the instructions it was also observed.

The policy of insurance declared upon, contracted against injury and death through external, violent and accidental means. It contained many provisions for graduated indemnity, depending upon the nature and extent of the injury, and the calling and exposure of the insured—more to be paid in certain contingencies than in others. In a suit upon such policy it is not necessary for the plaintiff to state that he was not suing to recover under certain clauses not relied on, or for certain injuries not received, nor to negative any of the provisions of the policy not made conditions precedent to his right to institute the suit. (National Benefit Ass'n. v. Bowman, 110 Ind., 355; Jones v. U. S. Mutual Acc. Ass'n., 99 Iowa, 652; Railway Officials, &c. v. Drummond, 56 Neb., 235; Whitlatch v. Fidelity, &c. Co., 71 Hunn, 146; Employers, &c. Corp. v. Rochelle, 13 Texas, Civ. App., 232; Coolidge v. Continental Ins. Co., 67 Vt., 14; Troy Fire Ins. Co. v. Carpenter, Wis., 32; Coburn v. Travelers Ins. Co., 145 Mass., 226; May on Insurance, 590.) It is enough for the plaintiff to declare upon the clause of the contract under which he deems himself entitled to recover, stating the facts showing prima facie such right. The conditions of the policy that would excuse the insurer from payment, or that would reduce the principal sum insured, are matters of defense. (May on Insurance, 589, etc.) American Accident Company v. Carson, 99 Ky., 441, is relied on as sustaining a contrary doctrine to that announced. That opinion upon first reading, seems to recognize a distinction between conditions endorsed upon the back of the policy "and, therefore, not necessary to be adverted to it in declaring on the contract," and those upon its face. What other conditions were present "on the face of the policy," other than that of occupation, the opinion does not state. As conditions which would excuse or reduce the recovery, which are, by the agreement of the parties, made part of the contract, whether endorsed in the back or incorporated in the face of the policy, have the same legal effect, we must conclude that the court intended by the distinction noted, to require that the petition should set out a case within those that were precedent to the plaintiff's right of recovery. Such construction is the one in harmony with the weight, and indeed the whole drift of authority on this subject.

In this case the petition charged that the insured was injured on the 21st of November, 1900, by a gunshot wound, and came to his death therefrom immediately on that day; that the gunshot wound was accidental, external and violent, and that the death resulting from it was due solely to external, violent and accidental means.

Without negativing the many conditions of the policy, excusing the insurer in whole or in part from the principal sum insured, the petition stated fully a cause of action upon the policy for the principal sum, $5,000.

3. On the morning of the death of the insured, the coroner of Fayette county empanelled a jury to inquire into its cause. Evidence was heard and the premises examined by the jury, five of whom signed and returned a verdict that the body examined by them was that of Charles S. Milward, who came to his death from a pistol shot wound through the brain, the pistol being fired by his own hand. One of the jury refused to join in the verdict. Appellant offered the record of the coroner's inquest as evidence on its behalf in this trial. It was rejected by the trial court, of which appellant complains.

We are of opinion that the record and the finding of the coroner's jury were irrelevant as evidence. While the coroner's inquest is a public function, made on behalf of the State, and while a record of it is required to be made and kept, it cannot, on any well-grounded principle of American common law, become evidence in another inquiry or suit as to the cause of the death investigated. The business of this tribunal is, by statute, to collect promptly the facts concerning deaths which the coroner has reason to believe were the result of crime. Like the grand jury, it projects an ex parte investigation of supposed or alleged crime resulting in homicide, for the purpose of aiding in the administration of the criminal laws of the State. The accused is neither represented, nor has the right to be, at the inquiry. For even better reasons, other persons who have property interests dependent upon the cause of the death, would not be allowed to participate in the hearing before the coroner's jury, with a view to establishing rights by the verdict. That tribunal is unprovided with much of the necessary machinery for conducting such inquiries. It would, it seems to us, be abhorrent to the principles of the common law as administered in this country, that one not so represented should be bound by the finding of the coroner's jury—his rights concluded without a trial at which he could be heard—a trial "behind his back," as has been said. If such verdict be admissible as evidence, it follows from its very nature that it might alone constitute proof of the main fact, and of every essential fact in issue. It might, for example, not only show the fact of death by violent and external means, within a date covered by the policy, but find also that it was accidental, or was not accidental. In either event, a property right of one or the other of the litigants would be determined by a proceeding of which no notice was given to him, upon testimony not preserved, and may be wholly incompetent or insufficient, and without an opportunity to cross examine the witnesses whose oaths established it. Thus he would be deprived of his property without "a day in court," for the first verdict might be enough, if the only evidence offered or obtainable, and the second one would be merely a formal ratification. If the verdict of the coroner's jury is not binding upon the world as a proceeding in rem., it could not be admitted as evidence on any other ground. It might be proof of the fact of the death of the person examined, and of the identity of the body. Further than that we are not prepared to admit it.

In England the coroner is not only a judicial officer as well as ministerial, but his court is a court of record. His jurisdiction there, extended far beyond the possibilities here. His importance and use of that court may have justified its rank in England, and there accrediting its judgments as those of courts of record in proceedings in rem., are usually accorded.

Anciently when the goods of a suicide passed to the crown, and when the property of one attainted escheated to the lord, and when death resulted from misfortune or negligence (until the statute of 10 Vict., 62), the deodand was forfeited to the township for use of the King's almoner, the coroner's verdict and the escheator's inquest were treated as judicial findings in rem. and were conclusive evidence as such, although they later came, mainly through the intervention of Lord Hale, to be admitted as rebuttable evidence only. (Starkie Ev., 289, 404.) Our system of inquests was not designed for such purpose. Neither the ancient prerogatives of these functionaries, nor the presumptions attendant upon their findings, can have a place in our jurisprudence.

Able counsel present the argument in behalf of the admissibility of this evidence with much earnestness, and have cited a number of cases from other jurisdictions in support of their contention. In Ætna Life Insurance Co. v. Kaiser, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 2454 in disposing of an offer to introduce the coroner's inquest as evidence on the trial against the insurance company on the policy, the court said: "We are clearly of opinion that this was incompetent and was properly rejected." As that opinion did not cite or discuss the authorities, it is assumed in argument that it was adopted not after mature consideration of the question.

The leading case in America of the class relied on by appellant, is the U. S. Life Ins. Co. v. Vooke, 129 Ill., 557 (6 L. R. A., 65.) In that case the coroner's jury had found that the insured had come to his death by a pistol shot fired by his own hand while laboring under a fit of temporary insanity. Although a copy of the inquest was furnished to the insurance company by the beneficiary, in the proof of death, the court elected to ignore that fact and proceeded to a discussion and decision of the more difficult proposition, whether the inquest was not competent as original evidence of the manner in which the assured had died. The opinion cites a number of English cases and text writers and English statutes, concerning the jurisdiction of the coroner and the effect of verdicts rendered in his court. It was declared that this ancient office was judicial as well as ministerial, and so recognized by Parliamentary acts, from which it was said the Illinois statute creating the office was not substantially different. From the similarity of the statutes, which the court held to be but declaratory of the common law, it was decided to apply the English doctrine as to the nature of the inquest. People v. Devine, 44 Cal., 452, is the only American authority discussed in the opinion as tending to support its conclusions. The question in Devine's case was, whether the evidence of a witness, given before the coroner, could be used to contradict the same witness when testifying about the same transaction in a trial court. The California court admitted the impeaching evidence on the ground that under, their statute, the coroner's court was a judicial tribunal whose records were to be treated as other judicial records.

In a later case in California, (Walther v. Mut. Life Ins. Co., 65 Cal., 417), accompanying the proofs of death, and being a part thereof, was a copy of the coroner's inquest. These papers were all introduced by the plaintiff, but the trial court refused to consider the inquest as evidence. Upon the authority of Insurance Co. v. Newton, 22 Wall., 32, that action was reversed. It does not seem to have been regarded by the California Supreme Court that the inquest was competent otherwise than as an admission against interest made by the plaintiff. Nor was People v. Devine alluded to in that opinion. Insurance Co. v. Newton, 22 Wall., 32, discusses the admissibility of the inquest only when it was made part of the proof of death by the complainant. The court held that it then became a material statement by the plaintiff, as an admission against his interest, and was relevant on behalf of the defendant on that ground. This was followed in Insurance Company v. Higginbotham, 95 U. S., 390.

In Nutzradt v. Modern Brotherhood, 112 Iowa, 522, the issue was whether the insured had died a suicide. As to the admissibility of the verdict of the coroner's jury and its effect, the court said: "Plaintiff's counsel do not question its admissibility, and, in view of the purpose of the inquest and the manner in which it was required to be conducted, we think it is competent evidence in such an issue as this." Its effect was declared on authority of Greenleaf on Evidence, 556, and Insurance Company v. Kieglast Vocke supra, to be not conclusive.

In Knights of Honor v. Fletcher, 78 Miss., 337, also cited by appellant, the rules of the order required, as a condition precedent to the right of recovery, that in case of sudden death the certificate of the coroner would be invariably required. The proof of death was furnished as required, including the coroner's inquest. The court decided that on that ground, as well as independent of it, the inquest was competent evidence, citing without comment U. S. Life Ins. Co. v. Vocke, supra; Walther v. Mut. Life Ins. Co., supra, and Insurance Co. v. Higginbotham, 95 U. S., 380, supra, with Fien v. Covenant Mut. Ben. Ass'n., 60 Ills. App., 274, as the authority for the conclusion.

Eliminating the cases used in the foregoing citations, which turned upon the peculiar phraseology of local statutes, or were bottomed on other principles, as the 22 Wall. case, and Higginbotham case (95 U. S., 380), we find the Vocke case (129 Ill., 557) the origin, apparently, of the doctrine in this country for the principles for which appellant contends.

The Supreme Court of Colorado, in Germania Ins. Co. v. Lewin, 24 Colorado, 43 (65 Am. State Reports, 215), holds to the contrary doctrine—that which is applied in this State. The Vocke case, supra, Pyle v. Pyle, 158 Ill., 289, following it, and the California case rested upon it, are analyzed and rejected. As showing the impolicy of the old English rule if attempted to be applied to insurance cases when suicide was a controlling question, that court reasoned thus: "In case of death under suspicious circumstances, or resulting from accident, the rule permitting inquisitions to be used in evidence, would result in a race and scramble to secure a favorable coroner's verdict that would influence, and perhaps control, in case suit should be instituted against life insurance companies upon policies of insurance, and in cases of accidents occurring as the result of negligence on the part of corporations operating railways, street car lines, mining for coal, the precious metals, etc. Law writers of late have frequently animadverted upon the carelessness with which such inquests are frequently conducted, and to allow inquisitions to be used in a suit between private parties upon a cause of action growing out of the death of the deceased, as in this case, would be to introduce an element of uncertainty into the practice which, we think, would be contrary to public policy and pernicious in the extreme, and for these reasons we conclude, upon careful consideration, that the safer and better rule is to exclude such inquisitions." (State v. County Com'rs, 54 Md., 426; Goldschmidt v. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 102 N. Y., 486.)

4. The petition averred the furnishing to the insurer of the proof of death within the period allotted by the policy. The allegation was: "Plaintiff states that on the 11th day of December, 1900, this plaintiff made out and presented to defendant proof of the death of the said Charles S. Milward, and that said death was the proximate and sole result of external, violent and accidental means, to-wit, a gunshot wound, and within ten days thereafter defendant acknowledged having received such proof, and that same was in due and proper form."

The allegation followed substantially the requirement contained in the policy, as to furnishing proof of death. The answer traversed the allegation just quoted. Appellant was ruled on plaintiff's motion to produce the proof that was furnished, which it did. The court alone considered this proof and held it to be sufficient. The proof, as furnished, was substantially of the character of that given for the plaintiff before the jury on this trial, though in more condensed form. The complaint is that it was not "affirmative proof that the death of the insured was the proximate result of accidental means." It was not intended by the parties to the contract, nor would it be permitted to require as a condition precedent to a suit upon the policy, that the complainant should furnish more and a higher grade of proof than would suffice to establish his claim in a court of law. From what has been said in an earlier part of this opinion, it will be seen that the proofs were sufficient for the purpose of recovery. The plaintiff was not bound to furnish more proof to the insurer than was necessary to establish a prima facie case in her behalf. (Insurance Co. v. Rodel, 95 U. S., 232.)

Perceiving no error prejudicial to appellant, the judgment is affirmed with damages.

COURT OF APPEALS OF KENTUCKY.

DAVIS v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed September 30, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Local option—Construction of statutes—Appellant was convicted for violation of the local option statute upon the following state of facts: He sold a case of beer in Providence, a local option town, to Young who paid him $3.50 for it. Appellant kept the beer in the name of Cook Brewing Co., an Indiana corporation, which took out a license under its contract with appellant as wholesale dealer at Providence. He furnished his team, made the sale to whom and in the manner he pleased and reshipped the cases and bottles to the brewery where he was credited with the schedule rate, receiving the difference between that and the selling price. Held—That the court below was justified in finding that the scheme was one to evade the local option law at Providence where the sale was made.

Dorsey & Stanley for appellant.

N. B. Hays, Lorraine Mix and S. V. Dixon for appellee.

Appeal from Webster Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

Appellant was convicted of a violation of the local option statute under these circumstances: He sold and delivered a case of malt beer to witness, Young, who paid the sum of $3.50 for it. The beer was kept at Providence, which was a local option town, by apppellant in the name of the Cook Brewing Co., a corporation of the city of Evansville, Ind. The usual cost of the same beer at Evansville was $2.25 per case of forty-eight bottles. It cost thirty cents to ship it from Evansville to Providence. It sold at Providence, when saloons were permissible, at the price of $3 per case, or ten cents per bottle. Six extra bottles were put into the case on top of the other bottles, because the forty-eight bottles contained slightly less than five gallons, the minimum, under the statute, constituting a wholesale transaction.

Appellant's contract with the brewery was that it was to and did take out a license as wholesale dealer at Providence, and ship the case to appellant in their name, furnished his own team, at his own expense, made the sale to whom and in the manner that he pleased, reshipped empty cases and bottles to the brewers, who credited him at schedule rate, the net result of which was that the brewers got their customary price at the brewery for their beer, and appellant got the difference between that and the selling price, after deducting his expenses. The lower court found, and we think was justified under the facts, in finding that this was a trick or devise to evade the local option law in that district. (Section 2570, Kentucky Statutes.) Under the present statute (Act approved March 23d, 1904), no one but a distiller or manufacturer of intoxicants can sell at wholesale within a local option district. This arrangement shows that it was the obvious purpose of the parties to it to defeat the operation of the statute by indirectly procuring the right for appellant to do what the statutes forbid his doing. We do not, however, decide, as it is not necessary for us to pass upon the question in this case, that a non-resident brewer can obtain legally a license to sell beer in a local option district in this State, his brewery and place of business not being within such district.

The judgment is affirmed.

BEGLEY v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed September 30, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Criminal law—Principal and accessory—Appellant, who was convicted upon an indictment charging him with being an accessory before the fact to robbery, complains of his conviction and asks a reversal upon the ground that he was tried before the principals, or any of them were either tried or convicted. Held—That under section 1128, Kentucky Statutes. appellant's conviction could not be made to depend upon that of the principals, or any of them, or even upon their being in custody, although in order to convict him it was necessary to establish the guilt of the principals of the crime he procured them to commit.

Lewis & Calvert and W. L. Jett for appellant.

N. B. Hays and Loraine & Mix for appellee.

Appeal from Leslie Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

The appellant, Jack Begley, Henry Johnson and Farris Feltner, were indicted in the Leslie Circuit Court as accessories before the fact in the crime of robbery. Appellant was accorded a separate trial which resulted in his conviction, his punishment being fixed by verdict of the jury and judgment of the court at confinement in the penitentiary for the period of three yeras.

The persons alleged to have been robbed were Howard and Nelson Hamilton. Sam Begley, Russell Wotan and Ned McHone were the alleged principals in the commission of the crime, it being charged in the inductment, in apt language, that they robbed the Hamiltons of $300, and were feloniously induced and hired to do so by the appellant, Johnson and Feltner. The record shows that one of the principals, Ned McHone, turned States' evidence and was given immunity from punishment for the robbery; that Sam Begley, another of the principals, has never been apprehended because a fugitive from justice, and that Russell Wotan, the third principal, though present at the trial of appellant in the lower court, has not been apprehended, tried or convicted. It appears, however, that all three of the principals were indicted for the robbery. The appellant, Jack Begley, complains of the judgment of conviction and now asks its reversal solely upon the ground that he, though only charged in the indictment to be an accsesory before the fact, was tried and convicted before the principals, or any of them were either tried or convicted, and before the latter was in custody or on bail.

Undoubtedly the rule of the common law was, and is, that the principal must be disposed of before the accessory. This rule being founded upon the maxim, "Accessorius sequitur naturam sui principals." An accessory before the fact is he who, being absent at the time the act was committed, procures, counsels, commands, advises or abets another to commit it.

Section 1128, Kentucky Statutes, provides that "In all felonies, accessories before the fact shall be liable to the same punishment as principals, and may be prosecuted jointly with principals, or severally, though the principals be not taken or tried, unless otherwise provided in this chapter."

As said in the case of the Commonwealth v. Hicks, ante, 511, in discussing the purpose and effect of this statute, "The very object of the statute is to make the punishment of the accessory entirely independent of the conviction or punishment of the principal." So in this view of the statute (and we think it susceptible of no other construction), it is clear that the conviction of appellant could not be made to depend on that of the principals, or any of them, or even upon their being in custody, although in order to convict him as an accessory before the fact, it was necessary upon his trial, for the Commonwealth to establish the guilt of the principals, or some of them, of the crime which he procured them to commit. And the evidence in the record seems to have convinced the jury of both his and their guilt.

An examination of the opinion, in Able v. Commonwealth, 68 Ky., 698, relied on by counsel for appellant, will show that it does not conflict with the views herein expressed.

The very elaborate instructions given by the lower court seem to cover every aspect of the case, and no question is raised as to their correctness.

Wherefore, the judgment is affirmed.

BLACK v. COX, &c.

(Filed September 30, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Land—Ownership—Title by possession—Notice—The appellant obtained the legal title to the lot in controversy, in 1869. Nelson Cox, the husband and ancestor of appellees, took possession thereof the same year or the following year, but, whether as tenant or purchaser of appellant, the evidence is silent. Appellant claims that Cox held it as his tenant, which is denied by appellees. Held—As appellant introduced no proof that Cox entered or held the property, under him, and as appellees proved by the neighbors of Cox that he claimed it as his own, occupied and improved it up to the time of his death, which was more than 32 years, and devised it to his wife and children, it is reasonable to presume that appellant must have known of this adverse holding, and the judgment of the lower court adjudging the property to the appellees, will not be reversed.

Frank Chinn for appellant.

Ira Julian for appellee.

Appeal from Franklin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

The subject of this action is a lot with two small houses on it, situated in the city of Frankfort, Ky., of which appellant and appellees claim to be the owners.

Appellant obtained the legal title to this property by a conveyance from one Baltzell. in the year 1869. The husband and ancestor of appellees took possession of this lot in the latter part of that year, or the first of the succeeding year. The evidence is absolutely silent as to the circumstances under which he took possession, whether as a purchaser or a tenant of the appellant.

The appellant gave his own deposition in his behalf, which was objected and excepted to by appellees, which under section 606, of the Code, was incompetent evidence, as all of the statements in his deposition were with reference to alleged contracts, statements and conversations had with the deceased, Stephen Cox. This testimony being incompetent, leaves the appellant without any proof showing the circumstances under and by which the deceased Stephen Cox, entered upon and occupied this property from the year 1869, to the date of his death, in the year 1901. Not a witness stated that appellant made any claim to be the owner of this property or have any interest therein, from the year 1869, until after the death of Stephen Cox. Appellant's counsel claims that as Stephen Cox entered into the possession of this property and held it by the permission of the appellant and under his title. such holding by Stephen Cox never ripened into title as against the appellant; that it is conclusively presumed, in the absence of proof to the contrary, that Cox's holding continued as it began. This contention can not avail appellant, as he introduced no proof that Stephen Cox entered as his tenant or that he ever recognized appellant's title to the property. On the contrary, the proof shows by the neighbors of Cox, that he claimed it as his own and exercised acts of ownership over it by improving it, from the time he entered on it to the time of his death, which was more than 32 years. That he listed it for taxation and paid the taxes thereon. That during this time it was sold from him for taxes and it was redeemed by him. That just prior to his death he made and executed a will by which he devised it to his wife for life with remainder to his children.

While the proof does not show actual notice to appellant of the adverse claim and holding of this property by Stephen Cox, it does show that the place of appellant's business was within a block and a half of this property, and that it was generally known in that vicinity that Cox was claiming and occupying it as his own during all this time. Therefore, it is reasonable to presume that appellant must have known of the claim of the deceased.

Appellant claimed that he put Cox in possession with the understanding that he was to live there for the remainder of his life by paying the taxes thereon. This is denied by appellees and there was no proof introduced to sustain the allegation.

While the proof in this case leaves the matter in some doubt as to who is the real owner of the property, we do not feel authorized to reverse the judgment of the lower court in adjudging the property to the appellees.

Wherefore the judgment is affirmed.
